According to Nyiszli's lore, it was strictly forbidden for prisoners to read books:

“But this too is a privilege, the fact that the Sonderkommando can keep books for themselves and read them. In the K.Z. it's twenty days in the standing cell for anyone caught reading, if they don't just beat you to death.” (Chapter VI)

In contrast to this, the report of the visit to Auschwitz of several German government officials on June 28, 1944 provides this information:³²⁴

“Attached to the typing room is a library for inmates which is not very large that, according to statements by the inmate who manages it, is said to contain 45,000 volumes. Books are exchanged [borrowed and handed back in] every day.”

I pass over the alleged daily selections of 70 inmates who are said to have been killed by a shot into the neck in Crematorium II (Chapter IX) and the allegedly weekly selection in Camp Sector BIIC (Chapter XXVII), which are not reflected in Czech's Kalendarium of Auschwitz. I will return to this in Chapter 5.1.

More interesting in the present context is the matter of air-raid alarms. At the beginning of Chapter XXIII, Nyiszli tells the following story:

“I am in the habit of doing some reading after going to bed in order to put myself to sleep. I do so tonight as usual, but I cannot get much reading done, for the electric light suddenly goes out and soon I hear the K.Z.'s air-raid siren as well. On such occasions, heavily armed SS guards accompany us down to the Sonderkommando's shelter, the gas chamber. So it goes tonight too. We put our clothes on and set out. [...]

Not without cause, then, do we anxiously await the end of the air-raid alert. The alert was three hours long! We come back up out of the darkness of the gas chamber! The arc lamps on the barbed wire, the camp's kilometers-long chains of light, are lit again. We lie down. I try to sleep. It will be difficult.

The next morning, I am in Crematorium II on my patient-visitation rounds. The head Kapo of the Sonderkommando there informs me confidentially that in the darkness of last night's air-raid alert some partisans approached the camp. They cut through the wire fence enclosing the crematorium courtyard at a less conspicuous spot and slipped three machine pistols and ammunition along with 20 hand grenades through the resulting opening. The Sonderkommando men found them in the early morning hours and brought them to a secure hiding place. [...]

³²⁴ “Reisebericht. Besichtigung des Konzentrationslager Auschwitz am 28. Juni 1944 durch...” (followed by the names of seven officials charged with this mission). BAK, R22/1468, Blatt 58a (p. 4 of the report).

Recently there have been air-raid alerts every day, indeed several times a day, but only a long nighttime blackout can bring us help from our unknown but devoted comrades. Three or four more nighttime blackouts would be enough for the partisans to supply us with the necessary quantity of weapons, and then we could attempt a breakout."

The chronology is imponderable. In her Kalendarium, Czech mentions one single Allied mission on Auschwitz and Birkenau, on September 13, 1944 (1989, p. 876):

"For thirteen minutes, from 11:17 am to 11:30 am, the I.G. Farben plants in Dwory near Auschwitz are bombed."

On that occasion, two bombs fell on the Birkenau Camp:

"One damages the railway embankment and the railway branch to the crematoria, the second destroys a shelter located between the tracks, killing about 30 civilian workers."

It is known that, from Nyiszli's alleged assignment to Crematorium II until October 1944, Allied aircraft passed over the sky of Birkenau on June 26, July 8, 20, 23, August 25 and 13 September. All of these missions occurred during daylight.

Nyiszli's story is clearly invented. It is clear that he knew nothing of the bombing mission with the most serious consequences for the Birkenau Camp – that of September 13 – because he says nothing about the bombs dropped near the crematoria, which was quite a significant event. He also claims that the raids occurred "several times a day," which is wrong, and that they all occurred at night, which is also wrong. The darkness is a simple literary device to introduce imaginary incursions of partisans into the Birkenau Camp in order to bring weapons to the Sonderkommando. It's yet another literary device for Nyiszli's fanciful tale of the revolt.

Nyiszli also embellished a story that seems to have a kernel of truth:

"In June or July, it happened that 100,000 postcards were handed out among the inhabitants of the overcrowded barracks, everyone being required to write one to an acquaintance. They were given strict orders that they should write as return address not Auschwitz or Birkenau but rather 'Am Waldsee'! The only place with such a name is on the Swiss border! The postcards went out, replies even arrived for them. I was an eyewitness as they burned the letters sent in reply, about 50,000 of them, on a bonfire set in the crematorium courtyard. It would not have been possible to deliver them anyway, for the addressees themselves had been burned before the replies to their postcards arrived. Thus was it all contrived. The goal was to reassure and mislead world public opinion."

(Chapter XIX)

There is no doubt that postcards sent from Auschwitz with the sender's address given as "am Wannsee" do indeed exist, but it is not obvious why this happened. Randolph L. Braham writes about it (1981a, Vol. 2, p. 653):

"It was around this time, during the deportations from Zone IV, that postcards were first brought back from Auschwitz for delivery to the relatives and friends of many of those deported earlier. Postmarked 'Waldsee,' a fictitious geographic name, the cryptic messages ('Arrived safely. I am well.') were often written by the victims just before they were gassed. The objective of the Germans was, of course, to lull the Jews still awaiting deportation in Hungary into a false sense of security."

It is unknown who devised this stratagem. The only certain fact is that on October 25, 1944 Eberhard von Thadden, head Section "Inland II" of the German Department of Foreign Affairs, asked Adolf Eichmann about a certain Kemény, an "aryanized Jew" who had been deported, because the Hungarian embassy wanted him to be sent back. This person was then "in the camp am Waldsee (?)" ("im Lager am Waldsee (?)"), van Thadden wrote (T/1240); the question mark meant that von Thadden had no idea what "Waldsee" was. In his reply, written on November 3, SS Sturmbannführer Rolf Günther, Eichmann's deputy, said that the detainee's place of residence was unknown to him ("sein gegenwärtiger Aufenthaltsort hier nicht bekannt ist"; T/1241), without specifying writing anything about what "Waldsee" meant.

However, there is no connection between "Waldsee" and the alleged gasings, as is shown by one of the first versions of the tale, if not the first. In the report by Czesław Mordowicz and Arnost Rosin, two Jewish inmates who escaped from Birkenau on May 27, 1944, which was published in November 1944 by the War Refugee Board, we read (War Refugee Board 1944, p. 30):

"The transport [of Hungarian Jews] was received in AUSCHWITZ and BIRKENAU according to the well-known procedure (heads shaved, numbers tattooed, etc.) The men were given numbers beginning with 186,000 and the women were placed in the women's camp. About 600 men, of whom some 150 were between the ages of 45 and 60, were brought to BIRKENAU where they were divided up among various work detachments. The remainder stayed in AUSCHWITZ where they worked in the Buna plant.

The members of the transport were all left alive and none of them, as had been customary, were sent directly to the crematoria. In the postcards which they were allowed to write, they had to give 'Waldsee' as return address."

On the other hand, the Kalendarium of Auschwitz states that on May 2, 1944 two transports arrived from Hungary containing 1,800 and 2,000 Jews fit for labor. Nevertheless, after the initial selection, only 486 men (reg. nos. 186645-187130) and 616 women were registered. The remaining 2,698 deportees were allegedly killed in the "gas chambers" (Czech 1997, p. 618; 1989, p. 764). A telegram of Edmund Veessenmayer, Germany's plenipotentiary for Hungary, to the German Department of Foreign Affairs dated April 29, 1944, announced precisely (Braham 1963, p. 363):

"Today, the first transport of 1800 labor Jews between the ages of 16 and 50 has left Budapest. Tomorrow, another train leaves from Topolya with 2,000 labor Jews."

It is incomprehensible why 71% of these 3,800 inmates who were all fit for labor and were sent to Auschwitz precisely in order to work for the greater war effort, should have been "gassed" on arrival. Czech makes no reference to "Waldsee" in this context, but other authors are much more zealous in this regard, such as Andrzej Pankowicz. According to him, two transports with Jews were deported to Auschwitz on April 27 and 28, 1944 from the Kistarcsa Transit Camp in Hungary with 4,000 people. He writes (1990, p. 260):

"They were forced to write their families postcards with the sender's address Waldsee, then in all probability they were all killed in the gas chambers."

This is the exact opposite of what Walter Rosenberg wrote.

If we apply a logic of deception here, making deportees who were condemned to be "gassed" write postcards would have made little sense. Since, as I observed earlier, at least 107,200 Hungarian Jews were registered or sent to the Birkenau Transit Camp (Durchgangslager), that is, in the orthodox perspective, they all escaped the "gas chambers," it would have been much more reasonable to have them write postcards (and maybe they even did), because they could have answered and further reassured the Jews in Hungary who were still awaiting their own deportation.

Waldsee was not a fictitious place, by the way. There were at least two places with this name in Germany, one in what is today the State of Rhineland-Palatinate, the other in Württemberg. In the first there actually existed a community camp (Gemeinschaftslager; Ottolenghi 1993, p. 186).

3.10. Evacuation to Mauthausen

Nyiszli recounts the various phases of the evacuation march. The column of detainees left Birkenau at one o'clock at the night of January 18, 1945:

"It begins to grow light. We have covered about 15 kilometers in the course of the night. [...] Towards noon we arrive in Plesow, we rest for the first time there. [...] Passing nights under the open sky, hungry and thirsty, we covered some 200 kilometers. By the time we arrived in Ratibor, our number had dwindled to 2000 heads. [...] Our loading onto the wagons goes swiftly. After a night of waiting, we depart. I did not count how many frozen comrades we dumped from the wagons during the course of our five-day journey! By the time we arrived at K.Z. Mauthausen, our number had shrunk to 1500 heads. Included in the shortfall, no doubt, were also some escapees who found a suitable moment for slipping away." (Chapter XXXVIII)

The evacuation march of the Birkenau inmates, which included the 30 inmates of the Sonderkommando (who, according to Nyiszli, were all killed on October 6, 1944), followed the route (omitting small locations) Auschwitz, Rajsko, Brzeszcze, Pszczyna, Żory, Rybnik, Wodzisław Śląski (Czech 1997, p. 786; 1989, p. 971). In this context, "Plesow" (a Polish city with this name does not exist) can only be "Pless," the German name of Pszczyna, where the column actually arrived around noon on the 19th. The march's duration given by Nyiszli (five days) is almost exact (it actually took four days), but while Nyiszli had the column march 200 kilometers to reach Ratibor, where the inmates were loaded onto a train, they actually marched to Wodzisław Śląski (German name: Loslau), which is about 70 kilometers.

Ratibor was the German name of Racibórz, a city located about 18 kilometers away from Wodzisław Śląski. It is not mentioned at all as a place of arrival or passage of the evacuated Auschwitz inmates. On January 22, the column from Birkenau arrived at Wodzisław Śląski, and on the next day they left on a train with destination Mauthausen, where they arrived on January 25 (Wróbel 1962, pp. 19-29).

On this scene, Nyiszli again unleashes his wanton fantasy:

"The stones are white; the castle has just been built! It was built in the Third Reich period, with the designation K.Z. Forty thousand Spanish freedom fighters who had taken refuge in France were brought here after its occupation, along with a hundred thousand German Jewish men. [...] With sufferings inconceivable to the human imagination they built the castle, but they were not to be its inhabitants. They died without remnant in this sea of stone and concrete!" (Chapter XXXIX)

The first inmates arrived in Mauthausen on August 8, 1938, consisting of 300 Austrians and a few Germans who built the camp's first barracks (Marsalek 1977, p. 23). The first transport of Spanish Republicans, 392 persons, arrived in Mauthausen on August 8, 1940 (ibid., p. 91); in total, 7,200 Spaniards were interned there over the years (ibid., p. 113). The total number of Jewish prisoners, from August 8, 1938 to May 4, 1945, was 24,855 men and 877 women, of whom 14,356 died altogether (ibid., p. 204).

Nyiszli's tale of the camp's liberation is decidedly incredible:

"On the third day it comes about that an SS officer arrives accompanied by a camp clerk and calls on all those who have worked in the Auschwitz crematorium to present themselves. The blood runs cold within me! Do they have a list of us? They are so damned precise and well organized, it is very likely! I think it over and come to the conclusion that it is merely an attempt at fishing out the secret bearers from the great crowd. If they had a list they would look at our tattoo numbers. No one here knows me! In mute silence I wait as the anxious minutes pass. I have won! I have again won life!" (Chapter XXXVIII)

Yet Nyiszli himself speaks of the list of Sonderkommando members:

"The Ober gives me some sheets of paper covered with numbers which he has been holding in his hands until now and tells me to find my number and cross it out. In my hands is a list of the tattoo numbers of Sonderkommando members. I take out my fountain pen; after a quick search I find and cross out my number. When I have done this, he tells me to cross out my companions' numbers as well!" (Chapter XXXV)

In practice, after having exterminated the detainees of the 12th and 13th "Sonderkommando" because they were "bearers of unconfessable secrets," the SS of Auschwitz, starting with Mengele himself, completely disregarded Nyiszli and his three assistants, but later at Mauthausen the SS tried to ferret them out by simply walking around asking who had worked in the crematoria!

It is clear that, if the SS had really considered them so dangerous, Nyiszli and his companions would have been identified during the registration procedure, given that they had their Auschwitz registration numbers tattooed on their arm.

Nyiszli's liberation tale is completely unlikely because it is based on a petty and twisted psychology. He claims that he was an eyewitness to the "gassing" of two million Jews in the crematoria of Birkenau, not counting those who had been burned on the pyres; that the SS had exterminated "one thousand three hundred of [his] companions" (Epilogue) because they were bearers of these secrets. He was also in contact almost every day with Mengele (in the book he mentions him more than 120 times!), whose alleged crimes Nyiszli must have known perfectly well. In the narration of his discovery of the killing of the twins by Mengele with an injection of chloroform into the heart, he writes:

"If Dr. Mengele were to suspect that I know the secret of the injections, ten doctors of the political SS would be on hand to determine my time of death!" (Chapter VIII)

And a little further on, at the end of the same chapter:

"My hair almost stands on end when I think of all that I have accepted during my brief life here [in the camp] and all that I must still accept, wordlessly, hereafter until the end arrives for me as well. I knew it when I entered here, but now that I am in possession of so many secrets, I have no doubt that I am a dead man walking. Is it conceivable that Dr. Mengele or the Berlin-Dahlem Institute should allow me to live?"

The fact is, however, that Mengele disappears from the story without paying any attention to this allegedly dangerous eyewitness. The penultimate time Mengele is mentioned by Nyiszli is in Chapter XXXVI, sometime between November 17, 1944 and January 10, 1945:

"One day, quite unexpectedly, Dr. Mengele arrives. He seeks us out in our room; he guesses that we will not be in the dissection hall where, for days now, we have had nothing to do. He tells us that, by higher orders, K.Z.

Auschwitz is to be completely liquidated – not the inhabitants in this case, he means the institution itself. Among the crematoria, two will be demolished; the third will remain for the time being for the cremation of the camp's dead. We four will be moving with the dissection-hall equipment, the museum specimens and the archives to Crematorium IV. It will remain in operation. I and II are marked for immediate destruction!"

The next and last reference to Mengele is at the beginning of Chapter XXXVIII:

"Our days went by quietly, without incident. Dr. Mengele, so we heard, had departed from Auschwitz. There's a new doctor at the K.Z., which, starting from New Year's Day, has officially ceased to be a K.Z. and become an Arbeitslager, that is, a labor camp. Everything here is in ferment and decay! On January 10, a newspaper comes into my hands from which I learn of the launch of the Russian offensive."

According to the logic that Nyiszli attributes to Mengele and the SS, the camp's liquidation necessarily implied Nyiszli's physical liquidation. If we follow his narration, however, Mengele left without bothering to liquidate this crucial witness. This is even more senseless than it seems, because Mengele actually left Birkenau after Nyiszli, on January 18, 1945, to be exact! (Kubica 1997, p. 421)

PART 4:

Nyiszli's Testimony in the Context of Trials and Other Testimonies

4.1. Detainees and SS Men Mentioned by Nyiszli

Nyiszli quoted in his writings the names of several detainees and SS men of Birkenau with whom he had direct contact. The detainees were mostly physicians. I list them here in the order they were mentioned by him:

Sentkeller, Lewy, Grósz, Epstein, Bendel, Heller, Dénes Görög, Adolf Fischer, József Körner, Olleé, other unspecified individuals, Dina, Michel, a certain Pipel, and a certain Dayan. In 1948, Daniel Bennamia joins that list. It is peculiar that Nyiszli never mentions the registration number of any other inmate. Even more peculiar is the fact that, of the 900 members of the four Birkenau crematoria's Sonderkommando (such was its maximum strength in July-August 1944), whom Nyiszli had the task of assisting from a medical point of view, he mentions only two by name: Dr. Bendel and Olleè (Olère)!

Although Bendel and Bennamia were also members of the Sonderkommando and survived, Nyiszli claimed to have been the only survivor. Explaining this striking contradiction would have deserved the attention of Nyiszli's fantasy.

4.1.1. Sentkeller

In Chapter II of his book, Nyiszli introduces this individual as follows:

"Dr. Sentkeller – for that is his name, as I later learn – head doctor of Camp Hospital 'F', nods understanding. He calls me to him and accompanies me to the desk of another inmate worker."

This is Roman Zentkeller (20497), who was a Polish military physician interned at Auschwitz on September 5, 1941. He served as Camp Eldest in Camp Sector BIIIf. As such, he was directly subordinate to the SS physician in charge of that sector, so the qualification as "head doctor of Camp Hospital 'F,'" although inaccurate, is not completely wrong either.

4.1.2. Lewy and Grósz

Regarding these two physicians, Nyiszli states in his Chapter III:

"The chief physician of Hospital Barracks 12, Dr. Lewy, is professor at the University of Strasbourg; his deputy, Dr. Grósz, professor at the University of Zagreb. Both are internists. In the field of medical research, they are eminent figures on a Europe-wide scale."

In her 1974 article "The role of the men's hospital camp at the Auschwitz Camp II," Czech provides the names and registration numbers of the medical staff for the individual camp sectors, but a Dr. Grósz is never mentioned by her.

The other physician, whom Nyiszli describes in TVN as “Dr. Lewy, Robert, university professor, Strasbourg, (Camp Sector F)”, was Robert Lévy, registration number 145920. Czech writes that he was deported to Auschwitz on September 4, 1943, and that he worked in Block 12 of Camp Sector BIIIf, but she took that information from Nyiszli's book (1974, Note 108, p. 52).

Dr. Lévy wrote an essay about his stay in Birkenau which was published in 1947 under the title “Auschwitz II (Birkenau)” (Lévy 1996, pp. 457-466). A biographical note informs us that he was born in 1894 and was an assistant at Surgical Clinic B of the Faculty of Medicine at the University of Strasbourg. On October 21, 1943, he was interned in the Drancy Camp, whence he was deported to Birkenau on September 2. He arrived there on September 4, and stayed until January 18, 1945 (ibid., p. 457). In his essay, Lévy tells what happened during the “selection” of his transport (ibid., p. 458):

“I approach an SS officer and tell him in German: ‘I am the convoy’s doctor, what am I supposed to do with the sick?’ – He replied, ‘You are a doctor and you speak German, that’s good; you can go to the left.’ I obey; other fellow deportees come to join me; the women, children, those beyond fifty, the sick are sent to the right.”

The physicians were therefore pulled from the crowds at their very arrival at Birkenau. Note that for Lévy those unfit for labor were sent to the right, while Nyiszli has them sent to the left. Another French physician, Robert Waitz, who was deported from Drancy to Monowitz on October 3, 1943 (reg. no. 157261), and who was evacuated to Buchenwald on January 18, 1945, devoted a special paragraph to “The History of the Right Column” (“Histoire de la Colonne de Droite”) in a statement that also appeared in 1947. That paragraph begins as follows (Waitz 1996, p. 470):

The positioning of those fit and unfit for work in a right or left column, respectively, is undoubtedly a literary dramatization. It is unknown to SS men and prominent detainees, such as Rudolf Höss and Primo Levi. The former Auschwitz commandant described the selection procedure as follows (Bezwińska/Czech 1984, p. 120):

“The railway carriages were unloaded one after the other. After depositing their baggage, the Jews had to pass individually in front of an SS doctor, who decided on their physical fitness as they marched past him. Those considered capable of employment were immediately taken off into the camp in small groups.”

And here is the description by Primo Levi, who was deported from Fossoli, Italy, to Auschwitz on February 22, 1944 (reg. no. 174517; Levi 1984, p. 20):

"In less than ten minutes, all of us capable men were gathered in a group. What happened to the others – women, children, the old – we could establish neither then nor later; the night swallowed them, purely and simply."

In early October 1943, Lévy was transferred to the inmate infirmary (Häftlingskrankenbau), where he worked "for 16 months," thus up to the evacuation of Auschwitz. But he never mentions Block (or Barracks) 12 or even Nyiszli. On the other hand, he provides other information which conflicts with what the Hungarian physician has claimed.

Nyiszli describes twice the food administered to Auschwitz detainees:

"Subordinate to them, eagerly following their example, is the six-member medical team. They are French and Greek doctors, of more recent vintage, kind-hearted and caring. For three years now, they have eaten the bread of the K.Z., bread made with horse-chestnut flour cut with sawdust." (Chapter III)

"[...] 700 calories per day of moldy bread made from horse chestnuts, margarine made from lignite, and 30 grams worth of watery salami ground from the flesh of mangy horses. The victim washes this down with half a liter of nettle or turnip soup, cooked without fat, flour or salt [...]" (Chapter XVI)

Tadeusz Iwasko states that detainees were subject to certain food rations, which were distributed in three meals per day. However, SS members employed in the food stores committed theft, and during the distribution of meals the rations were further cut short by Kapos and other detainees in a position of power. The consequence was that, instead of the 1,700 calories expected for light work and 2,150 for heavy work, only 1,300 and 1,700 calories were actually given. In the morning, detainees received half a liter of coffee substitute or herbal infusion called tea. Four times a week at noon, a soup with meat was provided, and three times a week a vegetable soup (potatoes and beets). A soup portion was about three quarters of a liter, with a nutritional value of 350-400 calories. In the evening, about 300 grams of bread and about 25 grams of margarine or a spoon of jam or curd were distributed to the inmates. The nutritional value of the evening meal was 900-1,000 calories. The inmates who did hard work received a supplement of bread, margarine and sausage (Iwasko 2000, pp. 59-61).

The theft by SS men claimed by Iwasko is at least unlikely, if not impossible. The contents of the food store were recorded in a special register, in which the camp's occupancy, the quantity of food by weight stored in the warehouse, and the quantity per prisoner by weight were listed on a daily basis. This is evidenced by a log excerpt from December 11, 1944 to January 17, 1945. The register shows that the inventory was constantly replenished, so that there was a steady relationship between the quantity of food available and the number of prisoners.³²⁵

Nyiszli's absurd statements are also openly contradicted by his fellow inmate Robert Lévy, who wrote in this regard (Lévy 1996, p. 461):

"Everyone got up at four and a half in the morning; the Kommandos left the camp at 6 o'clock in order to reach their workplace. Prior to this, they received half a liter of coffee substitute or an indefinable infusion. At noon, they interrupt their work for an hour and received soup ($\frac{3}{4}$ liter to 1 liter). Then they continued to work until 17 o'clock. After returning to the camp, an endless roll call followed that was particularly troublesome during rainy, snowy or freezing weather. For dinner, they distributed half a liter of coffee or herb tea, 300 grams of bread for the day, 40-50 grams of margarine three times a week, with a spoonful of red beetroot jam, three times a piece of sausage, and once a week 40 grams of cheese. The daily diet had a value of 900-1000 calories."

Lévy also provides a description of the alleged gassing procedure, which reflects the propaganda rumors circulating in the camp at the time (ibid., p. 468):

"'S.B.,' 'Sonderbehandlung,' 'special treatment' is carried out. The 'Sonderkommando,' who live separately from all the other detainees and who are themselves exterminated about every three months in order to eliminate embarrassing witnesses, cram the unfortunates into the gas chamber. The S.S. murderer who followed the convoy in an ambulance – we nicknamed it the 'angel of death' – threw his 'Cyclon' can through a roof hatch, and a few minutes later, the hydrogen cyanide had extinguished all of these human lives."

This is a rehashing of the stereotypes of the short-lived Sonderkommando (in this case merely 3 months!) and the Red Cross van carrying the Zyklon B (the "ambulance"). As is well-known, "Angel of Death" was the nickname of Josef Mengele according to the orthodox narrative. Thus, as I pointed out earlier, Mengele was at the same time the omnipresent selector on the ramp and the carrier of Zyklon B, which instead would have been the task of two different persons. As for the "Cyclon," which was thrown into the "gas chamber" through a "roof hatch," Lévy, without ever having set foot into a crematorium, knew the alleged secret of its composition – hydrogen cyanide – which was unknown to Nyiszli who claimed to have spent eight months in the Birkenau crematoria.

"The six crematoria burned day and night; facing the crowding during the summer of 1944, the furnaces no longer sufficed, and the corpses were burned in large pits in the birch forest. On a single night in August 1944, the entire Gypsy camp consisting of 4,000 men, women and children was sent into the gas. Meanwhile, the method had been perfected: a railway line had been built ending 50 meters short of the gas chambers, so that a whole transport, whether it embarked at Drancy or Budapest, arrived directly at the place of execution. They only had to pass before the S.S. commission. This made those condemned approach another step closer, and then they entered an immense freight elevator, where they were gassed. Thanks to this system, the corpses were transported without loss of time to the cremation furnaces. In June 1944, the record number of 22,000 incinerations was reached in 24 hours."

Hence, there were six crematoria at Birkenau! The cremation pits were excavated "in the birch forest" without reference to the courtyard of Crematorium V or to "Bunker 2." The new method of extermination is extremely imaginative. The railway line refers obviously to the so-called Birkenau ramp, but the story of the "immense freight elevator, where they were gassed," is clearly absurd. As to the record number of 22,000 cremations on a single day, this echoes the stories of various other witnesses that come with variations and numerical oscillations up to 26,000 or even 30,000 victims, but also regarding the record-setting month. Here is one of these typical testimonies, by Kurt Markus:³²⁶

"When the transports [from Hungary] began [arriving] on May 16, 1944, the crematoria were no longer enough, because during the first days they had to cremate up to 30,000 corpses."

I will come back to this issue later. In relation to the Sonderkommando's fate, Lévy provides valuable information on the specific subject of this study (Lévy 1996, p. 464):

"In the summer of 1944, there was a revolt of the 'Sonderkommando.' Realizing from certain cues that they were about to be sacrificed, they refused to leave their block and burned down a part of the gas chamber. The SS machine and submachine guns, rushing in from everywhere, immediately put a stop to this attempt at revolt. The two 'Sonderkommando' doctors tried to commit suicide by taking a massive dose of gardenal. One of them died, the other, Dr. B., was saved due to our care. I was very pleased to learn that he had testified as a prosecution witness at the Lüneburg Trial."

The assumed dating of the revolt goes back to the stories of the early postwar period, which was then given a "historiographic" expression. In his article "The Revolt of the Sonderkommando at Auschwitz," Wellers proffered the thesis of two uprisings: one is said to have happened on September 7, 1944, the other on October 6. Little by little, the detainees working at the "Union" workshops had stolen small amounts of gunpowder, which they handed over to the Sonderkommando, who planned to blow up the four crematoria with this. But on the agreed-upon day, the SS was warned by a traitor (Wellers 1949, pp. 17f.):

"On that same day, 200 men of the Sondercommando [sic] were gassed."

³²⁶ Declaration by Kurt Markus titled "Auschwitz-Birkenau. Das grösste Vernichtungslager der Welt." Trial against the Auschwitz camp garrison, AGK, NTN, 135, p. 153.

It is unclear, however, how the rebels could burn down “a part of the gas chamber.” The final part of Lévy's account is particularly important. From it we glean that two doctors were members of the Sonderkommando, one of whom died while the other survived: “Dr. B.,” which clearly stands for Sigismund Bendel, who indeed testified during the Lüneburg trial, that is, the Belzen Trial as a witness during the hearing of October 1, 1945 (see Chapter 4.2.). Lévy does not mention Nyiszli by name in his story, although Nyiszli could have been the only other doctor involved. According to Lévy, however, Nyiszli had died of suicide!

As for the number of victims, Lévy regurgitates the Soviet propaganda figure that was commonly known at that time (Lévy 1996, p. 457):

“[Birkenau] has seen the extermination of more than four million human beings.”

4.1.3. Epstein

On this detainee, Nyiszli writes in his book:

“The Gypsy camp has a point of special interest, the experimental barracks located there. Professor Dr. Epstein, professor publicus ordinarius at the University of Prague and a pediatrician of world renown, is chief of the research lab. He has been a prisoner of the K.Z. for four years already. His assistant is Dr. Bendel, lecturer in the faculty of medicine at Paris.” (Chapter IV)

“Study of twin phenomena on living people. This research was carried out by Dr. Epstein, ordinarius at the University of Prague, who had been in custody for five years now.” (TVN)

Before the German army occupied Prague, Dr. Berthold Epstein emigrated to Norway, where he was eventually arrested by the German Security Police. A “Questionnaire for Jews in Norway” dated March 5, 1942 and bearing the name Epstein Berthold Israel lists the following qualifications: “Pediatrician. University professor for childhood diseases (1930). Director of the pediatric clinic at Prague (1932-1939).”³²⁷ On December 1, 1942, he was deported to Auschwitz – hence, in the summer of 1944, he had been “in custody” for less than two years, not five. In January 1943, he was transferred to the Monowitz Camp, and in August of that year he was transferred back to the Birkenau Gypsy camp, where he worked in the experimental barracks (Czech 1974, p. 34). This latter information, however, is not documented and seems be based solely on Nyiszli's statements.

Dr. Epstein was one of four physicians who, on March 4, 1945, signed an appeal in German "To the International Public" ("An die internationale Öffentlichkeit"). The other three were Geza Mansfeld, university professor in Budapest, Bruno Fischer, university professor in Prague, and Henri Limousin, university professor in Clermond Ferrand.

The appeal focuses on medical experiments in Auschwitz, but without mentioning twins or any "experimental barracks" in the Gypsy camp:³²⁸

"In various infirmary blocks of the Main Camp and of associated subcamps, experiments on healthy living people were also performed by SS camp physicians which otherwise would have been done using laboratory animals, namely: by Dr. Mengele, by Dr. Endreß [Entress], Tilo [Thilo], Klein, Fischer and Kittel [Kitt], and moreover by SS Sturmbannführer Prof. Dr. Klauberg [Clauberg]."

As examples, X-ray castration and pharmacological experiments with injections were mentioned. The authors of the appeal reiterated the most atrocious propaganda stereotypes of the time:

"To save petroleum, oils and fats necessary for the combustion were in parts extracted from the corpses of those gassed. Technical oils and greases for machines were also extracted from the corpses, even washing soap."

By signing this appeal, famous university professors of medicine endorsed these scurrilous charges!

Dr. Epstein was also questioned by the Soviets, and an excerpt of his deposition was published in the Soviet report on Auschwitz which was presented during the Nuremberg IMT:³²⁹

"... Selected prisoners were sent into the gas chambers for extermination. For several months, we saw long rows of human beings walk to the crematoria into their death. Especially large groups were murdered in May, June and July 1944. During this time, the crematoria operated day and night, which could be seen from the flames spewing from the chimneys. We often sensed the smell of burning flesh, hair and fingernails. Apart from the flames coming out of the crematoria's chimneys, we saw two gigantic outdoor fires in those days that blazed brightly during the night. Screams and cries as well as the barking of the SS men's guard dogs could be heard in the camp all night long. The unfortunate victims, who due to the overcrowded crematoria were sent one by one to their death in the open fires, sensed the fate that awaited them. ...

'I knew that my closest relatives had met that fate, and that I would not evade it either. Roughly every other week, the camp physician, MENGELE, selected the people who were to be killed in the crematorium. This way, some 500 children were killed on one day. Heartbreaking scenes unfolded when the kids were brought away, because everyone knew whence they went. During these events, the SS men and their aides distinguished themselves in exceptional brutality. When we arrived at Oswiezim, I was separated from my wife and never saw her again. Later on, I heard that she had not even been admitted into the camp. My wife was undoubtedly killed in the usual way. In March 1944, the SS men murdered my wife's sister with her two children and my 38-year-old niece. In July 1944, my sister perished as well. ”

This tale reflects the black-propaganda tales that were then regurgitated by Nyiszli: flames shooting from chimneys, “the smell of burning flesh, hair, and fingernails” – Nyiszli: “Burning human flesh emits an acrid smell” (Chapter I); “The air is heavy with the smell of burning human flesh and singed hair” (Chapter XXX) – the presence of two outdoor fires, the biweekly selections (daily for Nyiszli) of inmates who were sent to death. Epstein mentioned Mengele only in relation to these biweekly “selections.”

In a 1987 article co-authored by Tadeusz Szymański, who had been Epstein's colleague in the Gypsy camp, as well as Danuta Szymańska and Tadeusz Śnieszko, Epstein was described as a department physician (Abteilungsarzt) and researcher at the section of Barracks 22 that hosted patients suffering from noma (autumn 1943):

“The detainee Prof. Bertold Epstein of the University of Prague conducted research on noma by order of Mengele.”

Epstein's assistant was not Bendel, who is never even mentioned by Czech in the article mentioned earlier, but Dr. Rudolf Weisskopf (Szymański et al. 1987, pp. 202, 204f.). This is confirmed by Helena Kubica in her article on Mengele, where she states that the real last name of this “helper and assistant” (“Helfer und Assistent”) of Epstein was Vitek (Kubica 1997, p. 379).

Dr. Epstein signed an affidavit on March 3, 1947 for the I.G. Farben Trial in which he spoke exclusively of his activity at Monowitz. Among other things, he asserted:

“There were general directives in Monowitz which prescribed that only those detainees were to be admitted to the infirmary whose recovery would not [be expected to] last more than 14 days.” (NI-5847, p. 1)

Hence, Dr. Epstein was even more drastic than Nyiszli, who indicated a longer recovery period:

“It was generally known that after 3 to 4 weeks, if the sick did not heal, they were put on a transport, that is, they were sent to be gassed at Birkenau or to be shot at Birkenau.” (NI-11710)

The Monowitz hospital register goes until June 19, 1944. This last page contains the names and serial numbers of 33 inpatient inmates, all Jews except for four, next to their discharge date (Entlassung). Three of these Jewish inmates were hospitalized for more than a month, specifically:

- Steinfeld, Israel (70219), until July 29 (40 days)
- Rabinowitsch, Emil (167639) until July 22 (33 days)

– Algawa, Josef (115863) until July 28 (39 days).³³⁰

Going back in that document, we find the detainee Forysz, Michel (125300), who was admitted on June 16, 1944, and was discharged on October 17 (p. 471), Grünbaum, Jakob (144239) from June 15 to August 23 (transferred to Birkenau; p. 470), Zorovics, Moses (A 8102) from June 15 to August 3 (p. 469), Kloppmann, Joel (79673), from June 14 to August 9 (p. 468), Weinberger, Alexander (A 3890) from June 14 to August 21 (p. 467), Guttman, Benno (171980) from June 13 to September 1 (p. 465), Pintzow, Michael (105371) from June 12 to September 27, and Farkas, Elias (A 7965) from June 12 to October 22 (p. 464). I could go on like that for a long time, but you get the point. Just remember that Primo Levi was hospitalized at the Monowitz hospital on March 30, 1944, and remained there until April 20 (p. 360).

Dr. Epstein testified as a witness for the prosecution during the I.G. Farben Trial on November 18, 1947. His testimony does not contain any reference to Birkenau. During cross-examination by defense lawyer Hans Seidl, Epstein claimed that the hospital for Monowitz detainees had received the verbal directive to only admit prisoners for whom recovery could be expected within two weeks. The others were sent directly to the hospital at Auschwitz, where, it was said, selections were made for the “gas chambers.”³³¹ However, an analysis of the data contained in the Monowitz hospital’s register yields a total of 2,599 detainees who were transferred to Auschwitz and Birkenau,³³² meaning that all of these inmates had already been admitted to the Monowitz hospital before they were transferred to the hospitals of these two adjacent camps.

This fact finds a spectacular confirmation in a defense document submitted during the I.G. Farben Trial, called the “Hoerlein Document No. 215.”³³³ It is a collection of clinical records of ten detainees, four of them Jewish, who were admitted to Auschwitz’s inmate infirmary due to tuberculosis and who died after many weeks or even months of treatment. The documentation includes drawings of pulmonary radiographs, clinical records with daily progress reports of the disease, and, in five cases, autopsy reports.

For instance, the Polish detainee Czeslaus Łancy (reg. no. 122772) worked for “Kdo Buna,” that is to say at Monowitz. He was admitted to the infirmary on August 12, 1943, and remained there until the day of his death on May 8, 1944. The next day his body was subjected to autopsy.

The four Jews in detention were:

- Michael Awerbuch (99214), Polish Jew, admitted on July 2, 1943, died on November 9, 1943.
- Isaak Attas (115899), Greek Jew, admitted on May 22, 1943, died on February 25, 1944; an autopsy was performed the next day.
- Benjamin Beresi (114941), Greek Jew, admitted on July 6, 1942, died on April 3, 1944; an autopsy was performed the next day.
- Lejzor Weinblum (124262), Polish Jew, admitted on July 12, 1943, died on January 12, 1944.

These documents demonstrate that, first of all, even tuberculosis patients were regularly admitted to the inmate infirmary and remained there for several months, and that the Auschwitz infirmary's dissection room worked perfectly during the spring of 1944. Hence, Nyiszli's claims about the uniqueness of his dissection room and his forensic activities are untrue as well.

Document 21 is the last page of the clinical record of the inmate Beresi (spelled Beressy in the autopsy report). The medical diagnosis is "Lungen: Tbc fibro-caseosa progrediens" (lungs: advanced fibrocaseous tuberculosis); the first line, "Monatstag" gives the days of the month, the next line, "Kr. Tage," refers to the days of illness. The detainee died after 273 days of hospitalization at the inmate infirmary. Document 22 is the autopsy report prepared by Dr. Fritz Klein on February 26, 1944 concerning the detainee Isaak Attas.

After this brief digression, we return to the witnesses. On March 3, 1947, Dr. Vitek, who was a dermatologist, signed an affidavit (NI-4830), in which he stated that he had been arrested in Prague on January 26, 1942, and had been sent to Theresienstadt, whence he was transferred to Auschwitz on October 26 of that same year and sent to Monowitz. In February 1943, he was sent back to Auschwitz, where he remained until June 1943. Then he was transferred to Birkenau to the Gypsy camp, where he remained until November 4, 1944, when he returned to Auschwitz. He only talked about his brief experience at Monowitz, describing that camp in terrible terms as dictated by the propaganda of the time (he also parroted the fable of a maximum hospital-admissions term for inmates of only 14 days). On his long activity in the Gypsy camp, he did not say a single word, which indicates that he had nothing to say about Dr. Mengele's alleged experiments. On the other hand, if we consider that Vitek's specialization was dermatology, it is clear that his primary task was the fight against noma.

During the I.G. Farben Trial, Vitek even testified in person on November 18, 1947, immediately before Dr. Epstein. During cross-examination by defense lawyer Seidl, Vitek talked about his one-and-a-half-year stay at Birkenau's "sickbay" without giving any specifics. He reported that he had been the head physician of one of the hospital barracks, in which there were cases of typhus, and that he was in charge of the care for about 800 patients. The whole camp had about 16,000 inmates. It is unclear to which hospital the witness was referring. He did not expressly mention the Gypsy camp.

Karl Hoffmann, Otto Ambros's defense lawyer during the I.G. Farben Trial, then asked Dr. Vitek – departing from the “fact” established during earlier trials that homicidal gassings had occurred at Birkenau – whether he thought it possible that detainees participated in them. Vitek replied:³³⁴

“Inmates did not participate in the gassing itself. The inmates participated in the burning of the gassed bodies. This was the so-called Sonderkommando (special detail).”

Vitek did not mention Mengele and his activities at all.

4.1.4. Heller

In Chapter XIV of his book, Nyiszli writes:

“The day after the liquidation I went on official business into Camp ‘F,’ where I chatted with them, and so with the renowned Prague physician Dr. Heller, former chief physician of the Czech camp, as well. From him I heard recounted the sufferings and ruin of the finest flower of Czech Jewry. Since that day, the eight doctors have died as well. They were true doctors! With profound respect I pay tribute to their memory!”

Although Czech mentions a Dr. Heller, reg. no. 146703, who is said to have been transferred to Mengele's Camp Sector BIIb, the source of this information is Nyiszli himself (Czech 1974, p. 48).

Miroslaw Kárný informs us that Dr. Otto Heller, for whom he gives no registration number, was the head physician of the infirmary inside the Theresienstadt family camp (Sector BIIb), without giving any more details.³³⁵

4.1.5. Nyiszli's Three Assistants

The episode of Mengele assigning assistants to Dr. Nyiszli can be found in Chapter XVIII of his book:

“The first whose hand I shake is Dr. Görög Dénes, a private university lecturer and pathologist at the State Public Hospital of Szombathely. He is a short, thin man of about forty-five years of age who wears thick glasses. He makes a good impression on me. I have the feeling that we will be good friends. The second is a short, stocky individual of about fifty years of age, with a hunched back and a very ugly face. He is Fischer Adolf, autopsy assistant for twenty years at the Prague Institute of Anatomy. As a Czech Jew, he has been an inmate of the K.Z. for five years already. The third is Dr. Körner Józef, a physician from Nice, inmate of the K.Z. for four years already. A taciturn but qualified young man, he is only thirty-two years old."

In a report of July 4, 1945, a former Jewish Auschwitz inmate from Hungary wrote about Dénes as follows (see Section 4.3.2.):

"When our transport arrived Mengele's first question was whether there was a pathologist among us, and he kept repeating the same question till he found the pathologist of the public hospital of Szombathely, Dr Dénes Görög."

This deportee, of whom we know only his initials S.M., arrived at Birkenau on June 30, 1944. If his claims are true, since Nyiszli was transferred from Monowitz to Birkenau's Sector BIIf on June 27, 1944 and stayed there for another five days before being taken to Crematorium II (which took place on July 2; see p. 188), it follows that Mengele had already found a pathologist when he brought Nyiszli to the crematorium.

We know nothing about an Adolf Fischer. Helena Kubica mentions him together with Görög and Körner, but only backed up by Nyiszli's book (Kubica 1997, p. 404).

Körner's name, as seen earlier (Section 3.1.3f.), shows up on the June 27, 1944 transfer order from Monowitz's inmate infirmary to Birkenau's Sector BIIf with the name Jecheskiel and registration number 169840, which was assigned to Jews deported from France on December 20, 1943 (Czech 1997, p. 551; 1989, p. 684). In the list of this transport, we find a Koerner Jacheskiel, born December 6, 1912 in Rohsadna.³³⁶ Hence, by the summer of 1944, Körner had been in Auschwitz for a few months, not for four years.

4.1.6. Dina

This detainee is mentioned by Nyiszli at the end of his Chapter IV:

"Dr. Mengele visits the experimental barracks every day. He takes part in the research with keen interest, working together with two prominent doctors and a painter named Dina who prepares, with great skill, the drawings needed for the work. She is from Prague, and she has been in the Czech camp for three years. As Dr. Mengele's associate, she enjoys certain advantages. She is counted among the 'prominent'!"

This is Dinah Gottliebová. How much she was traumatized by Mengele's alleged terrible experiments can be deduced from her drawing depicting her boss on a bicycle (see Document 23)! As I noted elsewhere, she was left alive by Mengele, along with the other "keepers of secrets," Epstein, Vitek/Weisskopf and Martyna Puszyina (Mattoigno 2008, p. 12; see the Appendix). Mengele evidently thought he had nothing to fear from these inmates.

4.1.7. Michel, Pipel and Dajen

About “Michel,” Nyiszli says only that he was a “French cook” who worked in the non-existent kitchen of the Sonderkommando of Crematorium II (Chapter XXIV). In the respective list of prisoners published by Friedler et al., no “Michel” of French origin can be found.

Pipel is not a proper name, but the term denoting servants of “prominent” inmates and SS men, hence that person is impossible to identify.

Dajen is a Hebrew word (dajjân) that designates a judge, especially of a rabbinical court. A “Dajan” is also mentioned in Salmen Lewental’s manuscript (Czech et al. 1996, p. 244). In the French edition of the manuscripts by the Sonderkommando members, Ber Mark states that Leib Langfus was the “dayan” (Mark 1982, p. 297, Note 2, p. 298, Note 2). In the Auschwitz Museum’s edition of those texts, in Lejb Langfus’ manuscript, a “Dajan of Maków” enters the scene prior to the deportation to Auschwitz. Here a footnote states that this person was a judge of a rabbinical court who was probably assigned to the Sonderkommando after the selection (Czech et al. 1996, note 18, p. 98). Since the authors write about a different person, it is clear that this is not the same “Dajan.”

The “Dajan” was probably a figure typical of the fairy tales circulating in the camp.

4.1.8. Bennamia [Bennahmias] and Olleé [Olère]

These are said to have been two members of the Sonderkommando. Nyiszli never named Bennamia in his book, but in 1948 he put his name on the list of five inmates, three of whom testified “in front of the Nuremberg tribunal”:

“Bennamia Daniel, Athenian, Athens, rue Sokrates 8, stoker of Crematorium I.” (TVN)

This reference is rather enigmatic because, as far as is known, Daniel Ben-nahmias did not testify in the post-war period. His first public statement was an interview he granted in 1986. His testimony was collected in 1993 by Rebecca Camhi Fromer in her book The Holocaust Odyssey of Daniel Ben-nahmias, Sonderkommando (The University of Alabama Press, Tuscaloosa). It is not clear how Nyiszli became acquainted with the name “Bennamia” during the years 1946 through 1948.

David Oler (artist’s name Olère) arrived at Auschwitz on March 4, 1943 with a Jewish transport from Drancy, and was registered under number 106144. Czech informs us that “all male prisoners selected from this transport [100 people] are assigned to the Special Squad” (Czech 1997, p. 344; 1989, p. 430), which confirms once more that the story of the extermination of this group of prisoners every four months, as Nyiszli claimed, is untrue.

In his book, Nyiszli speaks of a Parisian painter in the imaginary context of a message written by the Sonderkommando of Crematorium II destined for the outside world. It is an imaginary context because the message, presumably written on three sheets of parchment, was allegedly hidden inside a sofa manufactured in the non-existent carpentry shop of the crematorium:

"Even if we do not survive we will ensure that the world comes to know of the cruelty and banal wickedness, unimaginable to the human mind, of a people that holds itself to be superior.

A message must go out to the world from here! Perhaps it will be found sooner, perhaps later, after years. Even then it will proclaim their guilt. The 200 members of the Crematorium I Sonderkommando will sign the message in the consciousness of their approaching death. And the sofa bed will take it out to the world beyond the barbed wire, to Oberscharführer Mussfeld's apartment, for now, in Mannheim.

The message is completed. It exhaustively describes the horrors perpetrated here in the last few years. We name the executioners of those who perished here. We report the approximate number of the dead. We make known the method and instruments of extermination. The message is written on three large sheets of parchment. The Sonderkommando clerk, a painter from Paris, wrote it in beautiful characters, and to ensure that the writing would not fade, it was written on the model of old parchment scrolls with India ink. The fourth sheet contained the 200 signatures of the Kommando. The parchment sheets were stitched together with fine silk thread. Rolled into a scroll, it was placed in a thin, cylinder-shaped metal canister made by one of our tinsmiths which was then soldered shut to make it air- and watertight. Our carpenters placed this case in the wool stuffing between the springs of the sofa.

Another such message with the same text and signatures, also in a soldered metal canister, was buried in the courtyard of Crematorium II." (End of Chapter XXI)

The Auschwitz Museum assures us that, between 1945 and 1980 at the ruins of the Birkenau crematoria, several manuscripts of the Sonderkommando were indeed found (Czech et al. 1996, p. 7), which were then translated and published, as far as was possible. The one mentioned by Nyiszli was never found.

Here I make a short side note on the purpose of these messages. At least in Nyiszli's case it is acknowledged that, in his fantastic story, there is a logic that is missing in the aforementioned manuscripts. In fact, as I pointed out in 1996, most striking about these manuscripts found after the war is a radical dissonance common to them all indiscriminately: These documents are said to have been written by members of the Sonderkommando for the historical record, in order to inform the world of the horrors of the Birkenau "death factory." But what do these documents contain? Sketches of the crematoria and gas chambers? Descriptions of the structure and operation of the gas chambers? Descriptions of the structure and operation of the cremation furnaces? The number of Zyklon-B cans used per gassing? Lists of the transports of Jews gassed? The number of people gassed? The number of corpses cremated? Lists containing the names of Sonderkommando members? Lists naming the SS men involved?

Nothing of that kind. Any information about gas chambers and gassings is so sparse and vague that it not only conveys no new information in this regard, but for any reader not acquainted with knowledge on the subject, these writings would actually be incomprehensible (Mattogno 1996, pp. 63-68).

As an example, I may add here that the “Lejb” manuscript, one of the longest, devotes 89(!) pages to the antecedents, followed by an account of the deportation train’s arrival at Auschwitz, a narration that goes on for almost eleven pages! (Czech et al. 1996, pp. 73-129)

Returning to Nyiszli, when he wrote his book, he was unfamiliar with the name Olère, and only as late as 1948 did he start using the distorted spelling Olleé. He described this person as follows:

Another presumed member of the Sonderkommando, Dov Paisikovic, speaks as follows of Olère:³³⁷

“Moreover a Jew from Paris called ‘Oler’ had been in the Sonderkommando already for a long time. He was an artist painter, and in the period when I know the Sonderkommando [since early May 1944], he had to paint paintings exclusively for SS men.”

In a subsequent statement (August 10, 1964) written in Polish, Paisikovic claimed to have met two Sonderkommando members from France, “one of them was an artist, a painter, whose name was probably Oler. He did not know and did not understand the Polish language. He painted various paintings for the SS in the ‘dentists’ room.”³³⁸

Paisikovic’s statement not only stands in contrast to Nyiszli’s, but also to the themes of Olère’s paintings (see Klarsfeld 1989). It must be assumed that Olère did not testify during any trial, did not make any official deposition, did not write any report, but entrusted his testimony to some fifty paintings dealing with such vast and disparate themes that, if they represented real scenes, Olère would have been present everywhere in the camp. Actually, as I have shown elsewhere,³³⁹ Olère’s paintings are simple illustrations of the propaganda spread by the camp's resistance movement: visual propaganda instead of written propaganda.

The strange fact is that Paisikovic, like Nyiszli, was evacuated to Mauthausen, then to Melk, and finally released by the Americans from the Ebensee Camp,³⁴⁰ but the two never mentioned each other. However, while Nyiszli claims that, on the day of the evacuation, only four members of the Sonderkommando were still alive – he and his three assistants – Paisikovic asserted:³³⁷

“82 prisoners of the Sonderkommando – including us of the Sonderkommando of Crematorium II – survived until the evacuation of Auschwitz. On evacuation, on January 18, 1945, disorganization already reigned among the SS.”

4.1.9. Rottenführer Holländer, Eindenmüller, Dr. Klein

Rottenführer Holländer and Rottenführer Eindenmüller are mentioned by Nyiszli in his Chapter XXIV, together with Oberscharführer Seit (recte: Seitz). Holländer is mentioned only by Nyiszli (and plagiarized by Filip Müller). It is unknown whether he ever existed. Eindenmüller appears in the card file of Auschwitz SS members, but his deployment to the crematoria is likewise only claimed by Nyiszli and, in his wake, by Müller.³⁴¹

Nyiszli states that “Dr. Klein, SS Surgeon-Major,” was still in Birkenau on January 1, 1945 (Chapter XXXVII). Since that is New Years Day, getting that date wrong is quite unlikely. Dr. Fritz Klein, however, was merely an SS Untersturmführer (lieutenant, the rank of a major corresponded to Sturmbannführer), and he was transferred to the Neuengamme Camp on December 15, 1944 (Phillips 1949, p. 717).

4.1.10. Mengele

Nyiszli attributes three types of crimes to Dr. Mengele:

- 1) selection at the ramp,
- 2) research on twins with killing the individuals studied,
- 3) research on the degeneration of the “Jewish race.”

The crimes of the first type evidently concern selections for the “gas chambers.” Here, Nyiszli's statements are false and unfounded even from an orthodox point of view:

³⁴¹ Piper 2000, “List of SS Men Employed Directly in the Gas Chambers and Crematoria,” pp. 235f.

"One after another, the Hungarian Jewish transports arrive at the ramp. It often happens that two trains will arrive together and pour forth from their insides thousands of people.

What Dr. Mengele does at the ramp cannot even be called selection anymore. His arm moves in only one direction. To the left! Entire trains thus go, without remainder, into the gas chambers or onto the pyres." (Chapter XIV)

As I pointed out earlier, no less than 107,200 Hungarian Jews were either registered or sent to the Birkenau transit camp, and no significant Holocaust historian asserts that entire transports were exterminated.

Nyiszli claims that Mengele studied "phenomena such as none will ever decipher, the cause of multiple births" (Chapter XXX), and in Chapter VIII, he points out that the immediate purpose was "the multiplication of the German race! The end goal, in turn, is that there should be enough Germans to replace the Czech, Hungarian, Polish and Dutch peoples, condemned to extermination, in the areas inhabited by these peoples and now declared Lebensraum for the Third Reich."

This is a puerile and nonsensical accusation. This also applies to the alleged studies on the degeneration of the "Jewish race," which is not a National Socialist theory, but Nyiszli's pathetic invention. He claims:

"Just as race research is built upon a false theory, the idea of a superior race is pseudoscientific; so too is Dr. Mengele's twin-research work pseudoscientific and based on a false theory. False as well, and leading to massacre here, is the degenerative theory of dwarves and cripples with which they hope to prove the inferiority of the Jewish race." (Chapter XIX)

According to this theory,

"the Jewish people, which, despite counting six thousand years of history, has had no right to exist for centuries now, because in the course of their thousands of years of existence they have degenerated into dwarves and cripples." (Chapter XIX)

Mengele was not "a race biologist" (Chapter XV), but an anthropologist. His duties at Auschwitz were summarized by the SS garrison physician Dr. Wirths in an "Evaluation of SS Hauptsturmführer (of the reserve) Dr. Josef Mengele born on March 16, 1911" dated 19 August 1944:³⁴²

*"SS Hauptsturmführer Dr. Josef Mengele serves his duty at the office of the SS garrison physician Auschwitz, since May 30, 1943 [...]
During his activities at Auschwitz Concentration Camp, he has applied his knowledge practically and theoretically as a camp doctor during the fight against severe epidemics. With circumspection, perseverance and vigor, he has fulfilled all the tasks assigned to him often under the most difficult conditions to the complete satisfaction of his superiors and has shown himself capa-* ble of coping with every situation. In addition, as an anthropologist, he has eagerly used the short time off-duty at his disposal to educate himself, and has made a valuable contribution with his work by evaluating the scientific material of anthropological science made accessible to him by his office. His achievements are therefore to be described as excellent. [...]

³⁴² Kubica 1997, pp. 414f.; subsequent page numbers from there, unless otherwise stated.

In the most conscientious fulfillment of his duty as a physician, he contracted typhus during the combat against epidemics in Auschwitz. Due to his special achievements, he was awarded the War Merit Cross II. Cl[ass]. w/Sw[ords].

In addition to his medical knowledge, Dr. M[engele]. has special knowledge as an anthropologist. He appears to be suitable for any other assignment and also for the next higher assignment."

From this document it appears that Mengele's main job was camp physician, and as such he distinguished himself in the fight against epidemics. He performed his activity as an anthropologist in his spare time (!), hence without a specific superior directive.

From the documents on Mengele reproduced by Kubica in the article mentioned earlier, it is evident that he performed his anthropological activity only in vivo, as Nyiszli would say, namely research in the areas of anthropometry (pp. 388, 393) and clinical psychiatry (p. 392). The documentation also includes analyses of x-ray images, urine and blood samples taken from inmates (pp. 394f.), a clinical record (pp. 398f.), as well as patient charts with temperature curves (pp. 400-402). He was also involved in research on the noma epidemic raging in the Gypsy camp, as is demonstrated by him sending the head of a 12-year-old boy to the Hygienic-Bacteriological Research Institute of the Waffen SS Southeast (Hygienisch-Bakteriologische Untersuchungsstelle der Waffen-SS, Südost) for histological examination (p. 394). The sender was the "Inmate Infirmary Gypsy Camp Auschwitz II, BIle" ("Häftlingskrankenbau Zigeunerlager Auschwitz II, BIle"). Noma, which spread among the children in this camp sector, is a disease that develops in the mouth and destroys the face, which is why it is also called noma facies.

Nyiszli paints Mengele as an omnipotent character who could order the "gassing" of entire sectors of the Birkenau Camp, as in the case of Sector BIle:

"Dr. Mengele rises from his seat and, as if he has just made up his mind on the question, he says to Dr. Thilo: 'I am no longer in a position to feed the debilitated residents of Camp C who are not working. I will liquidate them within two weeks!'" (Chapter XXVII)

"The camp's numbers had been reduced by ten thousand heads, and the K.Z. archives had been increased by one piece of paper. On the piece of paper stood a brief report: 'The section of Concentration Camp Auschwitz inhabited by Czechs, the so-called Czech camp, has been liquidated due to a high incidence of cases of petechial typhus!' Signed: Dr. Mengele, Hauptsturmführer, I. Lagerarzt." (Chapter XIV)

It is naïve and childish for any person to think that a mere Hauptsturmführer, hence captain, had the obligation to feed the detainees of an entire camp sector, and that he had the competence to kill them if he could not feed them.

Just as puerile is Nyiszli's claim that Mengele was "containing the spread of epidemic disease" by "gassing":

"Located next to the Czech camp is Camp C, the camp for Hungarian women; the number of its inhabitants often reaches 60,000, despite the transports transferred each day to more-distant camps. In this overcrowded camp it happened one day that the doctors found symptoms of scarlet fever among a few of the inhabitants of one of the barracks. On Dr. Mengele's orders, this barracks as well as the ones lying to its left and right were placed under lockdown. The barracks lockdown lasted from morning to evening, when trucks arrived and took the inhabitants of all three barracks to the crematorium. Such were the effective measures ordered by Dr. Mengele for containing the spread of epidemic disease.

The Czech camp and the three barracks of Camp C thus fell victim to Dr. Mengele's actions to contain the epidemic. Fortunately, the barracks doctors caught on in good time, and if an infectious disease raised its head anywhere, they were careful not to bring it to the attention of the SS medical authorities. If possible, they hid such patients in some out-of-the-way box in the barracks and cared for them according to the meager means available, but they did not refer them to the hospital because there the SS doctors check the patients every day, and the emergence of an infectious disease could bring on the complete liquidation of the patient's respective barracks, as well as 2-3 of the neighboring barracks. In the medical jargon of the SS, this method is known as broad-based epidemic containment. The result of an action is 1-2 truckloads of ashes." (Chapter XV)

It is unclear how the inmate physicians could conceal sick prisoners, if the dead had to be present also during the roll call, if we follow Nyiszli:

"If the barracks has any dead – there are 5 or 6 each day, sometimes as many as 10 – they too figure in the roll call. They must stand there at the end of the row, propped up on either side by a pair of prisoners, as long as the counting goes on, for dead or alive, the headcount must add up!" (Chapter III)

But this is not the issue. From extant documents it results undeniably that "containment of epidemics" was carried out with medical measures, and that patients suffering from infectious disease were regularly admitted to the inmate hospitals (see Mattogno 2016c, Chapters 2 to 4, pp. 42-85).

4.1.11. Was Nyiszli Jewish at all?

The question may seem like a bad joke, but Nyiszli's book contains many expressions that make it legitimate. At the beginning of Chapter VII, he writes:

“Within a few minutes, the doors are flung to one side and the wagons disgorge from within themselves the chosen people of Israel”

This observation has all the air of brutal sarcasm. In Chapter XII, he states:

“After all, in this time of racial laws, even in my civilian life, I was banned from the medical treatment of Christian, or rather, Aryan patients.” (My emphasis)

In his account in Chapter XXXI of the killing of the two deportees from Litzmannstadt, father and son, he makes another surprising statement:

“I ask them whether they want anything to eat. They are very hungry, they say. I tell one of the Sonderkommando to bring food for them. They immediately receive a plentiful portion of meat stew with macaroni. Only the Sonderkommando has such food. They immediately start in on it and greedily consume the fine food which they have not tasted for so long. They do not know, though I do, that they are consuming their death-house meal, their ‘last supper.’” (My emphasis)

“It is November 1, 1944, the Day of the Dead.” (Chapter XXXII)

The Jewish New Year (rosh ha-shanah) falls in the beginning of September yet is completely ignored by Nyiszli, who instead observes (Chapter XXXVII):

Precisely when claiming his affiliation to Judaism, Nyiszli denies it with a blatant blasphemy:

“What a horrible drama of our Jewish existence that I, a Jewish doctor, must examine them with precise clinical methods before they go to their deaths, and then dissect their still-warm bodies. I feel this horrible irony of our Jewish destiny with such passion that my nerves, in my impotence, are strained almost to the point of madness.

By whose will has this series of horrors descended upon our unfortunate people? Perhaps by God’s! He has long since hidden himself in shame, then, for even He did not will this much.” (Chapter XXXI; My emphasis)

It must be agreed that Nyiszli was really a Jew of his own class!

4.2. Dr. Charles Sigismund Bendel, Sonderkommando

4.2.1. A Professional Witness

Dr. Bendel can be seen as a kind of professional witness. He testified for the prosecution during the Belsen Trial (staged from September 17 to November 17, 1945),³⁴³ during which he was interrogated by Colonel Backhouse at the hearing on October 1, 1945 (Phillips 1949, pp. 130-135). On October 21, 1945, he also signed a declaration for this trial that was recorded as "Production N° 24",³⁴⁴ which later became Document NI-11390. Bendel then participated in the Tesch Trial (staged from March 1-8, 1946; United Nations... 1947, Vol. I), during which he was interrogated by Major Draper on the second day of the trial, March 2, 1946.³⁴⁵ In 1946, a statement by Bendel appeared in the book Témoignages sur Auschwitz (Testimonies on Auschwitz).³⁴⁶ On October 7, 1947, Bendel was questioned by police officer Pierre Berillet, who belonged to the National Security Directorate of the French Department for the Interior. This resulted in a protocol that was included in the files of the trial against the Auschwitz camp garrison (staged from November 25 to December 16, 1947; see Bendel 1947). Bendel also appeared as a witness for the prosecution during the I.G. Farben Trial on March 18, 1948 (see Bendel 1948).

4.2.2. Nyiszli and Mengele

Bendel was born in 1904 in Piatra, Romania, but moved to France where he was arrested on November 4, 1943 and interned in the Drancy camp. From there he was deported to Auschwitz on December 10, 1943. His name ("Bendel, Sigismund") is actually registered in the deportation list of Transport No. 64, which departed from Drancy on December 7, 1943. The transport included 1,000 people, of whom 267 men were enrolled in the camp on December 10 with numbers 167442-167708 (Bendel's number was 167460).³⁴⁷ According to his account, Bendel was sent directly to Monowitz, where he remained from December 10, 1943 to January 1, 1944, the day he was transferred to Auschwitz and assigned to Block 28, where he remained until February 26, 1944. The following day, he was sent to the Birkenau Gypsy camp and stayed there until June 1. On June 2, he was assigned to the Sonderkommando of the crematories as a physician. He held this position until January 17, 1945.

Within the framework of the present study, Bendel's testimony is particularly important because he claims to have been in a position where he would have been a colleague of Nyiszli. Hence, these two physicians were together

³⁴⁴ TNA. WO 309-1603.

³⁴⁵ The minutes were then classified as Document NI-11953. The initials "NI" (Nazi Industrialists) refer to the I.G. Farben Trial.

³⁴⁶ This declaration is headlined "Le Sonderkommando" and signed by "Dr. Paul Bendel, 167.460." Krewer et al. 1946, pp. 159-164.

³⁴⁷ Klarsfeld 1978, "Convoi N° 64 en date du 7 Decembre 1943" and "Liste alphabetique du convoi N° 64."

in the Sonderkommando since the beginning of July 1944 until the evacuation of the Auschwitz Camp, that is, roughly six and a half months.

Nevertheless, Bendel never mentioned Nyiszli in his numerous statements, although he did mention the presence of other physicians in the Sonderkommando (Krewer et al. 1946, p. 159):

"We were three doctors assigned to this task."

"Q. Dr. Bendel, you were the doctor in this sonderkommando [sic] in Auschwitz-Birkenau?"

A. I was one of the three doctors who were attached to this sonderkommando." (Bendel 1948, p. 9588)

He never mentioned the names of the other two doctors. Bendel even spoke of the dissection room, but in reference to the "twin Crematoria 1 and 2," which, "with their ultra-modern dissecting room and their museum of anatomical exhibits," were among the best ever done in this line (Krewer et al. 1946, p. 160).

For Nyiszli, however, only one such dissection room existed, that of Crematorium I (II in today's nomenclature), of which he was in charge, yet without any "museum of anatomical exhibits."

In this context, Bendel declared elsewhere (NI-11390, p. 7; Engl. version):

"Dr. Peter MENGLE [sic] was in charge of the medical side of the crematoriums and had a dissection room in one of them."

During the I.G. Farben Trial, Prosecutor Minskoff asked Bendel whether he wanted to make any additions or corrections to Document NI-11953, which had been filed by the prosecution as Exhibit No. 1811. Bendel replied that he had in front of him the German translation of this document, which contained a mistake in a sentence translated into English in the courtroom as follows:

"Did you ever see the Prussic acid gas which was used?"

I have seen the cans. I also dissected some of the corpses of people who were gassed." (Bendel 1948, p. 9587)

In the German version of this document, the translated exchange reads pretty much the same (NI-11953, p. 3; German translation):

"Q.[estion] Have you ever seen Prussic acid gas that was used?"

A.[nswer] I have seen the cans. I dissected some of the corpses of those people who had been gassed"

In the English translation of Bendel's deposition made during the Tesch Trial, the passage quoted above reads as follows (NI-11953, p. 2, English version):

"Q. Did you ever see this prussic acid gas which was being used?"

A. I have seen the tins. I have opened some of the bodies of those people who had been gassed."

Bendel explained (Bendel 1948, p. 9587):

"This is a mistake in translation, since I never said that I dissected any corpses. This was done by a special detail of doctors in the concentration camp crematorium. What I wanted to say is that I saw the empty containers after the gassing had taken place."

From this it seems to be clear that Bendel didn't know anything about Nyiszli and only very little about the dissection room inside Crematorium II at Birkenau.

Bendel testified in French, and his statements were translated into English; the English translation was in turn translated into German. If there was a translation mistake from French to English, it is a mystery how a sentence about empty cans seen after a gassing can turn into "I have opened some of the bodies of those people who had been gassed."

Like Nyiszli, Bendel was also chosen directly by Mengele:

"Question: In June, 1944, was your employment changed?"

Answer: Indeed it was changed. Dr. Mengele gave me the honour to attach me to the crematorium." (Phillips 1949, p. 131)

Asked about his duties as a Sonderkommando physician, he replied in a very imaginative way (ibid., p. 135):

"In case somebody had a wound amongst the people of the Sonderkommando. I remember one case, when one man was working, and he burned both his feet in the human, searing fat, which was so hot. It was my duty to give him a dressing."

Regarding his activity in the Gypsy camp, where he stayed for three months, Bendel was rather evasive. The general narrative is this (ibid., p. 131):

"On 1st January, 1944, I was transferred to the main camp, and on 27th February, 1944, into the gypsy camp in Birkenau, where I worked as a doctor. The senior doctor was called Dr. Mengele. He was in charge of the whole medical side of that camp, particularly infectious diseases in which Professor Epstein from Prague and myself assisted. Dr. Mengele engaged in the research of injections in the crematorium. These were injections which were supposed to produce instantaneous death, and in the gypsy camp he worked mainly on research tests against twins. He continued to make all sorts of tests on these twins, but it was not enough. He wanted to see them dead, to see what they looked like."

While confirming his working relationship with Dr. Epstein, Bendel knew nothing about the "experimental barracks" at the Gypsy camp, in which he is said to have worked as Epstein's assistant, if we follow Nyiszli. And it is clear that he knew only from hearsay about Dr. Mengele's alleged research activities.

As pointed out earlier, Nyiszli mentioned Bendel as a member of the Sonderkommando only in 1948, hence at the end of the long storyline of his six statements. Nyiszli probably had only indirect knowledge of this, because he introduced him as a “Sonderkommando physician of Crematorium I,” while Bendel claimed to have been active as a physician at all four crematoria.

Despite the alleged coexistence of Nyiszli and Bendel in the same place and at the same time, they not only knew nothing of each other but recounted what they had “seen” in a completely different way. Before comparing their statements, it is necessary to determine the degree of Bendel’s trustworthiness as a witness.

4.2.3. The Crematoria

On the history of the Birkenau crematoria, Bendel knew only what could be derived from the rumors circulating in the camp (Krewer et al. 1946, p. 161):

“The foundations of these imposing red-brick buildings were laid in March 1942. Thousands of prisoners worked on them and died in order to build them.”

As indicated earlier, Nyiszli amplified the tone of this rumor in his book by writing that “tens of thousands of prisoners [had] built these gigantic buildings” and that “Every stone in these buildings is stained with the blood of tens of thousands of unlucky Jewish deportees” (Chapter VI).

The date indicated by Bendel is incorrect; excavation works for the foundations of Crematorium II, the first of the four to be built, began on June 2, 1942 and ended in July (Mattogno/Deana 2015, p. 232), so the foundations of the building were not laid before August. Bendel added (Krewer et al. 1946, p. 161):

“Completed in January 1943, their inauguration was honored by the presence of Himmler in person [...]”

During the I.G. Farben Trial, Bendel told a variation of this fairy tale:

“An eye witness told me about the visit of Himmler, when the crematorium I and II [= II and III] were inaugurated. At that visit, as a special spectacle a thousand people were gassed who had been brought to Germany into the camp from France.” (Bendel 1948, p. 9609)

Crematorium II came into operation on February 20, 1943, but its “inauguration,” that is, the official hand-over procedure of the facility to the camp authorities, took place on March 31 (Mattogno/Deana 2015, pp. 237f.).

Czech states that this “special attraction” event took place on March 13, 1943, when a transport of 2,000 Jews from Krakow arrived. 484 men among them were admitted into the camp (reg. nos. 107990-108409), and so were 24 women (reg. nos. 38307-38330). The remaining 1,492 are said to have been gassed. This claim is based on Henryk Tauber’s testimony (Czech 1997, p. 352; 1989, p. 440). According to a list of transports clandestinely compiled by a group of inmates working in the camp’s Political Department under the supervision of Kazimierz Smoleń, the above-mentioned registration numbers were assigned on March 14, 1944 (NOKW-2824).

It is a well-known fact that, after the visit of July 17 and 18, 1942, Himmler never return to Auschwitz. It is just as well-known that Crematorium III's hand-over procedure (Übergabeverhandlung) took place separately on June 24, 1943 (Mattoigno/Deana 2015, p. 244).

Hence, Bendel accumulated a surprising number of errors in just a few lines: 1) Crematorium II was not inaugurated in January, but in March 1943; 2) Crematoria II and III were not inaugurated together; 3) Himmler did not attend the inauguration of any crematorium; 4) according to the orthodox narrative, the alleged gassing victims came from Poland rather than from France, and numbered almost 1,500 rather than a thousand.

Incredibly, this tale was repeated in its essentials by Walter Rosenberg aka Rudolf Vrba at the beginning of the 1960s. He even claimed to have been an eyewitness of this event (Vrba/Bestic 1963, pp. 15f.):

"Heinrich Himmler visited Auschwitz again in January, 1943. This time I was glad to see him arrive [...]. He was to watch the world's first conveyor belt killing, the inauguration of Commandant Hoess's brand new toy, his crematorium."

On that occasion, he said, "a special transport of 3,000 Polish Jews" was "gassed."

According to Bendel, Crematoria II and III had 16 cremation furnaces each with a capacity of 2,000 corpses per day, and Crematoria IV and V had eight furnaces each with a capacity of 1,000 corpses per day,³⁴⁸ resulting in a total of 6,000 corpses per day. Bendel copied this capacity from Alfred Wetzler's report that was published in November 1944 by the War Refugee Board, but, as will be seen later (Section 4.3.1.), Wetzler had claimed nine four-muffle furnaces each for Crematoria II and III, while Bendel claimed 16 furnaces (meaning muffles), which can be interpreted as five furnaces of three muffles each – the actual situation – plus the waste incinerator located in the chimney wing (Müllverbrennungsofen), which was not used for cremations. How Wetzler's 36 muffles could have had the same cremation capacity as Bendel's 16 muffles is a mystery.

Even for Bendel huge flames shot out of the crematorium chimneys:

"In the period from July – and particularly in that month, the smoke and flames rose up to about ten meters." (Bendel 1948, p. 9606), which, as I have already pointed out earlier, is utterly absurd as to the flames. Bendel reports another fantastic story circulating around the camp:

"At the time I entered the Sonderkommando, the throughput of these furnaces had been deemed insufficient, and they were replaced by three cremation pits, each 12 meters long, 6 meters wide and 1 m 50 deep. The capacity of these pits was formidable: a thousand people in an hour." (Emphasis in original; Krewer et al. 1946, p. 161)

Aerial photographs taken in 1944 never show three huge smoking sites in the Birkenau area, but always only one which was very small (see Mattogno 2016b), and the cremation capacity claimed by Bendel is absurd (see Mattogno/Kues/Graf, Vol. 2, Chapter 12).

Among the legends circulating inside the camp, the story of the crematoria's replacement by cremation pits was so widespread that it was even mentioned by Judge Jan Sehn (1946, p. 126):

"The experience of August 1944 of cremating corpses in pits proved that this was the most economical method, so the crematoria ceased their activity, and since then corpses were burnt only in pits, and according to the project, the [planned] sixth crematorium was based on the principle of burning corpses in open pits."

Bendel could not resist the temptation to tell another propaganda lie, that of the recovery of human fat. The capacity of the ditches, in his view,

"was further increased by breaking open a conduit to channel human fat to a recovery pit." (Krewer et al. 1946, p. 161)

As I have shown elsewhere (Mattogno 2014), this is arrant nonsense, because human fat has an ignition temperature of just 184°C,³⁴⁹ much lower than the ignition temperature of dry wood, which ranges between 325 and 350°C.

4.2.4. The "Gas Chambers"

Bendel gives a precise description of the crematoria's "gas chambers." I will deal with this in detail when comparing it with Nyiszli's description, since both witnesses claim to have seen them with their own eyes and at the same time. This also applies to their accounts of the Sonderkommando, whose comparison is even more surprising. Here I merely state that for Bendel Crematoria II and III each had 2 "gas chambers" measuring 10 m × 4 m or 10 m × 5 m and a height of 1.5 m, with a claimed capacity of 1,000 people each. Crematoria IV and V also had two "gas chambers" measuring 6 m × 3 m × 1.5 m, with a capacity of 500 people each.

This statement by itself should suffice to indict Bendel as a foolish impostor, because the premises he claims to have seen had completely different dimensions. I have already mentioned earlier that Morgue #1 – the alleged "gas chamber" of the Crematoria II and III – measured 30 m × 7 m × 2.41 m. Even if it was indeed divided into two rooms – a claim not supported by any document – this still would have resulted in two rooms measuring 15 m × 7 m ×

³⁴⁹ The lowest temperature at which fat emits sufficient vapor in air to cause ignition upon contact with a flame or spark.

2.41 m. During the I.G. Farben Trial, Bendel, harassed by a defense lawyer, tried to somehow circumvent the absurdities resulting from his claims (Bendel 1948, p. 9600):

"I can not give exact measurement of it. I just guessed that it was. I said 10 meters by 4 meters, and this is quite uncertain. I am not quite sure. It's just an estimate on my part."

Even if we accept this as an excuse for his grossly wrong estimates regarding the lengths and widths of the rooms, it cannot explain the height he gave, because here the quantitative question turns into a qualitative one: any person of medium height entering a room which is merely 1.5 m high has to bend over, while one has a space of some 70 centimeters above one's head in a room 2.4 meters high. How could anyone commit such an absurd error?

As for Crematoria IV and V, according to Franciszek Piper, each of them had four "gas chambers," all of different sizes, namely (Piper 2000, p. 162):

- Chamber 1: 7.72 m × 12.35 m
- Chamber 2: 8.40 m × 11.69 m
- Chamber 3: 3.70 m × ?
- Chamber 4: 3.70 m × ?

Chambers 3 and 4 resulted from an unequal division of a room originally measuring 3.70 m × 11.69 m. The height of all these chambers was 2.20 meters.

How can we reconcile Bendel's two "gas chambers" of 6 m × 3 m × 1.5 m with the four "gas chambers" of the aforementioned dimensions claimed by the orthodoxy? And here as well, how could it have been possible to mis-estimate a ceiling that was 2.20 meters from the floor as being merely 1.5 meters high?

Bendel was questioned about the absurdities resulting from his statements. His responses evince chutzpah and obtuseness. During the Tesch Trial, defense lawyer Dr. Otto Zippel cross-examined the witness as follows (NI-11953, p. 4):

"Q. You have said that the gas chambers were ten metres by four metres by one metre sixty centimetres: is that correct?"

A. Yes.

Q. Is it right that they are 64 cubic metres?"

A. I am not very certain. This is not my strong side.

Q. How is it possible to get a thousand people into a room of 64 cubic metres?"

A. This one must ask oneself. It can only be done by the German technique.

Q. Are you seriously suggesting that in a space of half a cubic metre you could put ten men?"

A. The four million people who were gassed in Auschwitz are the witnesses."

In terms of surface area, 1,000 people in a room measuring 10 m × 4 m (40 m²) correspond to a density of (1,000 ÷ 40 =) 25 people per square meter!

From this point of view, Bendel was a new Gerstein. But the absurdities do not end there. Bendel also stated (ibid., p. 2):

“Each chamber was 10 metres long and 4 metres wide. The people were herded in so tightly that there was no possibility even to put in one more. It was a great amusement for the SS to throw in children above the heads of those who were packed tightly into these rooms.”

In this interrogation, Bendel had stated that the “gas chambers” were “about 5ft 8ins” high (ibid.), or some 1.70 m, but, as seen above, he considered a height of 1.60 meters to be correct. In the statement of October 21, 1945, he explicitly stated that these rooms were “1 1/2 meters high” (NI-11390, p. 1).

But this makes little difference: whether the height was 1.5 m or 1.6 m, how could it be possible to hurl children over the heads of the people with such a low ceiling? As pointed out earlier, in order to enter these “gas chambers,” most victims would have had to bend over because the rooms were lower than the average height of a person.

For the “gas chambers” of Crematoria IV and V, the situation would have been even worse, because a room of $3\text{ m} \times 6\text{ m} \times 1.5\text{ m}$, hence 18 m^2 and 27 m^3 , is said to have contained 500 people, or on average nearly 28 people per square meter and 18.5 per cubic meter!

The only possible explanation – apart from calling Bendel a liar – is that the victims were Lilliputian Jews!

Despite this fantastic overcrowding of 28 people per square meter, the victims were surprisingly able to move around quietly (Phillips 1949, p. 132):

“One heard cries and shouts and they started to fight against each other, knocking on the walls.”

Bendel also said that

“anybody who has ever seen a gas chamber filled to the height of one and half metres with corpses will never forget it.” (Ibid.)

Regarding the height of the “gas chambers,” Bendel said on that occasion only that they “gave the impression that the roof was falling” on the heads of the victims (ibid.). If the ceiling was one and a half meters high, Bendel could not have seen that scene because there were no presumed “gas chambers” of that height. If, on the other hand, the ceiling was much higher, then this heap of corpses one and a half meters high would not have filled up this room, so it wouldn't have been a “gas chamber full of corpses.” But be that as it may, Bendel's statement is clearly false.

Although he claims to have served in all four Birkenau crematoria, Bendel describes the alleged gassing activity only with reference to Crematorium V.

He claims to have joined the Sonderkommando on June 2, 1944. He described his first day of work as follows (Krewer et al. 1946, pp. 161f.):

“One day in June 1944, at 6 o’clock in the morning, I join the day shift (150 men) of Crematorium 4. [...] It is midday when a long column of women, children, old men comes into the yard of the crematorium. These are people from the Lodz Ghetto.”

During the Belsen Trial, he stated in this regard:

“The first time I started work there was in August, 1944. No one was gassed on that occasion, but 150 political prisoners, Russians and Poles, were led one by one to the graves and there they were shot. Two days later, when I was attached to the day group, I saw a gas chamber in action. On that occasion it was the ghetto at Lodz – 80,000 people were gassed.” (Phillips 1949, p. 131)

Did Bendel start his work in June or in August? This contradiction is difficult to resolve, because both dates have their logic.

As I pointed out earlier, the first transport from the Lodz Ghetto arrived at Auschwitz on August 15, 1944, and eight others followed until the end of the month. Hence, if Bendel’s first day of activity was in August 1944 (exactly between 15 and 31), what did Bendel do as a member of the Sonderkommando between June 2 and mid-August? Since this is almost two and a half months, the question is more than justified. He, the Sonderkommando physician, never witnessed a “gassing” during this time? If, however, his first day at work was in June, he could not have seen any transport from the Lodz Ghetto. Here we have to deal with one of the many false statements by this witness. In addition, the number of claimed victims – 80,000 – is over the top, as I pointed out earlier.

In August 1944, according to Bendel, 150 Russian and Polish political prisoners were shot at the pits. The only reference to these nationalities appearing in the Auschwitz Kalendarium during the month concerned is the transfer of 750 Polish and Russian prisoners from Birkenau to the Neuengamme Camp on August 25 (Czech 1997, p. 696; 1989, p. 862).

Bendel’s statements are therefore false.

His first day at the Sonderkommando unfolded as follows. Bear in mind that we are talking about Crematorium V (Krewer et al. 1946, p. 162):

“Some hundred meters from the crematorium one sees white smoke emerging. [...] Finally, we arrive. Everyone is assigned to their work. Having come as a spectator, I try to satisfy my curiosity. I would like to know the origin of this smoke. And so, behind the crematorium, I get acquainted with the pits where some remains of the evening’s convoy were being consumed. A few meters from there, men are busy around heaps of ashes, busy reducing them into a very fine powder; that’s all that’s left of the three thousand people who had passed this way on the previous day.”

During the Belsen Trial, Bendel stated in this regard (Phillips 1949, p. 131):

"I came at seven o'clock in the morning^[350] with the others and saw white smoke still rising from the trenches, which indicated that a whole transport had been liquidated or finished off during the night. In Crematorium No. 4 the result which was achieved by burning was apparently not sufficient. The work was not going on quickly enough, so behind the crematorium they dug three large trenches 12 metres long and 6 metres wide."

The only area of the Birkenau Camp from which smoke emanates that can be seen on aerial photographs taken in 1944 is about 20 meters north of the northern wall of Crematorium V, hence it makes no sense to say that the smoke rose "Some hundred meters from the crematorium."

Only on this occasion did Bendel get "acquainted" with the pits, which means that until then he was unaware of their existence. This would make sense only if the scene took place in early June, but in that case, he could not have seen any convoy coming from the Lodz Ghetto.

The story of crushing the cremation remains had already been put into Rudolf Höss's mouth of by way of his "first statement":³⁵¹

"After cleaning out the pits, the remaining ashes were crushed. This happened on a cement slab where inmates pulverized the remaining bones with wooden pounders."

Where did this alleged crushing occur? David Olère located it inside Crematorium V in a drawing showing two inmates crushing bone residues with wooden pestles (Klarsfeld 1989, p. 77). Filip Müller, another prominent member of the Sonderkommando, placed it outside near Crematorium V instead, where "Moll had a concrete surface made of about 60 meters long and 15 wide" (Müller 1979a, p. 212).

Needless to say, there is no material or documentary trace of this large concrete surface. But let's turn back to Bendel's story. The transport from the Lodz Ghetto arrived at noon. Its 800-1,000 people undressed in the courtyard (Krewer et al. 1946, p. 162):

"The doors of the Krematorium opened, and they entered the big room which served as an undressing room in winter."

In this room, the victims were "packed together like sardines" (ibid.). The room in question is defined by Piper as an "undressing room" (Auskleide-raum) and measured 19.84 m × 12.35 m, some 245 square meters (Piper 2000, p. 168). If 1,000 people entered that room, their density would have been about four per square meter. If they were already "packed together" in there, what would have been the situation if they had entered in two groups of 500 people each of the two 18-square-meter rooms, resulting in a packing density of almost 28 people per square meter?

³⁵⁰ At 6 AM according to Krewer et al. 1946, p. 161.

Piper does not say that this “undressing room” was used only in winter. It is unclear why it should not have been used even in summer as well, and why the victims would then be forced to undress outdoors in the courtyard.

Meanwhile, the Zyklon B was brought (Krewer et al. 1946, p. 162):

However, according to the orthodox narrative, SS Untersturmführer Dr. Fritz Klein had nothing to do with the delivery of Zyklon B to the crematoria. Piper, in his list of doctors involved in selections and gassings, does not even mention him.³⁵² Bendel’s lie is probably tied to the fact that Dr. Klein was one of the defendants at the Belsen Trial, where he had been accused by various witnesses of having made selections for the “gas chambers.” In his statement during that trial, Bendel claimed that “a doctor” came from the Red Cross ambulance without specifying who he was, but when replying to the question whether he had ever seen physicians at the crematoria, he replied:

“Yes, Dr. Klein on one occasion when gas was being brought by the Red Cross ambulance.” (Phillips 1949, p. 133)

Then, Bendel continued, “The doors of the undressing room are opened,” “on ouvrir les portes du vestiaire,” and the victims “enter the gas chamber” “entrent dans la chambre à gaz” (Krewer et al. 1946, p. 163), or “the door” opened and the crowd passed directly “into the gas chambers” (Phillips 1949, p. 132). For Bendel, the victims’ path was linear: courtyard → undressing room → gas chamber(s). However, the reality would have been different, as shown by Blueprint No. 2036 of January 11, 1943 (Pressac 1989, p. 399) and by the modified blueprint presented by Piper (see Document 20). According to this, access to the great hall of Crematorium V – the alleged undressing room – was possible either from the furnace room through an air lock (Schleuse), or from the main entrance through a vestibule (Vorraum). From there, a door of 180 cm × 205 cm led to the “undressing room,” while an opposite door of 100 cm × 205 cm provided access to “gas chamber” no. 4, from which one entered the other three. It is evident that Bendel knew nothing of any of this.

Bendel claimed that, in Crematoria IV and V, Zyklon B was inserted into the “gas chambers” “through small windows in the wall” (NI-11390, p. 2), which basically agrees with the orthodox narrative (there were eight small openings located on three separate walls). However, although Bendel claimed to have been a spectator of the “gassing” he described, he did not make the slightest mention of the actual introduction of Zyklon B, which would have encountered insurmountable difficulties (see Mattogno 2019, pp. 152f.). I will return later to his claimed details of the “gassing” procedure.

4.2.5. The Number of Victims

Bendel claimed that the number of Auschwitz victims was “More than four million” (NI-11953, p. 3). During the I.G. Farben Trial, he was asked the following question by a defense lawyer (Bendel 1948, pp. 9600f.):

“But how do you know that 4,000,000 people were gassed in Auschwitz?”

Bendel answered arrogantly:

“First of all, there is the source of the indictment before the International Military Tribunal. In the second place, my personal experience. In a certain period of time I witnessed the killing of hundreds of thousands of people who passed through the gas chambers of the crematoria. No doubt, these people are not able to testify now. Their ashes are now in the River Vistula.”

In the indictment of said Tribunal we read (IMT, Vol. 1, p. 47):

“About 1,500,000 persons were exterminated in Maidanek [sic] and about 4,000,000 persons were exterminated in Auschwitz, among whom were citizens of Poland, the U.S.S.R., the United States of America, Great Britain, Czechoslovakia, France, and other countries.”

It is well-known that these are propaganda figures which over time have been drastically reduced by mainstream historiography: by 72.5% in the case of Auschwitz, and by a whopping 95% in the case of Majdanek! The official Auschwitz death toll currently stands at about 1,100,000 (Piper 1993, p. 202), and that of Majdanek at 74,000 (Kranz 2007, pp. 61f.).

On the other hand, and in contrast to this, Bendel defined Birkenau as “the tomb of hundreds of thousands of victims brought from all over Europe” (Krewer et al. 1946, p. 160) rather than millions of victims.

As for his “personal experience,” Bendel provided imaginative and conflicting data. He affirmed (Bendel 1947, p. 210r):

“The exterminations at the Auschwitz Camp during my stay amount to 800,000-1,000,000.”

“Q. While you were at Birkenau, how many human beings were gassed in the crematoria?”

A. In Birkenau or in the crematoria during the time I was in the crematoria?

Q. During the whole time you were there at Birkenau.

A. About one million.” (NI-11953, p. 1)

He also provided a breakdown of the gassing victims for the months of greater activity:

“Within 2 and 1/2 months, 450,000 persons died.” (Bendel 1947, p. 210r)

"In May and June [1944] a total of 400,000 people were gassed, and in August about 100,000. In Sept. and Oct. the figures dropped to about 15,000 per month." (NI-11390, p. 4)

"Q. How many were gassed in May and June 1944?"

A. About 400,000.

Q. In August of 1944?"

A. From the 15th July to 1st September, 80,000." (NI-11953, p. 3)

Since Bendel always starts with May, the 450,000 victims "within two and a half months" refer to those who died from May until mid-July. He claimed moreover another 80,000 victims from July 15 to September 1, so that the total number of victims from May to August amounts to 530,000. However, he also states that there were some 400,000 victims during the months of May and June, plus 100,000 during August, hence 500,000 victims without July, which leaves 30,000 victims for that month. On the other hand, if there were 100,000 victims in August, it is not possible that the total for August plus half of July were 80,000. In further contradiction to this, Bendel asserted (ibid., p. 2):

"During the month of June the number of gassed was 25,000 every day."

But that figure corresponds to $(25,000 \times 30 =)$ 750,000 victims merely for the month of June! He evidently attributed to the whole month what rumors circulating in the camp attributed to a daily "record." Bendel paid tribute to this daily-record rumor himself in his French deposition (Bendel 1947, p. 210r):

"Always thanks to this method, on June 25, 1944, 26,000 bodies disappeared on that day."

As mentioned earlier, the "gassing" or cremation "record" was yet another one of the stereotypes of camp propaganda, which Jan Sehn embraced as well with some pertinent modifications (1946, p. 126):

"With all installations in full operation, the figure of 24,000 corpses cremated per day was reached in August 1944!"

Bendel stated moreover (NI-11390, p. 7):

"During the months of May and June of 1944 I estimate that a total of 400 tins of Zyklon per month were used for killing people."

According to Bendel, the relationship between the number of Zyklon-B cans used and the number of "gassing" victims was as follows:

"Two tins for one thousand persons; 25,000 per day; then we may say 50 tins per day." (NI-11953, p. 3)

This results in a need for $(50 \times 30 =)$ 1,500 cans for one month. Conversely, 400 cans would be enough for $(400 \div 2 \times 1,000 =)$ 200,000 "gassing" victims.

Ignoring the contradictions pointed out above, Bendel's statements represent a maximum of 560,000 victims from May to October 1944. Nevertheless, Bendel claimed that, during the time of his stay in Birkenau from February 27, 1944 to the evacuation of the camp, a million people were killed. Keep in mind that he entered the Sonderkommando on June 2, 1944, and that “the cremation furnaces worked until November 5, 1944” (Bendel 1947, p. 211), the date when mass exterminations are said to have ceased. For the period from February 27 to June 1, 1944, he could not have been a “witness” to any killing in the “gas chambers,” which is why the figure he claims is both contradictory and wrong even from an orthodox point of view. This is, of course, also true for May, when he was not yet a member of the Sonderkommando: if we take the only data provided by Bendel – 400 cans of Zyklon B with two cans per 1,000 victims – this results in 200,000 “gassing” victims for that month which he cannot possibly have “witnessed,” so that the total number of the victims whom he could have “witnessed” decreases to some 360,000.

But there are further complications, because the witness also asserted:

“I think the first experiments in gassing were carried out at Auschwitz in May or June of 1942.” (NI-11390, p. 6), which is in sharp contrast to the current orthodox narrative, according to which the first experiment is said to have taken place in September 1941, followed by other small-scale gassings in Crematorium I of the Auschwitz Main Camp from fall 1941 until fall 1942.

To make things worse, Bendel claimed that

Not putting too much weight on the individual figures Bendel gave, it is safe to say that he claimed some 530,000 gassing victims for the time starting in May 1944 until the claimed termination of the extermination program. In order to believe in the four-million-victim story, Bendel must therefore have believed that from the beginning of 1943 until May 1, 1944 (4,000,000 – 530,000 =) some three and a half million people were killed!

From his many testimonies it is also clear that Bendel had no knowledge of the activities at the alleged “Bunkers” of Birkenau in the years 1942-1943, which is at least surprising. As far as 1944 is concerned, it is more appropriate to examine his statements in parallel with those of Nyiszli, which I will do in Section 4.2.8.

4.2.6. Dental Gold

Another absurdity offered by Bendel relates to the amount of dental gold allegedly obtained from the corpses of the victims. The Germans feigned to despise gold, but (Krewer et al. 1946, p. 164):

“This did not prevent them from recovering from their victims – between the launch of the crematoria and the month of November [19]44, the date when they ceased to operate – seventeen tons of the precious yellow metal.”

He specified that this amount of gold had been extracted from four million corpses. At the Tesch Trial, the witness stated (NI-11953, p. 3):

“The National Socialist government said they did not care about gold; still they managed to get 17 tons of gold out of the four million bodies.”

Replying to a specific question by Dr. Zippel, Bendel stated that he referred to a metric ton (1,000 kg; ibid., p. 4).³⁵³ This assertion is nonsensical already for the fact that it relates to the fairy tale of four million victims. It is also in open contradiction to the information provided by the Auschwitz camp resistance referred to earlier, according to which 33.6 kg of gold were extracted from 100,000 corpses. For the phantom-like four million, this would correspond to 1,344 kg or 1.344 metric tons, almost 13 times less than what Bendel indicated.

4.2.7. Disinfestations with Zyklon B

During the Tesch Trial, the witnesses were cajoled to support the allegation that all or most of the Zyklon B supplied to Auschwitz was used for mass murder. The prosecution's position can be inferred well from, and was the opposite of, what Bruno Tesch's defense lawyer was trying to demonstrate, namely (United Nations... 1947, Vol. I, p. 96):

“that Tesch had no knowledge of the killing of human beings by means of Zyklon B; secondly, that Zyklon B was delivered only for normal purposes of disinfection and for medical reasons; thirdly, that parts of gas chambers were sold only for the purpose of exterminating vermin;”^[354] fourthly, that concentration camps got the gas only in amounts which were quite normal in relation to the number of inhabitants, and only for killing vermin; and fifthly, that instruction courses were held only according to the relevant laws and regulations, and again only for the purpose of teaching the method of exterminating vermin.”

The witnesses for the prosecution therefore had to support the exact opposite in order to refute these five points. Bendel focused on Points 2 and 4, namely on the alleged use of Zyklon B for the purpose of killing humans, and its allegedly disproportionate supply. The latter was already discussed earlier when dealing with the number of Zyklon-B cans used for the supposed mass extermination.

³⁵³ A U.S. short ton has 2,000 lbs or 907 kg.

³⁵⁴ This refers to the Zyklon-B-disinfestation devices using the Degesch circulation system supplied by Tesch. These were gas chambers with the standard dimensions of 4 m × 1.35 m × 1.90 m = about 10 m³. The Americans mistranslated the order for two of these devices submitted to the Tesch Company by the Gross-Rosen Camp, which is mentioned in a Tesch letter of August 25, 1941, as “delivery of circulation equipment for two extermination chambers of 10 cubic meters each”! NO-4345, NMT, Vol. V, p. 363. The German text says: “Lieferung der Kreislaufgeräte für zwei Entwesungskammern [disinfestation chambers] von je 10 cbm.”

Regarding Point 2, Bendel stated:³⁵⁵

“At Birkenaw [sic] the disinfesting^[356] of clothes was done by boiling them, there was no disinfestation by gas. I know that disinfesting of clothes at Auschwitz itself was done by use of a gas chambers [sic] which was also used for killing people. At Birkenaw the gas used for killing people was prussic acid, also called Zyklon B.”

Any reader of Pressac's first book on Auschwitz knows that two disinfestation facilities with shower rooms existed in Birkenau known as BW 5a and 5b, which each contained a Zyklon B “Gaskammer” (gas chamber). In 1943, the Zyklon-B disinfestation wing of BW5a was converted into two rooms with hot air disinfestation (Pressac 1989, pp. 53-62).

Bendel stated that the clothes of those gassed were brought to Auschwitz, where they were disinfested in a special room (although the interrogation protocol erroneously states “disinfected”; NI-11953, p. 3):

“Q. How large was the room and how much clothing was in it?”

A. It was a very little room. I know it because 200 men of my own Kommando were gassed in that room.

Q. What quantity of clothing was stored there?”

A. Clothing belonging to about five to six hundred people.

Q. When was disinfection of barracks and clothing carried out in that camp?”

A. During the whole period from 10th December 1943 until the 18th January 1945 I remember only one disinfection of barracks.”

The last statement was contradicted by Bendel himself.³⁵⁷

“Disinfesting^[358] of camp Tzigane, which is the name of one of the compounds at Birkenaw [sic], was done by Zyklon B also. I remember noticing the same empty tins after disinfesting as I saw at the crematorium. This disinfesting of barracks was done every 3 weeks by a special working party of SS. I think they used 2 or 3 tins of gas for each barrack.”

Bendel claimed to have personally seen the fumigation of one of these barracks with Zyklon B (Bendel 1948, p. 9599). During the Tesch Trial, he was asked whether in Auschwitz and Birkenau the disinfestation of clothing and barracks was carried out by means other than the Zyklon B. He replied (NI-11953, p. 3):

“A. It was done mainly by Lisoform. [...]”

A. Mainly by Lisoform. I remember only once having seen it done by gas.”

In this regard, defense lawyer Zippel confronted the witness during cross-examination, who answered mendaciously and impertinently (ibid., p. 4):

³⁵⁶ The transcript (NI-11390) reads here erroneously “disinfecting” and later “disinfectation” rather than “disinfestation.”

³⁵⁷ TNA, WO 309-1603. NI-11390, p. 5.

³⁵⁸ In transcript (NI-11390) “disinfecting.”

“Q. Is it known to you that Lisoform is a disinfectant only against germs, but not against insects in clothing?”

A. There was no disinfection intended, as these people brought into concentration camps were not brought there to be disinfected or kept clean or kept healthy, but to be disposed of.”

Considering that Bendel was a physician, his mendacity becomes evident. He played on the confusing similarity of the terms disinfection (against bacteria) versus disinfestation (against pests), and deliberately ignored the many registered detainees for whom disinfestation was of vital importance for controlling the typhus epidemics and other infectious diseases.

The fumigation chamber in which 200 men of the Sonderkommando are said to have been gassed was located in the so-called “Kanada I,” BW 28, the delousing and effects-storage barracks (Entlausungs- und Effektenbaracken). Bendel described it as follows:³⁵⁹

“At Auschwitz there was an underground gas chamber which was used principally for disinfestation purposes. It was about 12 metres long, 10 wide and about 1 1/2 metres high.”

The photos of this facility published by Pressac clearly show that this fumigation chamber was not located “underground” but on ground level, and that it was at least twice as high as Bendel claimed (1989, pp. 41-50, esp. Photos 7, 9 & 13). A “Listing of the disinfestation facilities, baths and disinfection systems installed in CC and PoW Camp Auschwitz” compiled on July 30, 1943 by civilian employee Rudolf Jähring, which also gives the “daily capacity (24 hrs)” of these devices, informs us that Kanada I had a fumigation chamber “for some 30,000 pieces of laundry, blankets, etc.” daily, and the chambers of BW 5a had a “daily capacity of 8,000 blankets.”³⁶⁰ For Bendel, however, the fumigation chamber of Kanada I had a daily capacity of 500-600 sets of clothing!

I will return to the issue of the alleged murder of 200 Sonderkommando members in that fumigation chamber later.

4.2.8. Nyiszli versus Bendel

Nyiszli and Bendel both claimed to have been the physician of the Sonderkommando and to have lived in Birkenau crematoria during the same period, from the beginning of July 1944 to the evacuation of the camp in January 1945. However, in their statements, they ignore each other, which is already a surprising fact. Since they claim to have been eyewitnesses of the same events and would have had the same experiences, their testimony should be largely, if not completely, similar. In this section, I will therefore present a comparison of their statements with regard to the most important issues.

4.2.8.1. The Crematoria

On the history of the crematoria, I have already elaborated earlier.

Nyiszli claims that Crematoria II and III had 15 single cremation furnaces with a capacity of 5,000 corpses per day, and that the total capacity of the four crematoria was 20,000 corpses per day, which indicates that in his eyes even Crematoria IV and V had 15 furnaces each with a capacity of 5,000 corpses per day. Bendel speaks of 16 furnaces in Crematoria II and III, with a capacity of 2,000 corpses a day, of eight furnaces in Crematoria IV and V, with a capacity of 1,000 corpses per day. The maximum capacity of the plants was 20,000 per day for Nyiszli, 6,000 per Bendel.

According to Nyiszli, killings with the shot of a 6-mm pistol into the back of the neck were also carried out in Crematorium II. Every night, he claimed, 70 to 80 camp inmates were killed that way (Chapter XXII). Bendel says instead (Bendel 1947, pp. 211, 211r.):

“However, I must point out that every day 150 to 200 Russian or Polish partisans were brought to us who had been condemned to death, and their execution consisted of a pistol shot into the back of the neck.”

According to Nyiszli, the gas chambers were moreover only used when there were more than 500 victims; otherwise they were shot instead:

“They perform liquidations by a shot to the back of the neck on such as have been selected out from the camp or who are sent from other camps here to the ‘rest camp,’ provided their number does not exceed five hundred! They liquidate them with a shot to the back of the neck because they resort to the large-scale operations of the gas chamber only for the elimination of larger crowds.” (Chapter XX)

Bendel says the limit was 300 (NI-11953, p. 2):

“up to the number of 300 they were shot; above the number they were gassed.”

4.2.8.2. The “Gas Chambers”

Dimensions

Nyiszli carefully describes only Crematorium II. Via 10-12 steps, he descended into a large room about 200 meters long (the “undressing room”), from where, through a two-leafed oak door, one got into the “gas chamber,” which had the same length (Chapter VII). For him, Crematoria II and III had only one gas chamber each.

For Bendel, these crematoria were equipped with two gas chambers each, the length of which was 10 meters.

The length of the alleged gas chamber (Morgue #1) was actually 30 meters, and that of the alleged undressing room (Morgue #2) was almost 50 meters.

Also, Morgue #2 did not directly lead into the gas chamber, but rather into a corridor some 5 meters long and 2 meters wide, which led, through a two-leafed door, into a vestibule (Vorraum), from where, again through a two-leafed door, one could access Morgue #1, which was arranged perpendicular to Morgue #2, see the illustration.

Bendel also mentions “massive double-winged oak doors,” but in relation to Crematorium V (Krewer et al. 1946, p. 163). In that building, however, all four doors leading into the alleged “gas chambers” had a single-leaf door of 100 cm × 205 cm according to Blueprint #2036.

Capacity

For Nyiszli, 3,000 persons in one single room, for Bendel 2,000 persons distributed in two rooms.

Method of Introducing Zyklon B

Nyiszli:

“In the center of the room, at a distance of thirty meters from each other, a number of columns stretch from the concrete floor to the ceiling. These are not support columns, but are rather quadrangular tinplate pipes, their sides pierced throughout with holes like a grill.” (Chapter VII)

In D45 he speaks explicitly of “four openings” for the introduction of Zyklon B.

Bendel (ibid., p. 161):

“At the center of these chambers, two latticed pipes that went down from the ceiling with an external valve served to emit the gas.”

Nyiszli therefore saw at least four columns, while Bendel saw only two.

Duration of the Gassing

For Nyiszli, the victims died either after 2-5 minutes (TVN), within 5 minutes (Chapter VII) or within 5-10 minutes (D45). A mechanical ventilation followed 20 minutes later:

Bendel claims the shortest time: 2 minutes. The following statements refer to Crematorium V:

“For two endless minutes, knocks against the walls are heard, screams that were no longer human. And then nothing. [...] Five minutes later, the doors are opened.” (ibid., p. 163)

“This [screams and knocks against the walls] went on for two minutes and then there was complete silence. Five minutes later the doors were opened, but it was impossible to go in for another twenty minutes.” (Phillips 1949, p. 132)

“For about two minutes one heard screaming and shouting and people knocking against the walls. This was no longer something human to hear. Then there was deadly silence. Twenty minutes later the doors were reopened.” (Bendel 1948, p. 9592)

I already noted earlier that, under the conditions described by the witnesses, execution times of five minutes or less are absurd, since it would have required the use of gigantic quantities of Zyklon B. Bendel knew nothing about the mechanical ventilation systems of the alleged “gas chambers” of Crematoria II and III or of the use of gas masks. He mentioned, however, a time of inaccessibility of twenty minutes with regard to the claimed “gas chambers” of Crematoria IV and V, which would have been utterly insufficient. Given the structure of these alleged “gas chambers,” which could be ventilated only by means of natural draft through merely three doors of 100 cm × 205 cm (one leading into the vestibule, the others to the outside) and seven tiny windows measuring 30 cm × 40 cm, access to these rooms without gas masks would have been possible at best after 20 hours of ventilation, as prescribed by the “Guidelines for the Use of Prussic Acid (Zyklon) for the Destruction of Vermin (Disinfestation)” (NI-9912).

The duration of 20 minutes was undoubtedly one of the many factoids that circulated in the camp.

Number of Victims

Nyiszli states that, during the months of May through July 1944, 550,000 Hungarian Jews were exterminated (PR). For Bendel, as seen earlier, 450,000 people died within two and a half months starting in May 1944. Since he claims 400,000 victims for May and June, the two and a half months refer to the deportation of the Hungarian Jews. (In fact, deportations from Hungary were carried out from May 14 to July 8.) As for the total figure, Nyiszli repeats in his book the tale of four million victims for the entire period the camp existed:

“Four million innocent people said farewell to their lives here with a last, painful glance, that they might then descend into their unmourned tomb.”
(Chapter XXXII)

His own experience, what he claims to have seen with his own eyes, however, amounts to two million instead:

“My eyes followed two million innocent people to the gas chambers, and I was witness to the horrors of the pyres.” (Epilogue)

Even in his contrived testimony for the I.G. Farben Trial, he wrote that “during the period of my imprisonment I was a witness to the death by gas of about 2 million people” (TVN). As stated earlier, Bendel claimed that during his stay in the camp some 800,000 to 1,000,000 people died at Auschwitz. This figure refers to the duration of the witness’s stay at Birkenau, hence from February 27, 1944 until January 1945, or more precisely until November 1944, when mass exterminations ceased. Nyiszli’s figure pertains to his term in the Sonderkommando, i.e. from the beginning of July 1944 until November 1944.

Dental Gold

Nyiszli mentions a daily quantity of 30-35 kg of dental gold. Since he claims that on average 22,000 people were gassed every day (TVN), on average some 1.5 g of gold were extracted from each person. Hence, from the four million victims, the yield would have been some 6,000 kg, or six metric tons. Bendel talks about 17 metric tons likewise extracted from four million victims.

The “Bunkers”

As mentioned earlier, Nyiszli knew nothing of “Bunker 2” (or, as it is sometimes called, “Bunker V” or “Bunker 2/V”), the alleged extermination installation consisting of 4 “gas chambers” which was a few hundred meters west of the Zentralsauna, outside the camp’s fence. For him, there was only “a long thatched house” consisting of only one room that served as an “undressing room” for the victims of shootings at the two outdoor pyres.

In contrast to that, Bendel stated (Bendel 1947, p. 210r):

“From May 15, 1944 on, a new gas chamber was set up outside the camp enclosure itself. This latter was installed in a farmhouse divided into two parts, in which the detainees were gassed. From that time on, the bodies coming from this chamber were no longer cremated in the cremation furnaces, except in Crematoria I and II [= II and III]. The bodies were placed in gigantic trenches, in which the cremation took place which was carried out as follows: among the bodies, gasoline-soaked logs were put in, and the fire was lit."

"There were four crematoria, the fifth, called Bunker, was nothing but a farmhouse converted into a gas chamber 'to serve the cause.'" (Krewer et al. 1946, p. 160)

For Nyiszli, there was therefore a farm cottage with only one room which was only used as a dressing room; for Bendel, there was a farm cottage with two rooms serving as "gas chambers."

Bendel's hint at the cremation trenches is not very clear. He does not say where these "gigantic trenches" were, nor how many there were. Furthermore, his phrase "the bodies coming from this chamber were no longer cremated in the cremation furnaces" is enigmatic, because "this chamber" should be the "bunker," but then it does not make sense to write that, "from that time on"—meaning May 15, 1944—the bodies resulting from it were no longer cremated in the crematoria's furnaces, because Bendel wrote that before that date "this chamber" had not yet been set up, so no bodies can have resulted from it prior to that date. Anyway, Bendel mentioned only three pits of 12 m × 6 m × 1.5 m located in the courtyard of Crematorium V (Phillips 1949, p. 131). While Nyiszli was unaware of the existence of these pits behind Crematorium V, Bendel knew nothing about the existence of the two shooting pits.

Since these are two "eyewitness" testimonies of two people who claim to have seen the same things in the same place and at the same time, this contradiction is irremediable. However, this does not stop orthodox Holocaust scholars from resolving it with a vulgar trick. J.-C. Pressac himself wrote generically, without explicit reference to Nyiszli (1993, p. 91):

"Toward the end of summer, when there was a lack of Zyklon B, inmates unfit for work of the convoys that were sent to Auschwitz were thrown directly into the cremation pits of Crematorium V and Bunker 2."

To back this up, he invoked the following deposition by Hermann Langbein made during the Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial (Langbein 1965, Vol. 1, p. 88):

"In 1944, living children were thrown into the big fires burning next to the crematoria. We heard about this in the Main Camp, and I told the garrison physician about it. Dr. Wirths did not want to believe me. He drove over to Birkenau in order to check it out. When I went to him for dictation the next day, he told me: 'It was an order by camp commander Höss that had been issued because there had no longer been enough gas.' Since then, Wirths believed everything I told him."

Langbein, who later became a famous Auschwitz scholar, was questioned by the Vienna police on August 8, 1945. In the respective protocol, we read, among other things:³⁶¹

"Of course, Grabner was present at the mass gassings of transports that arrived at Auschwitz. In the course of these transports, about 5,000,000 people were gassed. Grabner was also present at the mass liquidations of the Russians (during the first winter alone, 1,200,000 of them were killed)."

Langbein also testified during the Krakow trial against the Auschwitz camp garrison, where he declared during the 11th session:³⁶²

"When in the course of these poisonings and gassings the supply of Zyklon B gas did no longer suffice, Höss gave the order that from then on gassings would be carried out with the minimum quantity of this gas, as a result of which some victims merely lost their consciousness during the gassing and were brought alive to the crematorium. I also know that Höss, due to the lack of gas, had decreed that there be systems of pyres near the crematoria, and that children were to be burned alive there, that is, without prior gassing."

These macabre fables, circulated by the camp's resistance movement, were well-known to the detainees, as is evident, for example, by the statements of two witnesses made during the Nuremberg trial.

At the morning of January 28, 1946, Marie Claude Vaillant-Couturier testified:

"One night we were awakened by terrifying cries. And we discovered, on the following day, from the men working in the Sonderkommando – the 'Gas Kommando' – that on the preceding day, the gas supply having run out, they had thrown the children into the furnaces alive." (IMT, Vol. VI, p. 216)

Soon thereafter, on February 27, 1946, her "colleague" Severina Shmaglevskaya declared:

"At that time, when the greatest number of Jews were exterminated in the gas chambers, an order was issued that the children were to be thrown into the crematory ovens or the crematory ditches without previous asphyxiation with gas." (IMT, Vol. VIII, p. 319)

Already in 1945, a first testimony on that theme had been published in a pamphlet (Vaillant-Couturier 1945, pp. 20f.):

"The line of grandmothers walking in small steps, mothers pushing strollers, 12-year-old children holding the hands of even smaller children, were headed slowly toward a red brick building that had the inscription 'Baths.' There they undressed, then they were locked up completely naked in a large hall, and gas capsules were thrown through an opening in the ceiling. It was the same gas as the one used for disinfection of the blocks against lice. Apparently, five minutes had to be reckoned for women and three for men. Three quarters of an hour after the arrival of the train, huge flames were seen coming out of the cremation furnaces' chimneys. We knew that the people we had seen alive a short while earlier would be nothing but a little bit of ashes within a few minutes. Since the eight cremation furnaces were not enough for the job, the SS had large pits dug that were filled with dried branches soaked in a flammable liquid. It is in there where they tossed the corpses. The entire sky was illuminated by it. At a certain time, gas was missing, then they threw living children into the pits."

This is a beautiful collection of propaganda fables on which there is no need to dwell.

4.2.8.3. The "Sonderkommando"

The most striking contradictions between Nyiszli's and Bendel's story relate to the Sonderkommando. It should be noted first that, according to the chronology of his book, Nyiszli was assigned to the Sonderkommando in early June, which is also when Bendel claims to have been assigned to it. However, Nyiszli claims that his Sonderkommando was the twelfth in succession – the previous eleven ones allegedly having been killed to eliminate unwanted witnesses (see Chapters VI, XI, XIXf., XXVIII, XXIXf.), while Bendel claims that his was only the third (Krewer et al. 1946, p. 160):

"The Sonder[kommando] I was part of was the third with this name, the other two having been executed at intervals of a few months."

However, Bendel has also told the tale of the Sonderkommandos' periodic elimination after a few months (for Nyiszli every four months).

For Nyiszli, the Sonderkommando consisted of 860 inmates and 120 SS men, while there were 900 inmates and three SS men in each crematorium according to Bendel, but "without taking into account the guards" (ibid.), which is similar to Nyiszli's affirmation:

"In each crematorium the watch consists of three men." (Chapter XXIX)

The strength of the Sonderkommando adduced by the two witnesses, though slightly different, can be considered more or less accurate because, according to authentic wartime documents, it varied over time. On July 28, 1944, it consisted of 900 detainees and remained so until 9 August. On August 10, it dropped to 894, and the next day further down to 870. This figure remained unchanged until August 31, and is also reflected in the report dated September 7 (Mattoigno 2016b, pp. 141-150).

The starkest contradiction between the two testimonies concerns the Sonderkommando revolt and its final outcome. Bendel reported about it in great length as follows (Phillips 1949, pp. 133f.):

"– Do you remember 7th October, 1944?"

– Yes, it was the day when 500 of these Special Kommandos should have been going away because they were told to work somewhere else, but it was clear enough to us that they were going to their death. They did not want to go away. On that day 100 from this Special Kommando in Crematorium No. 1 [II] and 400 in Crematorium No. 3 [IV] were killed. In No. 3 they were killed one by one with a fatal shot in their neck from a gun. The other hundred were put in rows in lines of five and one single S.S. man passed by and gave them a shot in the neck. Kramer was Kommandant of the camp at the time and was present at these killings.

– Do you remember an occasion when four girls were hanged?

– Yes, in the women's compound in Auschwitz in Decembre, 1944. They were accused of passing on dynamite to us for the purpose of exploding the whole crematorium. They were working in a munition factory called 'Union.' It was a public hanging ordered by Hoessler, who was Lagerführer at Auschwitz. [...]

– On 7th October, 1944, is it not true that the crematorium was set on fire?

– We set fire to Crematorium No. 3. Five hundred people took part in this revolt. They had firearms in Crematorium No. 1, but because of a misunderstanding they could not be used, for the people of No. 1 Crematorium saw No. 3 burning too late.

– Do you know who was the Kommandant of the whole of Auschwitz on 7th October, 1944?

– I could not say.

– You said that a number of people from the Sonderkommando were shot. Was there any senior S.S. officier present?

– There were a number of S.S. present during these killings. A whole company of S.S. came specially from Auschwitz. I do not know about senior ranks, but the main killer was Rottenführer Barowski. [...]

– Were these explosives used during the attempted escape?

– No.”

Bendel carefully described this event in his subsequent statements:

“Of these 900 men, 200 were gassed on September 27, 1944. 500 were executed with a pistol shot into the back of the neck in front of my own eyes during a revolt unique in the annals of the concentration camp, which took place on October 7, 1944. [...] Seeing that sooner or later we would have suffered the fate of the wretches who had been exterminated, we had decided at Crematorium 4 to revolt. On October 8, at noon, 300 of us had to go to Gleiwitz on order of the Germans. We knew that, after the example of the 200 had been set, this was in fact about a new extermination. Then we attacked about twenty SS men who carried the lists. We did not know that there was a reinforcement company nearby. After we set the cremation furnace on fire, this company encircled us and reduced us to helplessness before the other detainees which were in the other crematoria had time to come to our rescue, as had been planned. As I have already told you, 500 men were executed with a pistol shot into the back of the neck, and I myself with my colleague, we poisoned ourselves. I was saved by the head of the crematorium, who carried me to the hospital together with my colleague, who unfortunately did not survive. We poisoned ourselves to prevent giving the Germans the pleasure to indulge themselves in stripping the poor wretches they made to lie on the ground, and killing them in the manner known to you. This brutal suppression was carried out by the aforementioned Hess [sic] and Kramer, who on their orders had a company of SS men from Auschwitz I and Birkenau. [...]

The cremation furnaces operated until November 5, 1944 with the 200 survivors of the Sonderkommando. On this date, these 200 men were employed in the destruction of these furnaces, the Germans not wanting to leave traces behind. This destruction took place until November 27, when we were brought back to the Birkenau Camp. In this camp, we were locked up in a block. Thirty of us were sent to Crematorium 4, which had not been destroyed, to incinerate the corpses of those who had died a natural death. The next day, 100 left for an unknown destination, and we lost all traces of them. The remaining 70 were used to destroy with dynamite the reinforced concrete foundation of the cremation furnaces. On January 18, 1945, the evacuation of Birkenau and Auschwitz took place. Towards this date, the Germans locked us up in a block, certainly with the intention of destroying us. The hectic pace of the departure certainly did not allow them to carry out their project. During our transfer to the Mathausen Camp [Mauthausen], some thirty people tried to escape. They were killed on the spot. Upon arriving at the camp, those who had been part of the Sonderkommando were ordered to present themselves immediately. Some obeyed this order (about a dozen), who were taken away, and we never heard of them again. The rest was scattered among the other detainees, and I know that some twenty died of exhaustion during our stay at the Ebensee Camp.” (Bendel 1947, pp. 210r, 211)

The killing of 200 Sonderkommando members on September 27, 1944 alleged by Bendel was completely unknown to Nyiszli. Bendel, as we have seen earlier, claimed that there was “an underground [fumigation] gas chamber” in Auschwitz and explicitly stated (NI-11390, p. 6):

“I know that on 27th Sept. 1944 200 men from the special prisoners’ squad which worked in the crematorium at Birkenau were taken to Auschwitz and gassed there. Then their bodies were brought back to Birkenau and burned there.”

However, at that point in time, the only gas chambers in existence at the Auschwitz Main Camp were fumigation chambers for clothes.

Pressac considered a similar statement by Henryk Tauber as “impossible,” because the Sonderkommando men, who are said to have been very familiar with the alleged homicidal “gas chambers” at Birkenau, never would have entered such a “gas chamber” voluntarily. Pressac concluded (1989, p. 498):

“This execution by gassing still remains to be proved.”

Pressac overlooked an even more important argument. He himself reported the testimony of a prisoner who had worked in the fumigation chamber at the Main Camp, at the so-called Kanada I clothes-storage area. This inmate, Josef Odi, described the gassing procedure as follows (1989, p. 41):

“Two prisoners put on gas masks and then went into the middle of the chamber with cans of Zyklon-B. One prisoner stood near the entrance and watched to see that the two prisoners in the middle of the room didn't poison themselves. Using special chisels, the two men opened the cans of Zyklon-B, poured it on the floor and withdrew rapidly, closing the gas-tight doors behind them.”

This would inevitably also have been the procedure for executing the 200 Sonderkommando men with Zyklon-B gas in that chamber, because that fumigation chamber had no windows or openings for introducing Zyklon B from the outside. Can anyone seriously believe that these men would have allowed any SS man to enter the gas chamber, open up some Zyklon-B cans, and spread their contents on the floor without reacting?

Czech gives an earlier date for this event – September 23, 1944 – but does not explicitly mention the fumigation chamber of Kanada I. She states that the 200 members of the Sonderkommando were taken to the Auschwitz Main Camp and “are led to a not very large building in which clothing and other goods are disinfected.” They were made drunk, and then “Zyklon B was thrown in through a window, which killed them” (1997, p. 716; 1989, pp. 886f.). This cannot refer to the Kanada I fumigation chamber, since it did not have any windows.

While the Sonderkommando initially had some 900 members, Bendel gives a number of 700 for October 7, 1944, while Nyiszli still has 860 members on October 6. Of these, 853 died before the evacuation of the Auschwitz Camp (as did 70 SS men), so that only seven members stayed alive: Nyiszli and his three assistants, an engineer, a chief stoker and a “Pipel.”

Bendel testified instead that of the 700 Sonderkommando members, 500 were killed and 200 remained alive until the evacuation of the Auschwitz Camp. He also claimed that the commander of the Birkenau Camp, Josef Kramer, whom Nyiszli never mentioned, was present during the executions. On the other hand, Bendel knows nothing of the escape of twelve Sonderkommando men during the revolt, who were caught again later (Chapter XXIX). The alleged shooter, Rottenführer Barowski, is an unknown character in orthodox Holocaust historiography.

Bendel said that neither the firearms nor the explosives smuggled into Crematorium II were used during the uprising. Nyiszli in his book asserted the exact opposite:

“The Sonderkommando has seized control of Crematorium I; it is shooting and launching hand grenades at the lines of SS mustering before the gate. [...]

A terrible explosion follows. Seven SS lie in their own blood, wounded or dead, the commander among them. The bottle was filled with ecrasite." (Chapter XXIX)

For Bendel, the cremation furnaces worked until November 5, 1944, operated by the 200 survivors of the Sonderkommando; for Nyiszli, after the extermination of the 12th Sonderkommando, a 13th was established, which initially consisted of 30 detainees, but was later increased to 460. The furnaces worked until November 16, because on the 17th came the order stop the killings. On that same day, the 13th Sonderkommando was eliminated, all except Nyiszli and his three assistants, that is.

If we follow Bendel instead, the 200 remaining Sonderkommando members began dismantling the crematoria on November 5, which they did until November 27, although Czech wrote that the preliminary work (dismantling of the technical equipment inside Crematorium II) began only on November 25 (1997, p. 754; 1989, p. 933).

On November 27, Bendel was locked up with his comrades in a block, where he remained until January 18, 1945. Nyiszli, on the other hand, spent the last days at Auschwitz inside Crematorium V.

Next, both were evacuated to Mauthausen. Here the anecdote of the SS soldiers walking among the detainees asking those to step forward who had been part of the Sonderkommando turns naive, if not to say fatuous: for Bendel, as quoted earlier, "Some obeyed this order (about a dozen)." These volunteer inmates must have been either demented or suicidal. Bendel mentioned the Ebensee Camp, and he evidently was also transferred there, just like Nyiszli, but the two did not meet, or at least they didn't mention it. Seen from their point of view, this is quite improbable, because both claimed to have been the only Sonderkommando physician who had been saved.

Bendel and his colleague ("avec mon collègue") – here he forgot that he had claimed to have had two colleagues: "We were three doctors assigned to this task" (Krewer et al. 1946, p. 159) – who poisoned themselves, although Bendel was saved by the crematorium Kapo, who took him to the hospital. Bendel's colleague died, so he was the only surviving physician (Bendel 1948, p. 9589):

"Q. And were you the only surviving of the doctors?"

A. Yes, unfortunately."

However, Nyiszli also claimed to have been the only surviving Sonderkommando physician, indeed the only one of the entire Sonderkommando! He had not poison himself but was saved by Dr. Mengele instead.

As we can see, the two so-called Sonderkommando physicians, who were assigned to this position only a few days apart from each other, who remained there until the evacuation of the camp, who saw the same places and witnessed the same events during same period of time, gave accounts of their alleged experiences which mutually contradict each other totally and insurmountably, and both are riddled with absurdities and blatant lies.

4.3. Gassings and Cremations at the Auschwitz Camp

4.3.1. The Defendants' Knowledge during the I.G. Farben Trial

As explained earlier, Nyiszli was summoned to the I.G. Farben Trial, but was not allowed to testify during the hearing. Given the extraordinary importance that was later attributed to his book, this fact is very strange. Provan's explanation that Nyiszli "was not called to the stand, presumably because he was only at Monowitz for about two weeks, and could provide little in the way of useful evidence" (Provan 2001, p. 29), is inconsistent for a simple reason: the prosecution also wanted to show that the IG-Farben Trust, as a 42.5% shareholder of the Degesch Company occupying five out of eleven positions on its board of directors, was responsible for the production and distribution of Zyklon B, which, according to the indictment, was used in Auschwitz for exterminations, and that the defendants were aware of that claimed fact. The prosecution's Documents Books contain the documents upon which the charges are based. On the one hand, they show perfectly what the prosecution's strategy was, and on the other hand, with what documents they were trying to prove their accusations.

Book No. 82³⁶³ summarizes the extermination charge as follows. The sentences underlined by me relate to propaganda themes that have long since been abandoned by the Holocaust orthodoxy:³⁶⁴

"The Auschwitz concentration camp was established for the main purpose of exterminating human beings. Life or death of the inmates depended solely upon their fitness for work. All who were considered fit to work were used as slave laborers; all who were not considered fit to work were exterminated in gas chambers and their bodies burned.

When the remainder of dead exceeded the the capacity of the specially constructed crematoria, the 'overflow' of human beings was burned in huge open bonfires. Here many victims were also burned alive. In Auschwitz alone, three to four million persons were exterminated, and another one-half million died from disease and starvation.

The decision between life and death of newly arrived inmates was made pursuant to a screening system which operated as follows: There were two SS doctors on duty to examine the incoming transports of prisoners. The prisoners would be marched by one of the doctors who would make spot decisions as they walked by. Those who appeared fit for work were sent into the camp. Others were sent immediately to the extermination chambers. Children of tender years were usually exterminated, since by the reason of their youth, most of them were considered unable to work. Steps were taken to conceal from the victims the fact that they were to be exterminated and it was represented to them that by going through the gas chambers they were only going through a bathing and delousing process. It took from three to fifteen minutes to kill the people in the death chamber, and when their screaming had stopped it was assumed they were dead. About a half hour later the doors were opened and the bodies removed, whereupon special commandos of the SS took off the rings and extracted the gold from the teeth of the corpses. The bodies were then cremated and after cremation, their ashes were used as fertilizer. In some instances, attempts were made to utilize the fat from the bodies of the victims in the commercial manufacture of soap."

This framework of the indictment was based on very few documents, which are summarized in the index with more or less emphasis depending on the importance attributed to them by the prosecution:

- NI-12207. The indictment of the Tesch Trial,³⁶⁵ which I have dealt with earlier.
- NI-034. The affidavit by Rudolf Höss of May 20, 1946:³⁶⁶

"Affidavit of Rudolf Hoess, SS Commandant at concentration camp Auschwitz. 'I was commandant of Auschwitz until 1 Dec. 1943 and I estimate that at least 2,500,000 victims were executed and exterminated there in gas chambers and crematories [...]"

Mass executions in gas chambers began during summer 1941 and lasted until fall 1944. I supervised personally the executions in Auschwitz until 1 Dec. 1943. After I had constructed the extermination buildings in Auschwitz, I used Cyclon B, a crystallized prussic acid, which was thrown into the death chambers through a small opening. [...]"

I assume with certainty that this firm knew the purpose of the use of Cyclon B delivered by it. This they would have to conclude from the fact that the gas for Auschwitz had been ordered continually and in great quantities, while for the other departments^[367] of SS troops, etc. orders were placed only once or in 6 month intervals. I cannot recall the exact quantities of Cyclon B which we received from Tesch and Stabenow; however I estimate at least 10,000 cans, that is, 10,000 kilos had been supplied by them in the course of 3 years. This figure is arrived at by computing the number of 2 1/2 million gassed people and the consumption of an average of 6 cans for every 1500 people."

³⁶⁶ Ibid., pp. 31-40; the extracts quoted are from the first three pages.

³⁶⁷ Curiously, here and in the German text the English term "departments" appears instead of the most-obvious German term "Abteilungen."

Here the propagandistic claims that have ended in the dustbins of history are of the death-toll figure of two and a half million gassing victims, of the beginning of mass exterminations in the summer of 1941, and of hydrogen cyanide “crystals.” The introduction of the Zyklon B occurred through “a small opening” – just one! – and the amount Höss “calculated” is only half the amount which Alfred Zaun, Tesch & Stabenow’s accountant, gave for the years 1942 and 1943 alone: 19,653.5 kg (Affidavit, Oct. 26, 1945, NI-11396). The calculation method is clearly made-up. The “dosage” of Zyklon B is also in contradiction to Bendel’s statement: 2 kg for 1,000 people, or 3 kg for 1,500 people.

– NO-2368 [NI-6190]: The statement by Friedrich Entress of April 14, 1947:

‘The new crematoria were built in such a manner that the complete process of liquidation could take place in one building. The prisoners were first taken into the undressing rooms and then into the gas chamber. The new gas chambers had properly constructed chutes [‘Schächte,’ shafts] through which the gas was let in and a modern ventilation system [‘Entlüftungsanlage,’ air-extraction system]. Adjacent to the gas chambers [‘Anschliessend an die Gaskammer,’ adjacent to the gas chamber] the crematoria [‘Verbrennungsöfen,’ cremation furnaces] were situated, so that the crematoria [‘Krematorien’] could carry out the liquidation of the prisoners in an assembly line manner (Laufendes Band).’”

The poor Dr. Entress knew nothing about the alleged extermination and tried to cobble together a story – and a bad one at this – using the little “information” he had learned during his imprisonment.

He had no idea that the two “farmhouses”, according to the claimed SS jargon, were to be called “Bunkers.” He claims that they had been remodeled by the Auschwitz Construction Office, but there is not the slightest documentary trace about them. The mainstream narrative has it that these buildings had two (Bunker 1) or even four gas chambers (Bunker 2), but for Dr. Entress their internal walls had been torn down to get one single room. They are said to have had two and eight doors, respectively, but for Entress there was only one. According to camp commander Höss, their capacity was 800 and 1,200 people, respectively, but just 300 for Entress. Only one barracks next to the gas chamber was used as an undressing room according to him, but star witness Szlama Dragon spoke of two barracks located 500 meters from “gas chamber no. 1” and two more some 150 meters from the “gas chamber no. 2” (see Mattogno 2016a, p. 74).

Entress had quite some recollections about the crematoria as well: the openings for introducing Zyklon B were “shafts,” of which he evidently knew neither the number nor the positions. A de-aeration system he claimed for the gas chamber existed only in “Morgue #2” (the supposed undressing room) of Crematoria II and III, while “Morgue #1” (the alleged “gas chamber”) had both an aeration and a de-aeration system, that is to say, two fans, one to draw in air, the other one to expel it. Finally, the cremation furnaces were not directly adjacent to the “gas chambers” in any of the Birkenau crematoria.

- NI-11957. Affidavit by R. Diels of October 5, 1945.³⁶⁹ The witness stated that the use of gas for extermination was known to everyone in Germany, and that in particular the IG-Farben executives were aware of it.
- NI-11954. The testimony by Perry [sic] Broad during the Tesch Trial on March 2, 1945 (pp. 50-62):

“Q. What was the name of the gas on the tins which you saw in Auschwitz?”

A. Zyklon B.

Q. At a rough estimate, what was the total number of people exterminated by gas while you were at Auschwitz and Birkenau?”

A. I would think 2,500,000 to 3,000,000.

Q. Who were these people who were being gassed?”

A. There were German deportees, then Jews from Belgium, Holland, France, the northern part of Italy, Czechoslovakia and Poland.

Q. How many people could be put into the crematoriums in any one operation? ...

A. In crematoriums 1 and 2, 3000 to 4000; in crematoriums 3 and 4, 2000; in 5 there was only a gas stove there – 800 to 1200.”

These insane statements need no further comment.

- NI-11710. This is the famous affidavit by Nyiszli (pp. 63-66) that was summarized with the following few lines:

*“Affidavit by Dr. Nikolae [sic] (a physician detained in Auschwitz). The witness describes the gassing of human beings with Cyclon B at Auschwitz-Bir-* kenau. Describes in detail the extermination process by means of gassing human beings, including the method, results and medical diagnosis."

The excerpts of the documents in the index served the public prosecutor's office to quickly and easily adduce the passages considered most significant. There was no excerpt for Nyiszli's affidavit, but only a brief summary, which indicates that this document was not considered of particular importance.

- NI-11862. The affidavit by Heinrich Schuster of October 13, 1947 (pp. 67-73). Even in this case there is a brief summary:

"Affidavit of Heinrich Schuster (medical orderly and inmate of concentration camp Auschwitz). Describes use of Cyclon B gas at Auschwitz, knowledge of civilian population about gassing, and provides figures on quantity of Cyclon B gas needed for disinfection."

The declaration contains well-known propaganda themes:

"The gas chambers in the crematoria were operated by a detachment of about 800-1,000 of the strongest inmates, selected personally by SS-Oberscharführer Moll, chief of this department. They were strictly isolated from the other inmates of the camp and billeted in the crematoria. In the course of time, the whole detachment was often liquidated on their way through the gas chamber.

Only one French doctor, who was with this detachment, remained alive. I got to know him better in October 1943 at Birkenau. When he came to pick up medicaments, he told me of his gruesome observations. I also learned from him that Cyklon B was used in the crematoria in the gas chambers serving the gassing of human beings."

According to one version of the tales of the time, which also appears in the account by Robert Lévy, the "French physician" was Dr. Bendel. It is not possible that Schuster knew him in Birkenau in October 1943, since Bendel was deported to Auschwitz only on December 10, 1943.

With regard to the alleged mass extermination in 1944, this witness's tale was pretty similar to that related by Nyiszli, apart from the numbers:

"From April 1944 until about mid-October 1944 the mass extermination took on such proportions (from 15 April on 3 - 4 trains with 50 cars each, crammed with people, arrived daily) that all 4 crematoria [together] were not large enough to burn the human beings who had already been gassed. Near crematoria III and IV, therefore, 2 gigantic funeral pyres were erected, on which mountains of gassed inmates were burned the whole time. The fire and smoke could be seen 20 kilometres away."

Notice the position of the two pyres and his ignorance of "Bunker 2" and its cremation pits. Finally, I report the following sentence only for curiosity's sake:

“About 150,000 Hungarian Jewesses were quartered in BIIB and BIIC, as well as BIII.”

- PS-3868. The affidavit by Rudolf Höss of April 5, 1946 (pp. 76-78). Of this document, the index extracted the following passages:

“Affidavit by Rudolf Höss, SS commandant of the Auschwitz Camp.

‘The ‘final solution’ of the Jewish question meant the complete extermination of all Jews in Europe. I was ordered to establish extermination facilities at Auschwitz in June 1941.’

‘The Camp Commandant at Tremblinka told me that he had liquidated 80,000 [persons] in the course of one-half year. He was principally concerned with liquidating all the Jews from the Warsaw Ghetto. He used monoxide gas and I did not think that his methods were very efficient. So when I set up the extermination building at Auschwitz, I used Cyclon B, which was a crystallized Prussic acid which we dropped into the death chamber from a small opening.’

‘Another improvement we made over Tremblinka was that we built our gas chambers to accommodate 2,000 people at one time, whereas at Tremblinka their 10 gas chambers only accommodated 200 people each.’”

It is nowadays an established fact that this tale is an accumulation of absurdities, beginning with the alleged extermination order of June 1941. This dating is so foolish that even the Holocaust orthodoxy had to admit it eventually (Orth 1999). Höss’s visit to Treblinka would have taken place prior to the start of mass exterminations at Auschwitz, hence “Probably it was in September 1941, but it may not have been until January 1942” (Bezwińska/Czech 1984, p. 114), while the Treblinka camp was opened only in July 1942. Höss even claimed that 80,000 Jews from the Warsaw Ghetto had already been murdered in Treblinka before his alleged visit there in September 1941 or January 1942, although the deportation of Jews from that ghetto didn’t start until July 1942!

The affidavit in question was written in English and was simply signed by Höss.³⁷⁰ It fully reflects the poor knowledge of Höss’s British interrogators at that time. This explains the extreme vagueness of the description: “the extermination building,” the “crystallized Prussic acid,” the “death chamber,” the “small opening,” the capacity of 2,000 people in “our gas chambers.” When Höss was extradited to Poland, he managed to “benefit” from the Polish interrogators’ far more detailed “knowledge” about Auschwitz, hence his tales lost their British nebulosity.³⁷¹

Further documents on the alleged extermination of the Jews at Auschwitz can be found in Document Book No. 83 and 89. The first contains Document NI-11953, which is Dr. Bendel's deposition of March 2, 1946 during the Tesch Trial,³⁷² which I discussed earlier.

Last but not least, Document Book No. 89 contains Document L-22,³⁷³ the report published in November 1944 by the War Refugee Board Report, consisting of the statements by five detainees who had escaped from Birkenau: Walter Rosenberg, who later assumed the name Rudolf Vrba, Alfred Wetzler (April 7, 1944), Czesław Mordowicz and Arnost Rosin (May 27, 1944), as well as Jerzy Wesolowski, alias Tabeau, known as a "Polish major" (November 19, 1943).

The document is summarized as follows:³⁷⁴

"The reports give figures concerning the size of the different transports which arrived in the Auschwitz and Birkenau concentration camps, with a breakdown according to nationalities and origin. The 'selections' for the gas chambers are described in detail as well as the actual gassing procedure with 'Zyklon.' It is mentioned that at the inauguration of the first crematorium in Mar. 1943 prominent guests from Berlin, both officers and civilians, were present and were shown through a special peephole in the gas chamber a 'program' consisting of gassing 8,000 Cracow Jews. Many details, e.g., concerning the camp hospitals, the work of concentration camp inmates for private industries, rough sketches of the camps and gas chambers give an all-around information to the public concerning the conditions in the two extermination camps."

Alfred Wetzler's report notoriously contains a detailed description of the alleged extermination facilities and procedures at Birkenau. I quote the passage concerning the inauguration of the first Birkenau crematorium:³⁷⁵

"At the end of February, 1943 a new modern crematorium and gassing plant was inaugurated at BIRKENAU. [...] Prominent guests from BERLIN were present at the inauguration of the first crematorium in March, 1943. The 'program' consisted of the gassing and burning of 8,000 Cracow Jews. The guests, both officers and civilians, were extremely satisfied with the results and the special peephole fitted into the door of the gas chamber was in constant use. They were lavish in their praise of this newly erected installation."

Leaving aside the contradiction regarding the inauguration month, the visit of important guests from Berlin is a fairy tale invented to give an irrelevant event of German history national importance: the "first crematorium" of Auschwitz-Birkenau was so significant for all of Germany and the Reich's government that eminent military and civilian personalities from Berlin were brought in to attend its inauguration! There is, of course, no trace of this in the documents.

³⁷⁵ From the original text: "The Extermination Camps of Auschwitz (Oswiecim) and Birkenau in Upper Silesia." FDRL, WRB, Box No. 6, pp. 12f.

As for the Jews of Krakow, according to Czech, the number of those allegedly gassed during that inauguration was not 8,000, but 1,492, as stated earlier.

Due to its claimed accuracy, Wetzler's description of the crematoria and "gas chambers" was a central element of the indictment during the I.G. Farben Trial:³⁷⁶

"At present there are four crematoria in operation at BIRKENAU, two large ones, I and II, and two smaller ones, III and IV. Those of type I and II consist of 3 parts, i.e.: (A) the furnace room; (B) the large hall; and (C) the gas chamber. A huge chimney rises from the furnace room around which are grouped nine furnaces, each having four openings.

Each opening can take three normal corpses at once and after an hour and a half the bodies are completely burned. This corresponds to a daily capacity of about 2,000 bodies. Next to this is a large 'reception hall' which is arranged so as to give the impression of the antechamber of a bathing establishment. It holds 2,000 people and apparently there is a similar waiting room on the floor below. From there a door and a few steps lead down into the very long and narrow gas chamber. The walls of this chamber are also camouflaged with simulated entries to shower rooms in order to mislead the victims.

This roof is fitted with three traps which can be hermetically closed from the outside. A track leads from the gas chamber to the furnace room. The gassing takes place as follows: the unfortunate victims are brought into hall (B) where they are told to undress. To complete the fiction that they are going to bathe, each person receives a towel and a small piece of soap issued by two men clad in white coats. They are then crowded into the gas chamber (C) in such numbers there is, of course, only standing room.

To compress this crowd into the narrow space, shots are often fired to induce those already at the far end to huddle still closer together. When everybody is inside, the heavy doors are closed. Then there is a short pause, presumably to allow the room temperature to rise to a certain level, after which SS men with gas masks climb on the roof, open the traps, and shake down a preparation in powder form out of tin cans labeled 'CYKLON' 'For use against vermin,' which is manufactured by a Hamburg concern.

It is presumed that this is a 'CYANIDE' mixture of some sort which turns into gas at a certain temperature. After three minutes everyone in the chamber is dead. No one is known to have survived this ordeal, although it was not uncommon to discover signs of life after the primitive measures employed in the Birch Wood.

The chamber is then opened, aired, and the 'special squad' carts the bodies on flat trucks to the furnace rooms where the burning takes place. Crematoria III and IV work on nearly the same principle, but their capacity is only half as large. Thus the total capacity of the four cremating and gassing plants at BIRKENAU amounts to about 6,000 daily."

³⁷⁶ Ibid., p. 13.

This description contradicts what Nyiszli had described in his book. What Nyiszli wrote there is also in sharp contrast to all the other, more important testimonies as collected in the case files, i.e., those by R. Höss, F. Entress, P. Broad and C.S. Bendel. This is most likely the reason why prosecutor Minskoff declined to have Nyiszli testify during the trial. This very rejection probably led Nyiszli, as a sort of childish revenge, to invent his own trial deposition which, however, never happened. One can certainly believe Nyiszli when he claims that he had brought a copy of his book to Nuremberg, but apparently it had the exact opposite effect of what he claimed:

"The prosecutor lifted a copy of my book from his desk.

'In that regard, the doctor's statement is also important because he put it in writing in a 1946 volume, thus submitting his experiences. We requested this copy from the author. Our experts have examined its data and, having compared them with the documents available during this trial for the past two years, regard it as documentary material because with its description it has shed light on hitherto still rather unknown details.'" (TVN)

Nyiszli's book was undoubtedly examined, but was found to be totally discordant with the material already collected by the prosecution, so it was not taken into account in any way, and Nyiszli was not admitted as a witness. His claim that the active ingredient in Zyklon B was chlorine, and the description of the invented gassing scenario based on this false assumption certainly did not make him trustworthy in the eyes of those who had extensive technical documentation of prime quality on Zyklon B.

Wetzler's report was a first attempt to put some order in the multifaceted and contrasting propaganda claims about the crematoria and "gas chambers" created by the resistance movement at Auschwitz, which consisted of various groups – Polish, French, Belgian, Russian, German, Czech, Slovakian, Yugoslavian – each of which had its own headquarters inventing and disseminating fake news.

In many regards, the narration contained in Wetzler's report is even more nonsensical than Nyiszli's. I limit myself to some essential observations.

According to the actual blueprints of the crematoria:

1. the furnace room was equipped with five triple-muffle furnaces (15 muffles total) rather than nine quadruple-muffle furnaces (36 muffles total);
2. each furnace had three rather than four muffles;
3. the furnaces were lined up in a straight line along the longitudinal axis of the furnaces room, rather than grouped together in a semi-circle around the chimney;
4. the room later labeled as the victims' undressing room (Morgue #2) was located in the basement rather than on the ground floor;

5. the room later labeled as gas chamber (Morgue #1) was not on the ground floor, a little lower than the undressing room, but rather in the basement, on the same level as the undressing room;
6. the room labeled as a gas chamber was connected to the furnaces room by an elevator rather than by rails.

According to the current mainstream Holocaust narrative:

7. the gas chamber is said to have had four openings to introduce Zyklon B rather than three;
8. the introduction shafts are said to have been closed with simple lids made of cement or wood which could not have sealed the shafts hermetically;
9. the story of the distribution of towels and a piece of soap is a fable;
10. the cremation capacity of a single muffle – three corpses within 90 minutes (30 min/corpse) – stands in contrast to the official one: two corpses within half an hour (15 min/corpse; Piper 2000, p. 164);
11. as blueprints show,³⁷⁷ Morgue #1 of Crematoria II and III, the alleged “gas chamber,” was partially underground; its roof was only 36 cm higher than the floor of the buildings’ ground floor. To this, we need to add several inches of soil lying on that roof. The introduction shafts themselves were only 40-50 cm high either, if we follow Pressac (1989, p. 475). Hence, it makes no sense to state that the SS men introducing the poison gas climbed onto the roof of the gas chamber.

From a technical point of view:

12. the claimed cremation capacity of 2,000 corpses within 24 hours for each of Crematorium II and III, and 1,000 for each of Crematorium IV and V, totaling 6,000 per day, is utterly absurd;
13. as pointed out earlier, the time it allegedly took for the victims to die – three minutes – is another absurdity parroted with small variations by many other witnesses, including Nyiszli himself.

Wetzler’s report is of paramount importance to the propaganda history of Auschwitz. Since both the report’s sketch and the description of Crematoria II and III are pure fantasy, it follows that Wetzler’s tale about the extermination of the Jews in homicidal gas chambers did not originate from members of the so-called Sonderkommando, but was in fact invented without their knowledge. This in turn proves that this tale was created by the camp’s resistance movement as atrocity propaganda without even a thought to consulting inmates working in the crematoria! Further proof for this is Filip Müller’s later claim that he had handed over to Alfred Wetzler in 1944, among other documents, “a plan of the crematorium with gas chambers” (“einen Plan der Krematorien mit den Gaskammern”; Müller 1979a, p. 193), which was obviously another shameless lie, because had he done so, Wetzler would have gotten it right to begin with.

4.3.2. The Stories of Hungarian Jews Deported to Auschwitz

In 1945, an important collection of testimonies by Hungarian Jews deported by the Germans appeared in Budapest. The book, edited by Béla Vihar, is titled The Yellow Book: Documents about the Martyrdom of Hungarian Jewry during the War 1941-1945. It also contains several “protocols” of interrogations of Jews who had been deported to Birkenau. The first is a statement by Henrik Farkas dated “February 24, 1942” (which evidently must be 1945) that deals with the Birkenau Camp and in particular with the “gas chamber.” The respective description is pretty much a mere translation of what appears in Wetzler’s report, and it even contains the following disclaimer:

“Here I report the technical description of the gas chamber by a Jewish engineer engaged in technical work based on his notes on the gas chamber.” (Vihar, pp. 64f.)

The German expression “Cyklon zur Schaedlingsbekaempfung” (Zyklon for pest control) and the term “Sonderkommando” clearly show that the translation was not based on the English text of the War Refugee Board, but on a German text, probably the one edited by Abraham Silberschein in 1944, in which identical expressions appear (on its p. 100). The capacity given for the large hall of just 200 people is clearly a mistake, as the number of those entering the gas chamber is given as 2,000. Even the duration of the execution until the victims’ demise – five minutes instead of three – is undoubtedly the result of a mistake (Vihar 1945, pp. 64f.).

Here we have to pay tribute to Alain Guionnet, who was the first scholar to draw attention to this Yellow Book (but also to the original Hungarian edition of Nyiszli’s book). In particular, he published a complete translation of Farkas’s testimony on Birkenau together with a comparative analysis with Wetzler’s report, which, to be honest, is not very convincing (Guionnet 1994, pp. 23-30).

Other ex-deportees also report about Auschwitz in the Yellow Book. József Sproncz (Vihar 1945, pp. 71-79, undated), among other things, reports that camp inmates received German newspapers such as the Völkischer Beobachter, the Oberschlesische Zeitung and the Krakauer Zeitung (ibid., pp 78f.). The first is also mentioned by Nyiszli, who may have taken the idea from this testimony. Although it is certainly possible that civilian workers who worked inside the Auschwitz-Birkenau camp complex passed newspapers to detainees – which in general was illegal – no one, as far as I know, explicitly mentioned the Völkischer Beobachter. Other ex-deportees spoke only of the general conditions inside the camp: Imre Reich,³⁷⁸ Imréné Kenész,³⁷⁹ Dénesné Szépvölgyi,³⁸⁰ Géza Klein,³⁸¹ Jenő Vámosi,³⁸² who also referred to the “rebellion in the crematorium,” which, according to him, took place “in September 1944.”³⁸³ The latest testimony is that of Károly Klein, written down on July 12, 1945 (ibid., p. 152). Among the promoters of the book was also the “Assistance Committee of Deported Hungarian Jews” (Magyarországi Zsidók Deportáltakat Gondozó Bizottság), the same organization mentioned by Robert Jay Lifton in relation to a testimony by a certain “Miklós Nyírfi” of July 28, 1945. It is unknown why this testimony was not included in the book. Chronological reasons are possible but unlikely, since the book contains a statement of a couple of weeks earlier.

A “Report by the Hungarian physician Dr. Gyula Gál. Budapest,” dated March 22, 1945 and written in German on request of the Soviets, contains a long story about Birkenau. Being destined for the Soviets, the witness claimed as follows:

“At this place, the Germans exterminated roughly 5 million people, 3 1/2 million Jews and roughly 1 1/2 Million Poles and Russians.”

The gassing of the victims took place in a “gas barracks” (Gasbaracke), in this way:

“400 people at one time were brought into a room with showers, which therefore resembled a bathroom. At first, they even gave these unfortunates soaps and towels, allegedly in order to wash themselves. When all were inside, the hermetically closing doors were locked, and Zyklon B, a powder full of cyanide – the product of a Hamburg firm – was poured out over them. This powder caused death within two minutes.”

There were eight dentists who tore gold teeth out of the corpses, then the corpses were taken to the crematorium, “where they were cremated within two hours.” Furthermore we read:³⁸⁴

“This method was used in particular when the crematorium, scheduled for this respective extermination of 15,000 people could not keep up with the work, i.e. when more than 15,000 were to be killed. That was mostly the case when new victims came in large quantities from Hungary and Poland.”

The DEGOB website contains a vast collection of testimonies on Auschwitz, including the one by Nyiszli, both a scan of the original and a translation into English. Though the number of testimonies is substantial (3,523 testimonies by 4,838 individuals, since some statements were authored by several wit-

[...] The oft-mentioned Mengele's favourite hobby was research in genetic inheritance; therefore he treated twins with special attention. Amongst the Gipsy children, there were also three pairs of twins, one in the hospital and two pairs in the kindergarten of the camp. In the morning of the 2nd of August 1944, Dr Mengele entrusted these children to the head doctor of the Gipsy barrack, Dr Rabinovits, and came to fetch them personally by car in the evening. Three days later, Mengele arrived in the hospital pretty upset and looked for the doctor responsible for the Gipsy children. He rapped him over the knuckles for not examining patients with attention, not caring about them, he claimed that doctors were interested only in extra food rations, and threatened them with severe reprisals because they had not noticed or registered on the card the easily recognisable symptoms of tuberculosis of one of the twins. As an answer to the question how this had been known, which was raised by the reproached doctor, Mengele produced with a matter-of-fact gesture a necropsy record, in which the results of a technically perfect autopsy were proficiently presented regarding the little child, who had been evidently killed earlier by gas. (When our transport arrived Mengele's first question was whether there was a pathologist among us, and he kept repeating the same question till he found the pathologist of the public hospital of Szombathely, Dr Dénes Görög.) Basing my opinion on the two or three very short conversations that I had the opportunity to have with Mengele, I join the general opinion of the hospital's doctors that Mengele had in fact neurotic disorders. Presumably spotted fever caused him maniac [sic] depression, and his obsession was to realise eugenic selections, which had been known on a theoretical level already for a long time. After the more or less six-week service in hospital, I became the Vertreter (second commander) of one of the blocks, and as such, I was in charge of around six hundred 14 to 18-year-old boys. In the first days of September, Mengele did selections among these boys and sorted out around 60 percentage [sic] of them, and closed them in a separate block. I do not know what happened to them in the end, because in the meantime I also left Birkenau, but I am convinced that they finished in the crematorium as well. In the middle of September, I arrived in Mauthausen with a transport of around 2,000 people.”

It is remarkable that this former Jewish deportee from Hungary, evidently a medical student who even knew Dr. Dénes Görög, obviously did not know anything about Nyiszli and was unaware of Mengele's alleged criminal experiments, specifically the claimed chloroform injections into the hearts of the victims.

Part 5:

Nyiszli's Statements

in the Orthodox

Holocaust Narrative

5.1. The Quotation Cherry Pickers

From the beginning, the nascent historiography of the Holocaust considered testimonies about the gas chambers not as objects of history which themselves required examination and verification, but as history itself. No one considered the problem that any or all parts of these testimonies could be, at their core, false or simply unreliable, and no one, with the sole exception of Jean-Claude Pressac,³⁸⁶ bothered to analyze or evaluate them as a whole. Instead, the testimonies were broken into pieces, extracted from context and utilized in a fragmentary way to compose a mosaic of “historical reconstruction” whose tesserae, though apparently congruous and complementary, in reality belonged to different, conflicting pictures. Without doubt the founding father of this “method” was Gerald Reitlinger. In his laconic description of the presumed extermination procedure in the “gas chambers” of Auschwitz, he juxtaposes extracts from the statements of “eyewitnesses” – Ada Bimko, Miklós Nyiszli, Charles Sigismund Bendel – which are transparently false and mutually contradictory (Reitlinger 1953, pp. 150-152):

“A letter from Messrs. Toepf [sic] to Bischoff, dated February 12th, 1943, shows that in each crematorium there were five three-door furnaces with mechanical stokers, ash tips [recte: pits], and corpse lifts, but in the two larger crematoria the gas chambers were on the same level as the furnaces to which the corpses were run on the rail-wagon seen and described by Dr. Ada Bimko. The underground gas chambers of the smaller crematoria were approached by a subway, gently graded, down which Dr. Nyiszli saw fathers of families pushing perambulators.

The aspect of the buildings, according to Dr. Nyiszli, who lived in one of them for six months, was not unfriendly, in spite of the chimneys, so ominously big for a mere bath house. [...]

Slowly the gas escaped from the perforations in the sheet-metal columns. Generally the victims would be too tightly packed to notice this at first, but at other times they would be few enough to sit in comfort, gazing up at the douches, from which no water came, or at the floor which, strange to say, had no drainage runnels. [...]

Twenty-five minutes later, the ‘exhauster’ electric pumps removed the gas-laden air, the great metal door slid open, and the men of the Jewish Sonderkommando entered, wearing gas masks and gum boots and carrying hoses, for their first task was to remove the blood and defecation before dragging the clawing dead apart with nooses and hooks, the prelude to the ghastly search for gold and the removal of the dentures and hair which were regarded by the Germans as strategic materials. Then the journey by lift or rail-wagon to the furnaces, the mill that ground the clinker to fine ash, and the lorry that scattered the ashes in the stream of the Sola. [...] I quote Dr. Bendel, as he gave his evidence at Lueneburg:

'Now a real hell begins. The Sonderkommando tries to work as fast as possible. In frenzied haste they drag the corpses by the wrists. They look like devils. People who had human faces before, I no longer recognize. A barrister from Salonika, an electrical engineer from Budapest – they are no longer human beings, because, even as they work, blows from sticks and rubber truncheons are showered on them. All the time this is going on, people are being shot in front of the ditches, people who could not be got into the gas chambers because they were overcrowded. After an hour-and-a-half the whole work has been done, and a new transport has been dealt with in Crematorium No. 4.'"

It would be all too facile to expose Reitlinger's crass errors in order to dismiss present-day, orthodox Holocaust historiography in toto, as the latter unfailingly does by exposing Paul Rassinier's errors in order to attack present-day revisionism.³⁸⁷ Such is not the goal of the brief analysis which follows, even if, as we evaluate the method employed by Reitlinger, it behooves us not to forget that his book, at the time of its publication, brought together and synthesized in the highest degree all of orthodox historiography's "proofs" regarding the "gas chambers."

The letter from "Messrs. Toepf," that is, from the firm J. A. Topf & Söhne, dated February 12, 1943, was taken by Reitlinger, without any indication of its source, probably from the Soviet report on Auschwitz presented at Nuremberg as Document USSR-8.¹⁰ As reproduced in Volume XXXIX of the IMT records (where Reitlinger presumably found it), the text is a retranslation into German from a Russian translation of the German original, garbled in the process with gross errors of fact and interpretation, as a comparison with the original text³⁸⁸ demonstrates. For example, the letter, which was originally directed to the "Zentral-Bauleitung der Waffen-SS und Polizei" of Auschwitz, in retranslation becomes addressed to the "Zentralbauverwaltung der SS und Polizei." Worse, the subject of the letter (the "Re:" line), which in the original is "Krematorium II und III KGL" ("Crematorium II and III of the PoW Camp"), in retranslation becomes "Krematorien fuer das zweite und dritte Gefangenenlager" or "Crematoria for the second and third prisoner camp"! Most bizarrely, the retranslation misconstrues a key passage in the Topf letter in which it quotes a telegram the firm had previously received from the Central

Construction Office such that it has the SS acknowledging the receipt of orders from Topf, rather than confirming its own orders to Topf! Original text:³⁸⁸

“For Crematorium III [of the] PoW Camp [with] 5 three-muffle furnaces, the order already placed for the complete mechanical installations, including 2 permanent electrical corpse elevators and one provisional corpse elevator to be available in the short term, as well as a practical installation for coal delivery and ash transport is once again confirmed.”

Retranslation (IMT, Vol. XXXIX, p. 243):

“We confirm once more receipt of your order for five three-part cremation furnaces, including two electric elevators for the transport of corpses and one two-part elevator for corpses. A usable device for heating with coal and a mechanism for the removal of ashes are ordered as well.”

What matters most here, however, is how Reitlinger interpreted the document. Leaving aside minor details, we may note simply that he attributes five triple-muffle furnaces to all four of the Birkenau crematoria (“in each crematorium there were five three-door furnaces”), and that he confuses the two larger crematoria (II and III, provided with half-basement rooms identified today as “undressing rooms” and “gas chambers”) with the two smaller crematoria (IV and V, with all rooms on the ground floor), writing at once of how “in the two larger crematoria the gas chambers were on the same level as the furnaces” and of “[the] underground gas chambers of the smaller crematoria.”

From Ada Bimko, Reitlinger picks up the fable of the cart on rails which carried bodies from the “gas chamber” to the cremation furnaces, a detail “revealed” also by Wetzler but denied ex silentio by Nyiszli.

To the latter, on the other hand, he attributes the description of a sloping passage (“subway”), down which fathers push their children in baby carriages into the crematorium building – a description which is simply invented by Reitlinger. In this case, he seems to have been led astray by his faulty understanding of French when reading the translation of the relevant passage from Nyiszli’s book as published in 1951 in “Les Temps Modernes.” The image is cobbled together from two sentences. The first – “Les bébès, le plus sovent, sont transportés dans les bras du père, ou bien ces derniers poussent la voiture” (“The babies for the most part are carried in the arms of their father, or these latter [i.e., fathers, sic]³⁸⁹ push them in carriages”; Nyiszli 1951, p. 1662) – comes from the scene, in Chapter VII, in which the long column of selected Jews enters the courtyard of Crematorium II. The second then appears a couple of paragraphs later as the column of Jews is described arriving “jusqu’à une rampe de fer, d’où dix ou douze marches en béton conduisent sous terre” (“at an iron railing from which ten or twelve concrete steps lead below ground”; ibid.). The French term “rampe” can mean both railing and ramp. Reitlinger has therefore misunderstood, but how could he think of an “iron ramp” (like an access ramp to a garage) having concrete steps?³⁹⁰

Reitlinger’s reference to the gas which “escaped from the perforations in the sheet-metal columns” is also taken from Nyiszli, but the latter knew nothing of “douches” (i.e., shower heads) installed in the “gas chambers”; this particular detail Reitlinger takes once again from Ada Bimko. Moreover, while Reitlinger notes that “no water came” from these shower heads, he is careful to refrain from mentioning that, according to Bimko’s testimony, the gas came from them (Phillips 1949, p. 742):

“The S.S. man told me that the pipes, which were in the floor, were connected to the spray fittings in the gas chamber below.”

Reitlinger repeats Ada Bimko’s claim that there were no “drainage runnels” in the “gas chambers,” but then goes on to report Nyiszli’s claims about using hoses to wash down the blood- and excrement-soiled corpses without so much as asking himself where this filthy liquid was supposed to end up going. Once again, as in the case of the iron “ramp,” Reitlinger demonstrates an incredible lack of critical sense.

The “‘exhauster’ electric pumps” also come from Nyiszli’s account. Reitlinger obviously felt the need to flag the term, but as I have already explained above, the term exhauster (German Exhaustor) does not designate any particular system of construction, but rather is simply a generic term for a ventilation or air-exhaust device. He then transforms the large, double-leaved oak door (“[...] un SS ouvre à deux battants la grande porte en chêne”; Nyiszli 1951, p. 1663), which the SS manually open and which leads directly into the “gas chamber” in Nyiszli’s account, into a “great metal door” which “slid open.”

In the last section of his description, Reitlinger outdoes himself again, inventing a “mill that ground the clinker to fine ash” and confusing the Sola ³⁹⁰ The original Hungarian word “vaskorláthoz” can only mean iron railing, but not iron ramp. Remarkably, the same error was made by Richard Seaver when retranslating Tibère Kremer’s French version into English in 1960: “they advanced [...] to an iron ramp, from which 10 or 12 concrete steps led underground”; Nyiszli 1960, p. 44; emphasis added).

³⁸⁹ The quoted text is revised in the 1961 Julliard edition to eliminate the awkward switch in number from “père” to “ces derniers”: “Les bébès, le plus souvent, sont transportés dans les bras du père, ou bien ce dernier pousse leur voiture” (Nyiszli 1961a, p. 53; emphasis added).

with the Vistula as the river into which this ash allegedly was discarded. He then caps it all off with a quotation from Charles Bendel, but of all the various statements of this notorious “eyewitness,” he sees fit to use only a few sentences from the Belsen trial record (which are practically irrelevant anyway), all the while observing a discreet silence regarding the glaring contradictions between them and the statements of Ada Bimko and Nyiszli. And this was the man who blazed the trail of orthodox Holocaust history for Raul Hilberg!

Such a pattern of selective quotation is nothing unusual in mainstream historiography. Another Holocaust exegete who distinguished himself by his use of this “method” was the French historian Georges Wellers, particularly in his anti-revisionist book Les chambres à gaz ont existé (The Gas Chambers Existed), in which he presented the customary jumble of contradictory testimonies and even a “Comparative analysis of the testimonies” – the conclusion of which, naturally, was that, while they certainly displayed some inevitable “divergences,” nonetheless “on the essential point, all these testimonies are in agreement” (Wellers 1981, pp. 96-129, here p. 129). This dodge is entirely futile and inconsequential, however, for the “essential point” of the various testimonies boils down to the existence of the “gas chambers,” and on this “essential point” they nonetheless each give divergent and mutually contradictory accounts.

Nor did Raul Hilberg himself escape this practice. His exposition of the presumed extermination procedure at Auschwitz perfectly illustrates his method of cherry-picking phrases from mutually contradictory testimonies in order to create a factitious portrait that is seemingly coherent and supported by multiple sources (Hilberg 2003, p. 1041):

“When the Auschwitz victims filed into the gas chambers, they discovered that the imitation showers did not work [note 91]. Outside, a central switch was pulled to turn off the lights [note 92], and a Red Cross car drove up with the Zyklon [note 93]. An SS man, wearing a gas mask fitted with a special filter, lifted the glass shutter over the lattice and emptied one can after another into the gas chamber. Although the lethal dose was one milligram per kilogram of body weight³⁹¹ and the effect was supposed to be rapid, dampness could retard with which the gas was spreading [note 94]. Untersturmführer Grabner, political officer of the camp, stood ready with stopwatch in hand [note 95].”

In these few lines, Hilberg calls upon five witnesses and one judge – Jan Sehn [note 91], Miklós Nyiszli [note 92], Charles Bendel [note 93], Rudolf Höss and Filip Müller [note 94], and Pery Broad [note 95] – without troubling himself in the least with the strident contradictions which they present among each other, and all the while pretending that they collectively form a harmonious portrait which is coherent with the presumed facts. Rather tellingly, outside of this one footnote, he does not have the courage to so much as mention Nyiszli in the rest of his massive three-volume study.

Worse still, a similar method has been adopted – and indeed continues to be employed – even by the official Auschwitz State Museum in Poland. Although it has published various testimonies in whole or in part (as, for example, those of Rudolf Höss, Pery Broad, Henryk Tauber, Stanisław Jankowski, and various members of the Sonderkommando), it has never bothered to subject these individual testimonies to critical analysis in order to ascertain their degree of veracity, limiting itself instead to simple explanatory annotations. In the case that interests us here, Franciszek Piper, former director of the Museum and for years chair of its Historical Department, cites Nyiszli twenty times in the German translation of his study on “Extermination” at Auschwitz, with the usual mosaic of selective quotations, seeking to “document” otherwise-unknown aspects of the history of the camp of which Nyiszli remains the sole guarantor.

Piper’s first mention of Nyiszli involves a long quotation relative to the dissection hall of Crematorium II (2000, p. 115), on the disposition and furnishing of which Piper evidently knows nothing from other sources. Later in the study, he provides a detailed description of Crematoria II and III, even reproducing an architectural plan of the buildings,³⁹² but when it comes to the presumed gassings there, he is forced to alternately rely on or reject Nyiszli’s account on numerous details, including:

1. “Gas Chamber” Sign

Piper relies on Nyiszli about a sign in various languages allegedly posted at the entrance to the “gas chamber” saying “To Baths and Disinfection” (ibid., p. 169). However, Piper stays mute about the absurd dimensions Nyiszli attributes to the “undressing room” and “gas chamber,” each 200 meters long in his description. It is worth mentioning here as well that the German translation of Nyiszli’s book referred to by Piper in his notes to his study correctly translates the relevant passage as “einen etwa 200 Meter langen [...] Raum” (“an approximately 200-meter-long [...] room”; Nyiszli 1992, p. 34), but the Polish translation published one year later, which Piper himself annotated, crudely falsifies the text here, saying that the room in question “ma około 50 metrów długości” (“has a length of about 50 meters”; Nyiszli 1996, p. 35), nearly identical to the real value of 49.43 meters! On the other hand, the two translations are in agreement in eliminating Nyiszli’s embarrassing reference to chlorine and “granular form” in his description of Zyklon B. Where the original text has ³⁹² Since the buildings were built as mirror images of one another, one plan suffices for both.

“A beszórt anyag Cyclon, vagy Chlór szemcsés formája, azonnal gázt fejleszt, amint a levegővel érintkezik!” (Nyiszli 1946, p. 35)

in translation this becomes, respectively (Nyiszli 1992, p. 36):

„Die Substanz: Zyklon B. Im Kontakt mit der Luft entwickelt sich aus der Substanz ein Gas [...]”

And (Nyiszli 1996, p. 37):

“To cyklon. Natychmiast po zetknięciu się z powietrzem wydziela się gaz.”

(“This is Zyklon. Immediately upon contact with air, gas develops.”)

2. The Capacity of the “Gas Chambers”

On this, Piper wrote (2000, pp. 169f.):

“By beating and turning dogs on the recalcitrant, as many as 2,000 men, women and children could be jammed inside. (In practice, this capacity was used only rarely, at peak periods of arriving transports.)”

For Nyiszli, however, the capacity of the “gas chambers” was 3,000 people, and that number did not represent an exception, but was rather the norm.

3. The Gassing Procedure

For his principal source here, Piper turns to former Auschwitz commandant Rudolf Höss, whose notes on “The Final Solution of the Jewish Question in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp,” written for his Polish jailers while awaiting execution in 1947, provides the following quotation:³⁹³

“It could be observed through the peep hole in the door that those who were standing nearest the induction vents were killed at once. It can be said that about one-third died straight away. The remainder staggered about and began to scream and struggle for air. The screaming, however, soon changed to the death rattle and in a few minutes all lay still. After twenty minutes at the latest no movement could be discerned.”

However, the supposed devices for introducing Zyklon B are described by Piper (drawing on still other sources) as columns “made of two layers of wire mesh” (ibid., p. 166), while Nyiszli wrote of “perforated sheet-metal pipes” (Nyiszli 1946, p. 35).

4. Cremation Devices

Piper focuses first on the question of furnace loaders (2000, p. 171, FN 494):

³⁹³ Piper 2000, p. 170; verbatim taken from Bezwińska/Czech 1984, pp. 134f.

"In Crematoria II and III there was one pair of movable rollers per oven (three receptacles); in Crematoria IV and V, each receptacle had its own rollers. [...] Nyiszli, Auschwitz: A Doctor's Account, pp. 51-55"

This note refers to the loading rollers (Laufrollen) originally placed below the door of a cremation muffle in order to facilitate the insertion of corpses into the muffle using a corpse-introduction cart before this system was replaced by more-practical introduction stretchers.³⁹⁴ Piper explains all this to his reader in his text. Though cited as a source, Nyiszli not only does not confirm Piper's description, he flatly contradicts it. Nyiszli knew nothing of triple-muffled furnaces, but rather believed that in each of the four crematoria there were fifteen individual furnaces with one muffle each. Likewise, Nyiszli knew nothing of the corpse-introduction cart having been replaced by stretchers. He instead described devices more or less corresponding to the corpse-introduction carts, which were no longer in use in Birkenau by 1944 (see p. 198). Moreover, Nyiszli never mentions the rollers and never talks about the furnaces of Crematoria IV and V. Piper's reference to the "rollers" probably derives from a slightly too-casual translation of the German version (Nyiszli 1992, p. 39):

"Jeweils drei werden auf ein aus Stahlplatten hergestelltes Rollgestell gelegt. Automatisch öffnen sich die schweren Eisentüren [...]."

"Three at a time are placed on a rolling framework made of steel plates. The heavy iron doors open automatically [...]"

The Hungarian text states instead:

"These [the members of the cremation Kommando] then place them [the corpses] three at a time on a pushing device made of steel plates. The furnace's heavy iron doors open automatically. The device moving on iron wheels rolls into the glowing furnace, drops its load, slides back, heated to incandescence." (MBV, Chapter VII)

5. Duration of the Cremations

Piper asserts that, according to the statements of members of the Sonderkommando, "Crematoria II and III could each burn about 2,500 bodies per day." In a note to the quoted passage he then explains (2000, pp. 171f.):

"According to Feinsilber and Tauber, about 2,500 corpses per day were burned in each of Crematoria II and III; according to Höss, approximately 2,000. [Sources for Alter Feinsilber, Henryk Tauber, Kurt Markus, Rudolf Höss and Pery Broad...]; Nyiszli, Auschwitz. A Doctor's Account, p. 55"

On the page indicated, however, Nyiszli not only advances a capacity of 5,000 corpses per day for Crematorium II, but also affirms that the total capacity for the four Birkenau crematoria was in fact 20,000 corpses per day – because, as mentioned earlier, he believed that each crematorium was equipped with fifteen single-muffle furnaces. Piper shows not the least concern for these incredible absurdities in his supposed source, going on to tranquilly affirm that Crematoria IV and V had a daily capacity of 1,500 corpses each (ibid., p. 173), or 3,000 together, instead of the 10,000 claimed by Nyiszli!

6. The “Bunkers” of Birkenau

Piper dedicates an entire section to the “Bunkers” of Birkenau and provides a plan and a detailed description of “Bunker 2,” alleged to have contained four “gas chambers” (ibid., pp. 138-140). As I have pointed out above, however, for Nyiszli there existed neither a “Bunker 2” nor four “gas chambers,” but merely a run-down farmhouse with a single room which served as an undressing room for the victims who were to be shot at the two burning pits. Piper takes not the slightest notice of so extreme a contradiction from a source he is elsewhere content to use, pretending instead, as with all the others, that it simply does not exist.

7. Executions

Referring to Chapter IX of Nyiszli's book, Piper writes that small groups of people were executed with firearms in the crematoria (ibid., p. 179):

“including Soviet prisoners of war and Poles sentenced by the summary court in Katowice.”

In reality, the victims whom Nyiszli speaks of are completely different from those claimed by Piper, namely women selected from Sector BIIC (women's camp):

“They are the selected from camp section C [...] every evening at seven a truck brings seventy over.” (MBV, Chapter IX; Nyiszli 1992, p. 48)

Later, in Chapter XXII, Nyiszli returns to the theme, and the class of victims expands to include men:

“[...] each evening around seven o'clock, a truck passes through the crematorium gate and brings seventy to eighty women or men for liquidation. They are the daily selections of the K.Z. They arrive here from the barracks and the hospitals.” (Nyiszli 1992, p. 85)

Contrary to what Piper claims, the routine (“nightly”) executions Nyiszli claimed to have witnessed at the crematorium evidently had nothing to do with Soviet POWs or Poles condemned to death by the Gestapo.³⁹⁵

³⁹⁵ Admittedly, in Chapter XXIX Nyiszli does dissect the corpse of a Russian officer shot during an escape attempt (and thus not executed per se), and in Chapter XXXVII he talks to a group of Poles condemned for various offences by the Gestapo. The latter incident is alleged to have occurred at Crematorium V on January 1, 1945, after the “suspension” of regular killing operations at Birkenau, and marks the last occasion Nyiszli speaks of executions at the camp; it is also the sole occasion he speaks in the book of the execution of non-Jewish Poles.

8. The Sonderkommando Revolt

At one point in his study, Piper refers to Nyiszli's assertion that the Sonderkommando, when he entered it in June of 1944, consisted of 860 prisoners (Piper 2000, p. 185, FN 558). As I have pointed out earlier, Piper affirms that, during the course of the revolt on October 7, 1944, 451 prisoners were killed and 212 were left alive (Piper 2000, p. 187), whereas Nyiszli of course writes that 853 were killed and only 7 survived (MBV, Chapter XXIX).

A few lines further still, Piper relates that, after the revolt was suppressed, in the courtyard of Crematorium II

"First, Dr. Mengele's assistants—the physicians Nyiszli, Korner and Görög, and laboratory technician Fischer—were picked out, along with 30 prisoners who would work in Crematorium V, the only one still operating." (Piper 2000, p. 188)

Nyiszli, on the other hand, recounts that on this occasion the only people "picked out" from among the inmates were himself and his three assistants: the entire twelfth Sonderkommando was exterminated, and the thirty prisoners in question were not survivors of the revolt and were not even part of the Sonderkommando, but rather were a simple squad of prisoners instituted after the extermination as the core of a new, thirteenth Sonderkommando (MBV, Chapter XXXV)!

For Piper, of the 212 survivors – all exterminated according to Nyiszli – 70 were assigned to the Abbruchkommando (demolition squad) while the remaining 100³⁹⁶ were told that they would be transferred to the Gross-Rosen concentration camp. Among the latter group, Piper assures us, was also included "the Sonderkommando physician, Dr. Pach" (Piper 2000, p. 188)³⁹⁷ – a personage who did not exist at all for Nyiszli, he being, by his own account, the only doctor of the Sonderkommando.

These 100 prisoners, Piper continues, were also soon killed. In the relevant note he indicates the number of those killed according to various witnesses: 170 for the anonymous note of November 26, 1944 (attributed to Lejb Langfus), only 100 for Szlama Dragon. At his footnote's conclusion, he then adds the following citation: "Nyiszli, Auschwitz. A Doctor's Account, p. 198" (ibid., p. 188, FN 568). On the pages cited, however, Nyiszli recounts the extermination of the thirteenth Sonderkommando (not the remnants of the twelfth), which according to him consisted of 460 prisoners; these were first gathered in the furnace hall of Crematorium III then taken outside the camp to be killed, with the exception of Nyiszli himself and his three assistants (MBV, Chapter XXXV).

³⁹⁶ Adding the numbers up, this makes for 4 + 30 + 70 + 100 = 204 prisoners. Piper has forgotten to clarify the fate of his remaining eight survivors.

³⁹⁷ For more on Pach, see in particular Section 5.2.2.

For his part, Piper recounts the story as follows (ibid.):

"They were killed not far from the camp and their bodies delivered to the crematorium the next day to be burned."

In the attached footnote he then elaborates (ibid., Note 569):

"Nyiszli saw their burned bodies; they were brought to Crematorium II the next day for immolation. He reports that they had been killed with flamethrowers, a conclusion certainly prompted by the visible burns on their bodies. Most probably, however, they had been shot and then brought to the crematorium after an unsuccessful attempt at burning in the open air."

Leaving aside the fact that the context of Nyiszli's account is in total and irremediable conflict with Piper's, Nyiszli as a witness did not conclude anything, but rather declares with certainty that the prisoners in question were killed using flamethrowers, firmly counting this procedure on his ongoing list as "the seventh type of death" which he has seen used by the SS (MBV, Chapter XXXV).

Furthermore, Piper's explanation is manifestly a shabby ad hoc deception, for he himself has previously asserted in another publication that, during the Hungarian action at Birkenau, bodies were routinely "burned at the rate of about 5,000 corpses in 24 hours in the incineration pits near the crematoria" and that "[the] same number were incinerated in the pits of bunker 2" (Piper 1994, p. 173). As such, it clearly is absurd to suggest that the SS should have failed in an "attempt at burning [the bodies] in the open air" – that is, in those very same cremation pits – when there were only 100 corpses to be burned.

Next, a long quotation from Nyiszli's book permits Piper to describe the presumed living conditions of the Sonderkommando men in the crematoria (2000, pp. 191f.). To this, Piper then adds (ibid., p. 193):

"Dr. Pach continued to treat the patients [in the crematorium's infirmary]. In addition, Drs. Miklós Nyiszli (from June 1944) and Charles Bendel (from August 1944) acted as Sonderkommando physicians."

In their respective statements, however, Nyiszli and Bendel not only ignore one another, but each pretends to have been the only doctor of the Sonderkommando, and the only doctor to have survived! In a note here, Piper refers to Nyiszli's book (with a prudent "passim"; FN 590), as well as to the later fanciful account by Filip Müller, of which I will have more to say in Chapter 5.2. In truth, of course, as I have noted earlier, Nyiszli mentions Bendel only once in his book, and then not in relation to the Sonderkommando. Had Piper indicated the precise page in which this sole reference occurs, he would have placed his whole factitious construct at risk. This is what Nyiszli actually wrote:

"The Gypsy camp has a point of special interest, the experimental barracks located there. Professor Dr. Epstein [...] is chief of the research lab. [...] His assistant is Dr. Bendel, lecturer in the faculty of medicine at Paris." (MBV, Chapter IV)

A "Dr. Bendel" thus appears in Nyiszli's book, once and only once, as assistant in the research lab at the Gypsy camp; of his supposed presence at the crematoria as a doctor for the Sonderkommando, Nyiszli knows nothing whatsoever. Despite this obvious fact, Piper puts both men in the Sonderkommando, at the same time, and even has the effrontery to cite their respective statements in various places, without ever informing his readers of this glaring contradiction between them. It is only too evident that such a "method" of citation is not only poor scholarship, it is actively deceptive.

9. Mendacious Polish Translation

Nor is Piper's scholarly malfeasance limited to selective or misleading citations. I have exposed above a falsification in the Polish translation of Nyiszli's book which Piper annotated and endorsed, but it is not the only such manipulation. Another, no less crude, appears in the very same chapter, the seventh. The original text is as follows:

"The whine of electric motors becomes audible. They have turned on the giant blowers which fan the fire to the proper temperature inside the furnaces. Fifteen blowers of this kind are in operation at once! One is installed next to each furnace. The cremation hall is about 150 meters long, a brightly lit, white-washed, concrete-floored space with enormous, iron-barred windows. The fifteen cremation furnaces are installed separately in large red-brick structures." (MBV, Chapter VII, emphasis added)

"Odzywa się szum prądnic, rozpoczynają pracę ogromne wentylatory: w piecach podnosi się temperaturę do najwyższego stopnia. Pracuje jednocześnie kilka dużych wentylatorów. Przy każdym piecu jeden. Pomieszczenie, w którym pali się zwłoki, jest duże, jasne, wybielone, z betonową podłogą i olbrzymimi, okratowanymi oknami. Paleniska obudowano czerwoną cegłą, każdy piec osobno."

And here it is again, retranslated into English:

"The hum of electric generators is heard, enormous ventilators start to work: in the furnace the temperature rises to the highest degree. Several large ventilators are working simultaneously. There is one beside each furnace. The room in which the bodies are burned is large, brightly lit, painted white, with a concrete floor and huge, barred windows. The hearths are encased in red brick, each furnace separately."

Smaller differences aside, we note at once that all absurd references to the 150-meter length of the room and to fifteen ventilators in operation beside fifteen separate furnaces have been eliminated.

Similarly, further along in the same chapter the phrase “Four large mechanical freight elevators are in operation here” (MBV, Chapter VII) becomes, in Polish, “pracuje tam wielki dźwig towarowy” (Nyiszli 1996, p. 39) which translates to “a large freight elevator is working here.”

Later, speaking of the “thatch-roofed farmhouse” near the two pyres in Chapter XIII, Nyiszli affirms that “There is no gas chamber which they believe to be a shower room,” since as far as he is concerned the house is a simple undressing room for the victims who are to be shot at the pyres. The Polish version, on the other hand, eliminates Nyiszli’s embarrassing reference to the non-existence of gas chambers in the building: “Nie ma budynku, który mogliby uważać za łaźnię” (ibid., p. 64), which translates to “There is no building which could be considered a bathhouse.”

The deception is then completed with a pair of captious annotations by Piper. First, on the “thatch-roofed farmhouse” (ibid., p. 176, Note 27):

“This is the provisional gas chamber which was put into operation in mid-1942 following the adaptation of a farmhouse in Brzezinka (Birkenau). After the four crematoria and gas chambers started operating, this chamber was not used. It resumed operation again in May 1944, during the period of mass influx of Hungarian Jewish transports. It was initially called ‘white house’ or ‘bunker 2,’ in 1944 the name ‘bunker 5.’ was also used.”

And then on the shootings at the pyres (ibid., Note 28):

“This system of execution by shooting was rare. Usually the corpses of people murdered with gas in the gas chamber were burned.”

Thus, the mention of the “farmhouse,” which for Nyiszli explicitly was not a “gas chamber,” becomes for Piper a confirmation of “the gas chambers”! Naturally he does not explain why Nyiszli himself never used any of the names for the building, allegedly in common circulation, of “white house” or “bunker 2” or “bunker 5.” And then in the second note, the shootings at the pyres which Nyiszli describes as the only system in use at the location, are transformed by Piper into a rarity!

Another manipulation in the Polish version concerns the description of the activities of the “Dayan.” The passage in Nyiszli’s original reads as follows:

“I had no other arguments. The Ober accepted them, and at my suggestion the man was sent to the so-called Canada rubbish heap burning in the courtyard of Crematorium II. [...] The Canada rubbish heap was a constantly burning mound; in this place hundreds of thousands of photographs of married couples, elderly parents, attractive children and beautiful girls burned in the company of thousands of prayer books.” (MBV, Chapter XXXV, emphasis added)

The Polish version, in turn, reads (Nyiszli 1996, p. 150):

“Nie miałem innych argumentów, ale Oberscharführer zgodził się i z tymi i na moją prośbę dajan został przydzielony do pracy przy śmietniku znajdującym się na podwórzu II krematorium. [...] Ten wielki śmietnik ciągle płonie.”

And translated into English:

“I had no other arguments, but the Oberscharführer accepted them and on my prayer the dajan was assigned to work at the garbage dump in the courtyard of Crematorium II. [...] This great garbage burns continuously.”

The Polish translation – with Piper’s editorial connivance – thus finesses away the embarrassing fact that Nyiszli apparently believed that the extensive, thirty-barrack storage complex next to Crematorium IV known as “Canada” in camp slang was actually a burning rubbish heap in the courtyard of a different crematorium some 250 meters away!

And where the translation does not falsify the original text, Piper still sometimes seeks to mislead the reader with deceptive annotations. For example, describing his departure from the crematorium with his companions after the flight of the SS in Chapter XXXVIII, Nyiszli writes:

The Polish translation is accurate (ibid., p. 158), but notice the misleading comment by Piper (ibid., p. 180, note 59):

“The crematoria are directly inside that camp. Nyiszli certainly had in mind the main gate of the camp.”

Nyiszli says nothing at all about the distance to the camp’s gate, however, he explicitly affirms that the camp itself is two kilometers away from the crematoria. And if there were any lingering doubts on that question, one would need only to look at the next two sentences in his account:

“The flames of great fires flicker on the horizon! Probably the K.Z. is burning!”

For Nyiszli, the K.Z. itself, not its gate, is two kilometers away on the horizon! Piper makes no attempt to confront the implications of this sort of blatant error on Nyiszli’s part: he simply tries to finesse them away, pushing aside all critical sense in the process – in the hope, no doubt, that his readers will do so too.

Piper thus displays a sort of dual complicity here, conniving – indeed participating, as editor – in the manipulations of the Polish translation (of which he could not possibly be unaware), but conniving also in the many absurdities offered up by Nyiszli, allowing them to stand unchallenged wherever they may pass, without too much embarrassment, in the propaganda framework of the orthodox Holocaust narrative.

Referring to the consequences of the Sonderkommando revolt, Nyiszli writes at the end of Chapter XXIX:

“Eight hundred and fifty-three prisoners had died. Seventy SS soldiers were killed. Among them were an Obersturmführer, seventeen Oberscharführer and Scharführer, and fifty-two Sturmmann, that is, mere privates,”

In a note on this point, Piper observes that the number of SS men killed given by Nyiszli is not substantiated by other sources, rather it is refuted by Standortbefehl (Garrison Order) No. 26/44 of October 12, 1944, which I mentioned earlier (Section 3.6.2.). Piper then states that 451 inmates of the Sonderkommando were killed in the revolt while 212 survived (ibid., Note 48 on p. 179). Nyiszli, on the other hand, claims that only seven inmates survived. How can we explain this blatant contradiction? Piper does not address it, and as usual does not exhibit even the most basic critical attitude. He is therefore fully conniving both with the manipulations of the Polish translation of Nyiszli's book, which he must have been aware of,³⁹⁸ and with the absurdities uttered by Nyiszli.

5.2. The Critics

5.2.1. The Critique of Jean-Claude Pressac

Apart from discussing it in reference to the presumed cremation ditches of “Bunker 2/V,” Pressac also deals with Nyiszli's testimony in connection with the technical aspects of the “gassing” procedure in Crematorium II. Introducing the latter question, Pressac writes (1989, p. 473):

Despite calling it “entirely accurate,” Pressac nonetheless admits that “the stark contrast between the general precision of the account and [the] enormous errors that it contains” induced him to check the relevant numbers in the first Hungarian edition of Nyiszli's book, since he suspected that the French translation he was using, that of Tibère Kremer, “must be at fault.” Checking the Hungarian, however, only confirmed the presence of these “enormous errors” in Nyiszli's original text (ibid.).³⁹⁹

After comparing Nyiszli's numbers with the various numbers known or presumed to be correct by modern historiography, and after identifying “multipliers” for each (i.e., factors by which Nyiszli's numbers are exaggerated),

³⁹⁹ All emphases and capitalizations here and below in original unless otherwise noted.

"The average of the different multipliers [is] almost exactly 4. If we apply this to the official total of 4 million victims we arrive at a figure much closer to reality: 1 million. This calculation is by no means scientific or rigorous, but it shows that DOCTOR NYISZLI, a respectable ACADEMIC, TRAINED IN GERMANY, multiplied the figures by FOUR when describing the interior of Krematorium II and when speaking of the number of persons or victims."

For Pressac this means that, apart from the "exaggerations," Nyiszli's testimony is precise and therefore trustworthy. Nonetheless, Pressac himself identifies not less than twenty-five "errors" in this one chapter (VII) of Nyiszli's book, many of which indeed are not numerical in nature (ibid., pp. 474f.).

In sum, Pressac believes that Nyiszli was "an authentic witness," something which, in his opinion, "can easily be proved," but that "the mystery of the 'multiplier' still remains complete." A few paragraphs later he adds:

"The case of Dr Miklos NYISZLI's book is baffling. In my opinion, it contains the most impressive evocation of the 'demential nightmare' experienced by the thousand men of the Sonderkommando." (ibid., p. 479)

This is a judgment, at last, with which one can entirely agree, though only on the condition that one take the expression "demential nightmare" literally.

Pressac holds, incomprehensibly, that Nyiszli really did live in Crematorium II (a possibility which is excluded by the series of absurdities proffered by him in his book on the layout of this building – see Chapter 3.7). In support of this conviction, Pressac offers a "proof" – even as he acknowledges yet again that "The problem of the completely false figures in Chapter Seven still remains." This problem is all the more serious in that, for Pressac, these exaggerations or errors apparently could only have been somehow intentional:

"I consider it to be quite impossible that these wrong figures could simply be 'careless,' since they are in such stark contrast to the precision and truth of other passages in the book." (Ibid.)

But then, why would a "respectable academic" ever have taken recourse to such silly falsifications?

The proof in question is this: in Chapter XIX of his book, Nyiszli writes of "the four lightning rods placed at the corners of the crematorium chimney" – lightning rods which, Pressac notes, also appear in a drawing by David Olère (ibid.).⁴⁰⁰ Pressac comments (ibid.):⁴⁰¹

"But both [men] commit a slight error."

⁴⁰¹ PMO neg. no. 20995/507 is reproduced on p. 342 of Pressac's book.

Photograph PMO neg. no. 20995/507 shows the south side and west end of Krematorium III with, rising 2 metres above the chimney, four lightning conductors that are not 'at the four corners' but in the centre of each of the four sides of the chimney.^[402] Scarcely visible at a distance of 100 metres – the distance at which the photograph was taken – they become totally invisible beyond 200 metres. Only prisoners working within the precincts of Krematorien II and III could see and remember them. This, admittedly minor, detail could not be dreamed up."

This "proof" is rather naive and demonstrates, if anything, the opposite of what Pressac supposes. The so-called Hauptstrasse or main road which led to the Birkenau sewage-treatment facility and Zentralsauna passed between the fences of Crematorium II and III just a few dozen meters from their respective chimneys. This can be clearly seen in a photograph showing a group of women and children on this road in front of Crematorium III which was published in The Auschwitz Album, the French edition of which was co-edited by Pressac himself (Freyer et al. 1983, Photo 153, p. 177). Anyone who passed along that road would have been able to see the position of the lightning rods on the chimneys distinctly. And of course, anyone who found themselves in one of the courtyards of the crematoria would have seen them still more distinctly.

Now the fact that Nyiszli, who pretended to have lived for six-and-a-half months in Crematorium II, nonetheless described an erroneous position for the lightning rods demonstrates, according to Pressac's logic, that he must have seen the chimneys of Crematoria II and III from such a distance that he could not clearly distinguish the position of their lighting rods – in others words, not from the crematorium courtyard!

The question actually is more complicated still, for in his book Nyiszli "sees" the lightning rods at the four corners of the chimney on two occasions, once from outside and once from inside the crematorium courtyard. In fact, of the two references to them in his book, the first occurs in the context of Nyiszli's arrival at Auschwitz, while he is still undergoing selection on the ramp:

"Until the selection of the group, four thousand people strong, is completed, I have time to look around myself. In the light of the fading day, the landscape I saw from inside the wagon now leaps to life. Here there is much more to see. The first thing that draws my attention – rivets it, so to speak – is a gigantic square chimney, tapering toward the top and built of red bricks, which emerges from the top of a factory-like, two-story building, also built of red bricks.

*It's a strange shape for a factory chimney, but what is really impressive is the column of fire 8-10 meters high which gushes from its mouth between the lightning rods at its four corners." (MBV, Chapter I; emphasis added)

The second mention refers to the time of the alleged extermination of the Jews from Corfu, while Nyiszli was in the courtyard of Crematorium II:

"My glance wanders over the crematorium chimney: the lightning rods placed at the square chimney's four corners, all heavy iron rods, have melted from the terrible fire and are now bent downwards." (MBV, Chapter XIX; emphasis added)

Thus, Pressac's argument – that "[o]nly prisoners working within the precincts of Krematorien II and III" could have observed the lightning rods, and thus that the detail of their existence "could not have been dreamed up" – appears entirely without foundation. If we are to accept Nyiszli's testimony here, we must admit that anyone could in fact have seen the lightning rods from outside the precincts of the crematoria – from the ramp, for example. Indeed, if anything, the fact that, while clearly knowing of their existence, Nyiszli nonetheless got their placement incorrect might even be taken to suggest that he never got a closer look.

Pressac often reasons, as here, on the basis of a simplistic schematization which allows for only two possibilities; in fact, there were always multiple possibilities. In the case at hand, for example, an Arbeitskarte (work card) for the electricians' unit ("An die: Elektriker") has been preserved from the Auschwitz Central Construction Office, dated October 17, 1942, with the heading "Lightning conductor for Crematorium n. 11 [sic] BW30 K.G.L. [Kriegsgefangenenlager; PoW Camp = Birkenau]," which orders "Preparation and mounting of a four-part lightning conductor on the chimney of Crematorium 1 [= II] in the K.G.L." The work was carried out between October 23 and 27 of the same year.⁴⁰³ A similar Arbeitskarte, dated February 9, 1943, has been preserved for Crematorium III as well; in its case, the work was executed on June 21 and 22, 1943.⁴⁰⁴ Obviously the installers would have known about the work they had done, and there's nothing in the documents to suggest that they were sworn to secrecy on the subject.

Strangely, if typically, Pressac dwells at length over this irrelevant detail but says nothing at all about the absurdity of Nyiszli's claim to have seen the lighting rods melted and bent toward the ground. If nothing else, one wonders why they would have melted on the night of the Corfu "extermination" but not on the day of Nyiszli's arrival, when he allegedly observed "[a] column of fire 8-10 meters high" gushing up from the chimney between them.

5.2.2. The Critique of Charles D. Provan

As I have noted in passing earlier, in 2001 The Journal of Historical Review published an important article by the late American researcher Charles Provan titled “New Light on Dr. Miklos Nyiszli and His Auschwitz Book.”

By his own account, Provan began his study hoping to answer “[the] most radical of the revisionist questions [...] Did Dr. Nyiszli even exist?” Having seen, in an early edition of his book, an image of the cover page of Nyiszli’s doctoral dissertation, Selbstmordarten auf Grund des Sektionsmaterials des Breslauer Gerichtsärztlichen Instituts von Juni 1927-Mai 1930 (Types of Suicide on the Basis of Autopsy Materials from the Breslau Forensic Medical Institute, June 1927 to May 1930), Provan decided to obtain a copy of it and found confirmation there of some of the statements made by Nyiszli in his book. At the end of the dissertation, Nyiszli expressed his “heartfelt gratitude to Professor Dr. Reuter and Professor Dr. Strassmann.” In his book, Provan noted, Nyiszli mentions “[a] Dr. Strasseman [sic]” and writes of having spent three years “at the Boroslo [sic] Institute of Forensic Medicine” (Provan 2001, pp. 20-22).

In the interests of truth, one should note that Nyiszli actually does spell Strassmann correctly in his book; Provan’s use of “sic” here is due to his reliance on the English translation by Richard Seaver, which renders the name incorrectly. “Boroslo” in turn is Seaver’s attempt to naturalize “Boroszló,” the Hungarian spelling for Breslau (today, in Polish: Wrocław). The relevant passages in Nyiszli’s book are as follows:

“Fifteen years earlier the Dean of Medicine of the Friedrich-Wilhelms-Universität in Breslau had shaken my hand and, wishing me good luck and a prosperous future, conferred upon me my doctor’s diploma, cum laude.” (MBV, Chapter II)

“Apart from myself, no one here knows that for three years, working directly from corpses, I studied every form of suicide as assistant to His Excellency Professor Dr. Strassmann at the Institute of Forensic Medicine in Breslau. What I knew then, present-day prisoner number A-8450, doctor of the K.Z., knows too.” (MBV, Chapter V)

The dissertation furnishes other biographical details about Nyiszli as well. He was born in Simleul-Silvaniei in Transylvania on June, 1901, and “attended elementary school for four years and the Humanistic Roman Catholic Episcopal Higher Gymnasium”⁴⁰⁵ in that town (ibid., p. 22). This latter course of schooling could not have been a common thing for a Jew at the time, and may help explain the fact, discussed earlier, that he undoubtedly was a very peculiar Jew, if the evidence of his book is to be believed.

Having discussed Nyiszli's dissertation and other biographical details, Provan next turns to an analysis and commentary on Nyiszli's deposition of July 28, 1945 (ibid., pp. 22f.):

"There are several unmistakable parallels between this document and Dr. Nyiszli's later book, but noticeable differences too. Among the parallels were his selection to perform autopsies by Dr. Mengele, his residence in crematorium 1, and his unusual assertion that the victims of the gas chamber at crematorium 1 were executed with chlorine granules. 'The ganuales (sic) fell down and through contact with the air, a chlorine gas was produced which within five to ten minutes caused death through agonizing suffocation.' [...]

The differences between Nyiszli's deposition of 1945 and his subsequent book are marked, and in some cases irreconcilable. For example, Nyiszli states in his deposition that he arrived at Auschwitz on May 22, 1944, stayed one day, and then was transferred to a labor detail in the sub-camp Monowitz. After about two weeks (thus in June 1944), all doctors with experience in pathology were asked to report to the authorities. Nyiszli and one other doctor (evidently a Hungarian who had worked at Strasbourg University) did so, and were taken to crematorium 1 at Birkenau. After several hours Dr. Mengele appeared, and examined the two doctors. In Auschwitz,^[406] Nyiszli never goes to Monowitz; is recruited as a pathologist by Dr. Mengele in May, not June, 1944; and his fellow pathologist has disappeared!

In his deposition, Nyiszli describes his and the other pathologist's duties as including taking the measurements of abnormal people, who were then shot by a German officer working for Mengele. The two doctors would then autopsy the victims, after which they would dissolve the bodies and ship the bones to a renowned anthropological institute in Berlin-Dahlem. On one night, according to Nyiszli, Mengele ordered the two pathologists to assist him with a group of fourteen Gypsy twins. Nyiszli, ordered by Mengele, undressed a fourteen-year-old girl, and placed her on the dissection table, whereupon Mengele gave her a shot to cause sleep, then killed her with a chloroform injection. She was then removed to another location. The remaining thirteen twins were one by one treated in the same manner. When all fourteen twins were dead, Mengele asked Nyiszli and his colleague how fast they could do the autopsies. They told him four a day, to which Mengele agreed. Interestingly, and disconcertingly, this story is omitted from Auschwitz. Dr. Lifton and I believe that it was left out due to Nyiszli's admitted involvement in the murders. In the absence of the threat of his own death, Nyiszli could be considered an accomplice.

Another oddity is this description of cleaning out the crematorium gas chamber: 'The special command rinsed off the corpses with a water hose and then began the transport of the corpses in an elevator up to the boiler room.' Note that here Nyiszli correctly lists crematorium 1 as having one elevator, not four, as in his book.

At the end of his 1945 deposition, Nyiszli mentioned that all personnel of the Sonderkommando were killed on November 17, 1944 – except for the doctors who worked for Mengele, and their assistants. They were ordered away from the machine guns by Dr. Mengele himself: he needed their further help for his racial biology work. In Auschwitz, however, Dr. Mengele saves Nyiszli and the others on the date of the Auschwitz camp revolt a month earlier, which goes unmentioned in his deposition.”

As far as the story of the fourteen twins⁴⁰⁷ is concerned, the hypothesis formulated by Lifton and accepted by Provan – that Nyiszli suppressed it in his book because it implicated him in Dr. Mengele's alleged murders – seems rather dubious.

It is difficult to see in Nyiszli's behavior in this story a kind of complicity in murder, especially since the Sonderkommando staff, according to the orthodox narrative, carried out a work of collaboration that was far more compromising, but no one has ever talked about complicity in mass murder in this regard. Of course, Nyiszli could not know back then what the world would make of the Sonderkommando's actions, or of his actions, for that matter. But if Nyiszli had genuinely been concerned about appearing complicit in murder, he would hardly have included the story of the father and son from Litzmannstadt in Chapter XXXI, in which his actions surely must be considered every bit as compromising: He knowingly misled the pair so as to obtain “in vivo” observations prior to their murder.

It is strange, on the other hand, that Provan did not notice the blatant contradictions between the story in Nyiszli's 1946 deposition and the similar story of the ten twins in Chapter VIII of his book. In it, Nyiszli relates how, while performing an autopsy on “a pair of twins” as part of a group of “corpses of gypsy children under ten years of age” which Dr. Mengele had assigned to him, he observes something unusual:

“In the outer wall of the left ventricle is a tiny, round, pale-red spot, caused by a pin prick, it barely stands out against the surrounding color. I can't be wrong! The pinprick could have been made by a very fine needle. Naturally a hypodermic needle! The child received an injection, but for what reason? Someone might receive an injection to the heart in the case of an emergency due to cardiac insufficiency perhaps. I soon figure it out. I open the heart, expose the left ventricle. In an autopsy, one would normally ladle out and weigh the blood in the left ventricle of the heart. That's not possible to do here, because the blood has coagulated into a hard, clotted mass. With tweezers I pull the blood clot apart, sniff it. The characteristic, powerful smell of chloroform hits my nostrils. The child received a chloroform injection to the heart! For no other purpose than that the blood in the left ventricle of the heart should coagulate due to the injected chloroform and, depositing against the heart valves, provoke immediate cardiac arrest.

My knees shake with excitement. I have discovered the Third Reich's darkest medical secret. So they kill people here not just with gas, but also with injections of chloroform administered to the heart! Sweat bathes my forehead. It is fortunate that I am alone. In front of others I would scarcely have been able to conceal my emotion. [...] If Dr. Mengele were to suspect that I know the secret of his injections, ten doctors of the political SS would be on hand to witness my death!" (MBV, Chapter VIII; emphasis added)

Hence, that which, according to Nyiszli's 1945 deposition, Dr. Mengele had openly done in his presence – injecting chloroform into the heart in order to kill subjects for autopsy – becomes, in Nyiszli's 1946 book, the discovery of a dark state secret on his part – a discovery which Mengele allegedly would have punished ineluctably by the killing of the discoverer!

In the book, Nyiszli thus reveals a simplistic psychology expressed with tawdry rhetoric. At this point, however, a decisive question arises: Why would someone who had learned the supposed "terrible secret" of the mass extermination of Jews in gas chambers and nonetheless been left to live have ever felt the need to worry about the discovery of a few more killings using chloroform injections to the heart – killings which, in the "economy" of the Holocaust, would have represented a drop in the ocean?

It's worth noting here that the substance used for lethal injections according to the orthodox Holocaust story was not chloroform but rather phenol. For example, in its statement of grounds for sentencing at the Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial on August 19-20, 1965, the court wrote (Rüter 1981, pp. 416):

"Nearly every day in the HKB,^[408] among inmates who reported sick and, after an examination by an inmate physician, were presented to the camp physician (so-called physician presenters^[409]), those whom the camp physician deemed unfit for work were selected nearly every day. They were subsequently killed with phenol injections. The number of inmates killed in this way could not be ascertained. It was, in any event, several thousand."

Moreover, various order forms for phenol had been taken into evidence previously as "proofs" of this presumed homicidal practice.

The Auschwitz State Museum is in possession of a photo which depicts a request for 5 kg of phenol, sent by SS Sanitätsdienstgrad (orderly in the SS medical service) SS Unterscharführer Josef Klehr to the camp pharmacy (Apotheke). A syringe was placed on top of the request form, and then the photograph in question was taken. The caption explains that the two items together served to administer “lethal injections of phenol” (Długoborski/Piper 2000, Vol. II, p. 324)

The same document (without the syringe, of course) was sent by the Museum to the court in Frankfurt staging the Auschwitz Trial, where it was admitted into evidence as Exhibit No. 127.⁴¹⁰

In 1966, Polish researcher Jerzy Frąckiewicz published a letter from the “Häftlings-K-Bau Golleschau”⁴¹¹ dated February 26, 1943 and directed “to the pharmacy of Auschwitz CC, Upper Silesia” (“an die Apotheke des K.L. Auschwitz O/S”) in which, listed among various “materials for dressings and medicines,” a requested was made as well for “five liters of phenol” (5 Liter Phenol”; Frąckiewicz 1966, p. 72).

The “evidence” thus is clear: if prisoners were killed by lethal injection at Auschwitz, the injected poison was phenol. Yet Nyiszli knows nothing of this pretended use of the chemical for homicidal purposes, and never once mentions it.

Provan was so struck by the gross errors contained in Nyiszli's book that he even suspected that Nyiszli might not be its author. In particular, he was troubled by the fact that this “witness” spoke of four elevators in Crematorium II (Nyiszli's “Crematorium I”) when, as is well known, there was only ever one:

“Now, if Nyiszli had actually lived in crematorium I at Birkenau, as he claims, he would have to have known that there was only one elevator.”

Initially Provan thought the problem might be due to a simple error of transcription. The Hungarian text of the passage in question says “Négy nagy teherfelvonógép” (four large [freight] elevators), where négy means “four” and nagy means “large”; perhaps, Provan reasoned, Nyiszli had intended “Nagy nagy teherfelvonógép” (large, large elevator), but “his transcriber wrote the similar sounding (in Hungarian), but mistaken, ‘four large elevators’” instead (2001, p. 22). However, after corresponding with a personal friend of Nyiszli's who claimed to have seen him directly working on the book (that is, without a “transcriber”), Provan later abandoned this hypothesis (ibid.).⁴¹² Curiously, however, he failed to draw the obvious conclusion that if Nyiszli knew in 1945 that Crematorium II had only one elevator, then he must have intentionally lied about that fact in 1946, perhaps in order to make more credible his claims regarding the transport of 3,000 corpses from the crematorium's sub-basement to the cremation hall on the ground floor in a single day.

⁴¹¹ “Golleschau Prisoners' Hospital.” Golleschau (Polish Góleszów) was a sub-camp of Auschwitz located in the town of the same name some fifty kilometers away near the Czech border.

In the course of his research, Provan found yet another confirmation of Nyiszli's authorship, namely, evidence of Nyiszli's stay in America in 1939-1940, of which this passing reference appears in the book:

"My boss, it seems, is pleased. He has a little difficulty reading my block-capital handwriting. I became accustomed to writing this way in America!" (MBV, Chapter VIII)

Through the National Archives in Washington, Provan was able to locate Nyiszli's information on the passenger list of a ship which arrived in New York City on December 1, 1939, thus confirming this detail (ibid., p. 23).

Provan also sought to find confirmation of Nyiszli's activities at Birkenau in the testimony of other witnesses, and here things become more complicated.

He turns first to ex-Sonderkommando man Filip Müller who in 1980 wrote in response to questions from the late Australian revisionist John Bennett:

"I got to know Dr. Nyszli [sic] very well in early summer 1944. He had to work in the Sonderkommando with his colleagues, Prof. Görög and others, as a pathologist for Dr. Mengele. He was an outstanding and optimistic man ... I never saw Dr. Nyiszli again after the war. He is supposed to have died in 1949-1950." (Provan 2001, p. 24)

Here arises, however, the non-trivial problem – unacknowledged by Provan – that in his book of memoirs, published the year before, Müller not only never mentions Nyiszli, but explicitly asserts that there were only two physicians for the Sonderkommando, Dr. Pach and Dr. Bendel.

Müller introduces the former with the explanation that he was in charge of a sort of infirmary for patients from the Sonderkommando in Block 13 of Camp Sector BIId (Müller 1979a, p. 100):

"In charge of this hospital was Dr Jacques Pach, at that time the only doctor in the Sonderkommando. A very sensitive and intelligent man of about thirty-five, Dr Pach had come to Birkenau with a transport from France. His parents, as he told me, had emigrated to France from Poland. [...] It was in the spring of 1943 that Jacques Pach was appointed as doctor in the Sonderkommando."

Müller devotes the next few pages to a description of Dr. Pach's activities, then returns to him later in the book with this additional detail (ibid., p. 238):

"Once Dr Pach's ward for in-patients had been set up, the treatment of Sonderkommando out-patients was taken over by Dr Bendel."

According to Müller's account (ibid.), this in-patient ward was a new facility set up in the inmate infirmary in Camp Sector BIIf after the lodgings for the Sonderkommando were moved from BIId to the crematorium buildings in late June 1944 – hence after Nyiszli, by his own account, had become the sole doctor of the Sonderkommando in May 1944. Needless to say, Nyiszli knows nothing of this change of lodgings; for him, the Sonderkommando had always lived in the crematoria.

A “Pach Jean” (not Jacques) appears on the list of deportees on transport number 8 from Angers, France, which departed on July 20, 1942, and arrived at the camp the next day.⁴¹³ He was born June 15, 1908 in Bucharest, and thus it is probable that his family relocated to France from Romania rather than from Poland.

A Dr. Pach having duties in the camp hospital in BIIf is entirely unknown in the documentary record. The assertion that a Dr. Pach was part of the Sonderkommando was made, for the first time perhaps, by Henryk Tauber in his statement of May 25, 1945, but exclusively in reference to Block XI at the Auschwitz Main Camp, where the Sonderkommando was originally lodged before being relocated to Birkenau (Piper 2000, pp. 249f.):

“Our physician was Pach, a French Jew. He was a talented specialist who treated SS men and, through their good graces, managed to be transferred out of the Sonderkommando quarters to another block. When the Politische Abteilung [Political Department = Gestapo] found out about this, he was reassigned to work in our infirmary despite having spent several months in a free block.”

Tauber thus did not claim that Pach was doctor for the Sonderkommando in the crematoria in 1944, as maintained by Müller.

In her sworn statement of June 23, 1947, however, Hungarian deportee Olga Lengyel, who arrived in Birkenau in 1944, declared:

“At Birkenau, an inmate, Dr. Pasche [sic] of France, whom I met while working in the infirmary, told me that he worked in the gas chamber, and that he noticed that poison gas used on victims was labeled ‘Cyclone B’ gas which came from ‘Dessau’ and ‘Tabun’ gas (I am not sure of the spelling) which to the best of my recollection, came from ‘Dyhernfurt.’ Whether these plants where Cyclone B and Tabun gas were manufactured were Farben plants, I do not know. Many people in the underground told me that important people came from all over Germany to watch the time which was required to put these people to death by various gasses used.” (NI-11932, pp. 6f.)

This Dr. Pasche thus was part of the Sonderkommando in 1944, and observed the use in the crematoria of Tabun, a nerve gas which at that time was still one of Germany’s “secret weapons.” Needless to say, this latter claim forms no part of the orthodox Holocaust narrative today; curiously, it is also wholly unknown to Nyiszli, who surely would have added it to his cumulative list of “types of death” at Auschwitz had he been aware of it. Of course, as we have noted earlier, Nyiszli also appears to have been wholly unaware of the presence, in the same buildings with him, performing the same duties, of Dr. Pach himself!

Returning to Provan's study of Nyiszli, we are helpfully reminded that "Müller also testified about Dr. Nyiszli during the 1964 Frankfurt 'Auschwitz Trial'" (Provan 2001, p. 24). Indeed, on that occasion Müller declared (Fritz Bauer..., pp. 20,696-20,699; cf. Langbein 1965, Vol. I, p. 87):

"In 1944, during the Hungarian transports, there were two Hungarian physicians in Crematorium I in a room, pathologists. One of them, if I remember correctly, was called Dr. Nyiszli, a sturdy man. They had to conduct experiments. And they were often seen also by Dr. Mengele. [...] I once saw personally that they put a person who was hunchbacked in a barrel. They put in various salts or acids in order to obtain his skeleton. [...] And that they took flesh from people who had been shot there. They had taken it from the thighs and put it into a large bucket."

At the time of his deposition at the Auschwitz Garrison Trial (Krakow, November 25 to December 16, 1947), however, Müller knew nothing of Nyiszli. He declared then:⁴¹⁴

"In the Auschwitz camp, I also saw that the flesh of the non-Jewish detainees who were shot was used for various purposes. They were often shot in the presence of Mengele and others, whose names I do not know, and with Aumeier and Grabner present as well. Right away, the flesh of their calves would be put into boxes, and in this way they put aside 6 to 8 boxes of flesh each week. It sometimes happened that a German delegation arrived with the swastika on the arm, asking in the presence of Aumeier and Grabner whether there was any human flesh. Aumeier used to say: 'We could also use horse meat, but that would be a waste!'"

He knew nothing of Nyiszli even in 1957 when he wrote a witness account which first appeared in Czech in a book published in Prague, later translated into German (Kraus/Kulka 1957, pp. 160-164, here p. 163; 1958, p. 133):

"I did not accept this assignment, and as punishment I was transferred to Crematorium IV [V]. [...] There I was also witness to the 'scientific experiments' of the SS doctors Fischer, Klein and Mengele. They selected from the transports 100-150 men and women aged 18 to 30 years who were not gassed, but shot. Immediately after the shootings, they cut the flesh off their thighs and sent it to the Rajsko Bacteriological Institute, for the cultivation of bacteria. An SS who was a doctor's assistant told me this, and added that horse flesh could also be used for this purpose, but that that would be a shame."

Note that Müller locates these fables in Crematorium V (not Crematorium II!), and that he is ignorant of Mengele's alleged experimentation on twins as well as his supposed injections to his victims' hearts with chloroform. He is ignorant, thus, not only of Nyiszli himself, but also of the crimes Nyiszli claimed to have witnessed – crimes which Müller, as a member of the Sonderkommando, surely would have known about.

How then does one explain his mention of Nyiszli at the Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial? The answer is simple: just three years prior to his testimony during the 97th session of the court (October 5, 1964), the Munich weekly Quick published a German translation of Nyiszli's book in nine installments (Nyiszli 1961b). Müller clearly read it, for he would plagiarize it shamelessly in his own book Sonderbehandlung: Drei Jahre in den Krematorien und Gaskammern von Auschwitz in 1979, as I documented a few years later (Mattoigno 1986). Unlike in his testimony in 1964, however, Müller never mentions Nyiszli in his book, presumably to prevent curious readers from discovering his plagiarism.

As a final confirmation of Nyiszli's presence at Auschwitz, Provan calls upon another self-proclaimed member of the Sonderkommando, Milton Buki, who allegedly once mentioned a "Dr. Niczly [sic]" as among the doctors who performed dissections for Mengele, but apart from noting that it was supplied to him "by a very helpful associate of Dr. Lifton," Provan indicates neither the source nor the date of this declaration (2001, p. 25). In any event, the fact is that in his first known testimony, that of January 4 and 6, 1946 at the Auschwitz Garrison Trial,⁴¹⁵ Buki never once mentioned Nyiszli.

Finally, Provan appeals to the testimony of a certain "Mrs. Jozsef Szabo, a Hungarian deported to Auschwitz," who claimed to have once carried a body to one of the crematoria together with three companions, one of whom then recognized "Dr. Nyiszlit Miklos [sic] ...from Nagyvara" (2001, p. 25). However, Provan once again reports neither a source (apart from Dr. Lifton's "helpful associate") nor a date for this statement; it thus is unclear, for example, whether it postdates the publication of Nyiszli's story in the Hungarian press.

To all this one might add that Nyiszli is not mentioned even in the manuscripts written by various Sonderkommando members which are alleged to have been recovered near the ruins of the crematoria. The problem of "confirmation" thus is much more complicated than the simplistic methods adopted by Provan would imply.

A similar kind of simplistic thinking dogs Provan's efforts to make sense of the contradictions of the Nyiszli problem as a whole. In a section headed "First Appearance of Nyiszli's Auschwitz Book," Provan commits a gross blunder in this regard, writing that he had located "the long-sought original edition of Nyiszli's book," namely, its publication in installments in the newspaper Vilag (World) from February 16 to April 5, 1947, and announcing triumphantly: "Its title was: 'I Was Mengele's Autopsy Doctor in Auschwitz: A

Hungarian Doctor's Diary from Hell'" (ibid.). Provan failed to realize that Nyiszli's book had already been published in 1946 under essentially the same (main) title. As we shall see, this serious oversight would soon lead him to make an even more serious error.

On the basis of the Világ text, Provan explains, he hoped to verify whether or not the original book did indeed contain the errors pointed out by various revisionists in the translations available up to that time. Predictably, he finds confirmation in it of Nyiszli's "errors" regarding 20,000 cremations per day, the construction of the crematoria in 1940, the maximum population at Auschwitz of 500,000 prisoners, the four elevators in Crematorium II, and the 200-meter length of the "undressing room" and the "gas chamber" of that same building (ibid., pp. 26f.).

Provan then seeks to explain all these "errors" with an even greater blunder of his own. After examining various references to Nyiszli in Világ during and immediately after the book's serialization, he writes (ibid., p. 27):

"The next mention of Nyiszli in Vilag, so far as I have been able to ascertain, came on September 30, 1947, when an article reported on his summons to Nuremberg for the trial of IG Farben (case number six before the Nuremberg Military Tribunal). I regard this article as critical to understanding the true nature of Dr. Nyiszli's book on Auschwitz: it provides a solution which makes sense of all the incorrect information contained therein, and allows Nyiszli's other statements to be examined and assessed independently of his book."

Provan then proceeds to quote the article in question at some length. The key passage for his argument, however, comes in its first paragraph (ibid., pp. 28):

"Following its serial publication by Vilag, Dr. Miklos Nyiszli's Auschwitz diary has gone all over the world. The extremely interesting novel (again, 'regény' in Hungarian) of experience entitled, 'I Was Mengele's Autopsy Doctor' has been one of the most enduring documents of the German horror."

After a short digression dealing with issues concerning Nyiszli's "summons" to Nuremberg which were raised by the rest of the article, Provan then returns to this paragraph with emphasis (ibid., p. 29):

"When I read in the September 30, 1947, Vilag article that Miklos Nyiszli's book on his experiences at Auschwitz was a novel, it was as if a blindfold had fallen from my eyes. I had never considered this possibility before, but it certainly made sense on reading the article. It not only explained the inflated figures, the factual errors, and the singular account of the Sonderkommandos (thirteen in all!); it also removed all difficulties of 'explaining away the details.' Auschwitz is a novel. If a character in a novel meets a real personage, there is no historical issue to resolve. Dr. Nyiszli's 1945 deposition and his 1947 affidavit disagree with the book on many details because they are recording what he actually thought was the truth, while the book was deliberately crafted as a historical novel."

A truly amazing interpretation, whether for its naiveté or its incoherence!

First of all, the article from Világ quoted by Provan does indeed present Nyiszli's book as an "élményregény" ("novel of experience," or more literally, "experience-novel"), but it does not follow from this that the writer assumed that the account it contains is fictional, let alone that Nyiszli somehow was acknowledging as much through the agency of this unknown reporter. The larger context itself makes this clear: what sense would it have made for the writer to define Nyiszli's book as "one of the most enduring documents of the German horror" if he or she believed it was a simple (i.e., fictional) novel?

That Nyiszli himself insisted on the truth of his account is clear from his "Declaration" at the beginning of the book itself:

"I, the undersigned Nyiszli Miklós, M.D., ex-prisoner of the K.Z., bearer of tattoo number A-8450, hereby declare that in the work now published, the creation of my own hand, a work which contains within it the darkest pages in the history of humanity, free from all emotion and in strict conformity with the truth, and without the slightest exaggeration or embellishment, I write as the direct spectator of, and participant in, the activity of the crematoria and cremation pyres of Auschwitz, into whose flames vanished millions of fathers, mothers and children."

Perhaps Provan has forgotten here that he quoted this declaration himself (in Seaver's translation) just a few pages earlier: "[...] in accord with reality, avoiding the smallest exaggeration and embellishment [...]" (ibid., p. 26).

Provan certainly also neglects the certainly not-irrelevant fact that the definition of the book as an élményregény comes not from Nyiszli but from the Világ reporter, and that two other articles which appeared in Világ on February 14 and 15, 1947 announcing the book's serial publication, explicitly declared that it was not a novel ("Not a novel!" [Hungarian: "Nem regény!"]; "Dr. Miklos Nyiszli [...] did not write a novel" [Hungarian: "nem regényt"]) – a fact pointed out by Provan himself! (ibid.)

As far as Nyiszli was concerned, his book was indeed "what he actually thought was the truth," as is clear from what he has the prosecutor Minskoff say during his imaginary deposition at the I.G. Farben Trial – namely, that the book had been examined by "Our experts" and found to be truthful, and thus accepted as "documentary material" (see Section 2.2.1.). It is evident, thus, that Nyiszli himself presented his book as an important historical document, not a novel, and that he expected others to accept it as such – even if the scene in which this confirmation was (allegedly) given itself is an invention!

Finally, as we have seen above, Nyiszli firmly defended his book against Rassinier's criticisms – which certainly were not of a literary character – affirming explicitly (see Section 2.3.2.):

"However, I know for sure that anyone can check my writings both in their medical and technical aspects. There can be found only an image of incorruptible fidelity of the events without any exaggeration and without any passion, as I have stated it, by the way, in my statement signed with my own hand."

Provan's "novel" interpretation thus appears little more than a banal subterfuge in order to obviate, at a stroke, the many grave historiographical and technical problems with which Nyiszli's book abounds.

Another grave oversight on Provan's part is that he limited his search for references to Nyiszli in Világ to 1947 and thus, shockingly, knew nothing of the series of 27 articles by Nyiszli himself about his invented testimony at Nuremberg which appeared in the paper between April 18 and May 22, 1948 under the title "Tanú voltam Nürnbergben" ("I was a witness at Nuremberg"). Indeed, he concludes his discussion of Nyiszli's involvement in the I.G. Farben trial as follows:

"Although Dr. Nyiszli was summoned to Nuremberg to testify in the I.G. Farben Trial, he was not called to the stand. To explain this, Provan posits that Nyiszli, having been at Monowitz for only about two weeks, could provide little in the way of useful evidence. At some point in the trial, he was allowed to return home to Romania." (Provan 2001, p. 29)

Because he knows nothing of the fake "testimony" which Nyiszli later published in Világ – in which Nyiszli recounts, in detail, his "experiences" on the stand at the trial – Provan fails to comprehend the full significance of these facts, and thus fails to draw the inevitable conclusion that Nyiszli was a fraud of unequalled impudence – or alternatively a psychopath who delivered his "testimony" in a state of hallucination.

Hence, Nyiszli was either an extraordinary impostor or a lunatic; there is no escaping from the dilemma. And both horns of this dilemma – shameless mendacity or lunacy – disqualify Nyiszli and completely destroy his credibility.

Provan concludes his study with the following observations (ibid.):

"Within a few years of Világ's admission that the book was a novel, it was translated into French and German, and English, and wrongly declared to be an authentic history. This untruth aroused a storm of criticism, starting with the founder of Holocaust revisionism, Paul Rassinier, who himself had been a prisoner of the German concentration camp system for helping Jews under Nazi domination. While Rassinier's questions were justifiable on many points, they are moot, because Dr. Nyiszli's published treatment of Auschwitz was knowingly written as historical fiction, which accounts for its disconcerting mixture of truth and non-truth.

Thus the revisionists, although sometimes off course, were correct all along in concluding that there were serious problems with Auschwitz. For example Carlo Mattogno's critique, Medico ad Auschwitz: Anatomia di un falso, is a wonderful treatment, exhaustive and extremely thorough. Meanwhile, the defenders, translators, and publishers of the Nyiszli book have dealt with the revisionists' criticisms with silence, or by deliberately changing sections of Nyiszli's novel without advertising that. What is needed now is an annotated edition of the original book, along with a complete collection of Dr. Nyiszli's writings and testimony on Auschwitz, to clear the air on this long-standing problem."

Given that, according to Nyiszli's own repeated declarations, his 1946 book was not a novel but rather a historical account written "in strict conformity with the truth, and without the slightest exaggeration or embellishment," Provan's risible attempt to explain it away as a conscious fiction dissolves completely, and all the many problems which it raises, recognized (if only in minimal part) by Provan himself, remain intact.

The annotated edition and collection which Provan called for has now finally arrived, but its effect is to have "cleared the field" of a false testimony which has been taken seriously for much too long.

Dr. Mengele's "Medical Experiments" on Twins in the Birkenau Gypsy Camp

In 1997, Helena Kubica, researcher at the Auschwitz Museum, published a long German article titled "Dr. Mengele and His Crimes in the Auschwitz-Birkenau Concentration Camp" ("Dr. Mengele und seine Verbrechen im Konzentrationslager Auschwitz-Birkenau").⁴¹⁶ The author sifted through numerous documents on Dr. Mengele's activities at Birkenau preserved in the archives of the Museum in search of documentary proof of his presumed criminal medical experiments on twins. The situation is as follows.

Dr. Josef Mengele entered service at Auschwitz on May 30, 1943. His direct superior, SS Garrison Physician (SS-Standortarzt) Dr. Eduard Wirths, appointed him Camp Doctor (Lagerarzt) at the so-called Gypsy Family Camp (Zigeunerfamilienlager), located in Sector BIle of the Birkenau Camp (p. 376).

Mengele was particularly interested in the study of twins, especially identical twins, organizing a daycare center solely for this purpose (p. 381):

"In the gypsy camp, he caused Barracks 29 and 31 and a nursery – a sort of daycare center and pre-school – to house not only the children under his observation (these lived in Barracks 31), but all gypsy children up to 6 years of age.

A total of several hundred children were housed in the nursery school from 8 to 14 years of age, where they were supervised by many prisoners. [...] The barracks used as a nursery school were in slightly better condition than the others, entirely plastered on the inside, decorated with colored images representing fairy tales. For a short time, the children who lived there received a better diet – milk, butter, white bread, vegetables and meat broth concentrates, even marmalade and chocolate [...].

The area behind Barracks 31 was enclosed and a playground was installed, with sandboxes, carousel, swings and gymnastic equipment."

Naturally, for Kubica, all this was intended solely for "propaganda purposes" (ibid.). We need only inquire, however, for whom this alleged propaganda was intended, since not even the delegate from the Red Cross who visited Auschwitz in September 1944 was permitted to visit the Birkenau Camp (Comité international... 1946, pp. 91f.).

Translated by Carlos W. Porter. An earlier version of this article appeared as Mattogno 2008.

⁴¹⁶ Kubica 1997; all subsequent page numbers from there, unless stated otherwise.

And how about the diet, incredibly rich for a concentration camp – as confirmed by former inmate Anna Lipka (p. 389) – was this also solely intended for “propaganda purposes”?

This scene is not easy to reconcile with the unprecedented crimes attributed to Dr. Mengele, but Kubica has decisive “proof” to hand.

An epidemic of noma faciei, a gangrenous illness affecting mostly children, broke out in the Zigeunerlager in the summer of 1943. The patients were transferred on Dr. Mengele's order to an isolated barracks in the hospital of the Gypsy Camp and, we are assured by Kubica,

“many of the sick children were killed, always by order of Dr. Mengele, and their bodies were taken to the institute of hygiene of the Waffen-SS at Rajsko for histopathological research. There, preparations of the individual organs were prepared and preserved in glass, even including the entire head of a child, among others, for the SS academy of medicine in Graz.” (p. 379)

We learn from the pertinent footnote that the entire story is based exclusively on post-war testimonies. In this context, the author mentions a single document that she reproduces on p. 394, here reproduced in Illustration 3. The document is a bill of lading to the Institute of Hygiene of the Waffen-SS (SS-Hygiene-Institut) of Rajsko, Hygiene and Bacteriology Section, relating to the “head of a corpse” (“Kopf einer Leiche”) taken from a “12-year old child” (“12-jähriges Kind”). Nothing is known of the child's cause of death; the only thing that is certain is that the request for histological examination originated from the H-Krankenbau Zigeunerlager Auschwitz II, BIIe, that is, the prisoner hospital of the Gypsy Camp. The explanation advanced by Kubica is clearly specious. Noma faciei (or cancrum oris) is a disease which destroys the orofacial tissues. It currently strikes chiefly sub-Saharan African children between the ages of 2 and 16; in the absence of adequate treatment, the mortality rate ranges between 70 and 90% (see Enwonwu et al. 1999). One may therefore reasonably suppose that, at Birkenau during the years 1943-1944, the mortality rate of young gypsy children stricken with noma was even higher. In 1943, 2,587 children below the age of 10 died in the Gypsy Camp,⁴¹⁷ including practically all those suffering from noma.

But then, why would it have been necessary to kill children who were almost certainly dying of disease anyway?

The obvious response to this rhetorical question is supplied by Kubica herself by citing the testimony of Dr. Jan Čespiva, who had worked as a physician in the Gypsy Camp's infirmary (p. 379):

“There was an outbreak of noma. Entire pieces of flesh fell off due to this; the lower jaw was affected as well. I had never seen gangrene of the face like that. The crania of the children were prepared for the SS Academy at Graz. I know this because we wrote the address. The heads were preserved in benzene formaldehyde, the bodies [were cremated] in Crematorium III.”

It is therefore obvious that the child in question died of noma, and that the German physicians hoped to find a cure by studying the heads of children who had died of this disease.

This request for histological examination is the only documentary “proof” of Dr. Mengele’s “crimes” to be found in the archive of the Auschwitz Museum! Not much for the so-called “Angel of Death” of Auschwitz, and Kubica, apparently aware of this, as a last resort quotes the “eyewitness” Miklós Nyiszli, who becomes thus equally crucial to her.

After creating the school already mentioned above, Dr. Mengele created an “experimental laboratory,” which became the center where the “camp research in the field of twin births and congenital anomalies” was performed (p. 380) – hence, the ogre’s lair. As head of this center Dr. Mengele appointed Dr. Bertold Epstein from Prague. His assistant was another Czech physician, Dr. Rudolf Weisskopf (Vitek; p. 379). Two camp inmates also worked in Dr. Mengele’s laboratory: a Polish anthropology Ph.D., Martyna Puzina (p. 390), and the Czech painter Dinah Gottliebová, who produced drawings of the parts of the body of the children under examination (p. 396).

The activities of this “experimental laboratory” are well documented (p. 397):

"The archives of the Auschwitz-Birkenau Museum contain numerous documents signed by Dr. Mengele, such as requests for analysis by the Institute of Hygiene."

Yet no document attests to Dr. Mengele's presumed crimes. This is not at all surprising, considering the activities performed in his laboratory (p. 390):

"As shown by reports of inmates who performed tasks in the twins' block, as well as reports from the twins themselves, the individual pairs of twins were subjected by Dr. Mengele to research of any kind, which constituted the starting point for the performance of the most varied types of experiments on the same. In general, they were subjected to anthropometric, morphological, psychiatric and radiological research. The anthropological research was initially performed in Dr. Mengele's laboratory in the sauna of the Gypsy Camp. In November 1944, this laboratory was transferred to Barracks 15, in the area of the men's hospital sector (BIIf). Every individual part of the body of the persons subjected to examination was measured in the most accurate manner: the twins were measured in pairs, comparing the results. The documentation contained annotations of the shape of the mouth, the nose, the muscles of the ears, the color of the eyes and skin of the individual parts of the body."

There was no criminal activity, therefore, and it is easy to see what M. Puzyna and D. Gottliebová's tasks consisted of: anthropometrical studies and anatomical drawings.

Kubica adds (p. 403):

"All the documentation, that is, photographs, drawings, descriptions and analytical results, were preserved in individual folders for every person examined."

Some of these documents were even published. Notwithstanding this abundant documentation, Kubica notes (p. 382):

"Nevertheless, unfortunately, it has not been possible to find any document showing how many gypsy twins passed through Dr. Mengele's laboratory."

But a few pages later, the Polish researcher states (p. 387):

"The Archives of the State Museum of Auschwitz-Birkenau also contain a document which contains personal data and copies of anthropological studies on 295 inmates – Greek, Hungarian, Dutch, French and Italian Jews – upon whom Mengele performed experiments. This list also contains the names of 117 Hungarian Jewish pairs of twins in the women's sector of the camp. As for male twins from Barracks 15 of Camp BIIf, we know from the report on one pair of twins that there were 107 of them, aged from age 4 to 60."

Thus, the total number of documented twins available to Dr. Mengele amounted to between 402 and 412. What happened to them?

A series of daily reports, not mentioned by Kubica, although they can be found precisely in the Auschwitz Museum's archives, the Arbeitseinsatz (labor deployment) reports of the men's camp at Birkenau,⁴¹⁸ contain the heading "twins for experimental purposes" ("Zwillinge für Versuchszwecke") starting from July 28 up to October 3, 1944 (the reports are complete only for the month of August). In the 35 reports which are preserved, the number of these inmates never varies: it always is 49. This absence of variation over a period of more than three months allows us to rule out any continual replacement of "guinea pigs", and is fully compatible with the "anthropometric, morphological, psychiatric and radiological examinations" mentioned earlier.

Kubica, by contrast, claims that the fate of these twins was quite a different one (p. 404):

"The last stop in the search for several pairs of twins or individual persons was the analysis of the individual organs of the body during the autopsy. To this end, these persons were killed at Dr. Mengele's order or by Dr. Mengele himself, by an injection of phenol into the heart. The bodies were taken to the dissecting room."

At this point, the Polish researcher unveils her "crucial witness": none other than Miklós Nyiszli! The entire story about Dr. Mengele's "crimes" originates from the ravings of this mythomaniac.

Notwithstanding the absurd lies he told, Nyiszli is nonetheless held in high esteem by orthodox historiography, but, in a sort of veiled schizophrenia, only as regards his accusations against Dr. Mengele. And in fact, his testimony constitutes the "demonstrative" framework for the accusations of every book on the subject, starting with the book by Posner/Ware on Dr. Mengele (1986), one of the most important, which is also mentioned by Kubica. The two authors cite Nyiszli on their pages 19, 20, 26, 33, 34, 38, 39, 40, 41, 53 and 152. In fact, the entire chapter on the "crimes" of Dr. Mengele at Auschwitz is built upon Nyiszli's "testimony"! Even Robert Jay Lifton mentions him repeatedly.⁴¹⁹ Kubica cites him just as often. She even reproduces his photograph (p. 385) and cites him several times (pp. 378, 384, 404, 405, 408).

That Mengele's research did not involve the killing of twins was confirmed by Ernst Spiegel, who was deported to Auschwitz from Hungary in April 1944 with his twin sister, and was assigned to the Twin Block precisely in this capacity, where he had to supervise about 80 children.⁴²⁰

"I had to see to it, that they were brought to 'His Majesty Mengele.' They performed experiments on us."

In this regard he specified:

„The experiments were carried out in the Gypsy Camp or rather the Gypsy Block. I was present as an interpreter. I know nothing about twins having been shot and dissected during that time. I know nothing about that."

Dr. Mengele's "crimes" are not only not attested to by one single document, they are even overtly refuted by absolutely indisputable facts. In his description of the first autopsy allegedly performed by him on a pair of twins, Nyiszli wrote:

"My knees shake with excitement. I have discovered the Third Reich's darkest medical secret. So they kill people here not just with gas, but also with injections of chloroform administered to the heart!" (MBV, Chapter VIII)

If this had been true, Dr. Mengele would have proceeded to liquidate all the witnesses of his alleged criminal activity – his collaborators who also worked with twins – before leaving Auschwitz on 17 January 1945. He certainly had enough time to do it! But he allowed all the "eyewitnesses" of his alleged crimes to survive, to wit:

- Dr. Bertold Epstein, one of the signers of the famous appeal by former Auschwitz inmates dated 4 March 1945;⁴²¹
- Dr. Rudolf Weisskopf, liberated from Bergen-Belsen (Kárný 1995, Vol. I, p. 333);
- Martyna Puzyna, interviewed by Posner and Ware in June 1985 (Posner/Ware, p. 329);
- Dinah Gottliebová, who moved to the USA in 1947, where she lived until July 29, 2009;⁴²²
- Miklós Nyiszli, the purported crucial "witness", who, in his capacity as the physician of the so-called "Sonderkommando" at the crematoria, at the same time also would have been a keeper of the "terrible secret" of the mass gassings, as we have seen in the present study, was also quietly left alive!

But what about the twins? What happened to the victims of Dr. Mengele's experiments? Were they all killed en masse? Quite the contrary!

⁴²⁰ YVA, P.25-19. As a side note, according to an interview allegedly granted to Hubert Lassier and published by the weekly Oggi, Mengele reportedly said: "I never executed any twins specifically to be able to do experiments." (Lassier 1983). The contents of many declarations by, or attributed to, Mengele are, however, clearly false, so that this source is without doubt spurious.

⁴²² After the war she went to Paris, where she married Art Babbitt in 1949 (artist's name of Arthur Harold Babitsky); see Lentz 2010, p. 24.

Kubica informs us that, in 1984, these twins were still numerous enough to form their own association (p. 429):

“In 1984, the victims of Dr. Mengele’s experiments, who had lived in the children’s camp, formed the organization Children of Auschwitz Nazi Deadly Lab Experiment Survivors (CANDLES), with the self-appointed task of documenting Mengele’s crimes, informing the world, capturing the ‘Angel of Death’ and dragging him before a court.”

The Website of the association lists almost 400 twins from Auschwitz.⁴²³ Kubica also presents a list of twins from Auschwitz, consisting of over 320 names (pp. 437-455). The great majority of them were twins, but some were merely siblings, such as the sisters Tatiana Liliana and Alessandra Bucci. Both were deported to Auschwitz on March 29, 1943. The first, born on September 19, 1937, was registered under number 76484; the second, born July 1, 1939, was registered under number 76483 (Picciotto 1995, p. 157). Luigi Ferri, born on September 9, 1932, was deported in August 1944 and registered under number B-7525 (ibid., p. 266). Sergio de Simone, born at Naples on November 29, 1937, was deported to Auschwitz on March 29, 1944, at the age of nearly seven years, and registered under number 179614 (ibid., p. 217).

No orthodox historian has yet succeeded in explaining why these children were not gassed immediately upon arrival. In reality, this is not so surprising, because on January 16, 1945, in just the men’s camp at Birkenau, there were 770 “adolescents aged up to 18 years” (“Jugendliche bis 18. Jhr.”), in addition to 400 invalids (“Invaliden”)!⁴²⁴ When the Soviets arrived, there were still 205 children at Birkenau, from just a few months up to 15 years of age, many of them twins (see Table 1).

The three documents mentioned above, the list of the CANDLES organization, the list compiled by Kubica and the Soviet list of 1945, in addition to the Soviet list of inmates liberated at Birkenau,⁴²⁵ permit the compilation of a list of 543 twins having passed through Auschwitz (see Table 2). Of these, 376 survived until the liberation of the camp; four died in the following months, one died on the evacuation transport on January 27, 1945, and twelve perished during the existence of the camp. Nothing is known of the remaining 154.

In just three cases, Kubica notes: “died [not: killed] in the camp as a result of the experiments performed [on them]” (“Starb im Lager infolge der durchgeführten Experimente”; pp. 442, 449, 451), so that these three would seem to constitute Dr. Mengele’s victims. It goes without saying that such an assumption is in no way backed up by proof of Mengele’s personal complicity.

In conclusion, the known facts are as follows:

Dr. Mengele's alleged crimes are not substantiated by any document. No document shows that Mengele ever killed even one single child, or that one single child was ever killed on his orders. The crucial and sole witness, the one upon whose testimony the whole accusation is based, was an extraordinarily imaginative impostor. Dr. Mengele's closest collaborators, including this presumed crucial witness, and at least 543 of his "victims" were allowed to live. But then, how could anyone seriously believe in the fable of the "Angel of Death" of Auschwitz?

Nyilatkozat.

Alulírott dr. Nyiszli Miklós orvos, volt — A. 8450 — tetoválási számot viselő K. Z. fogoly, e szerzésemben megjelenő művet, mely az emberiség történetének legsötétebb lapjait foglalja magában, minden indulattól mentesen, a valóságnak megfelelően, a legkisebb túlzás és kiszínezés mellőzésével írtam meg, mint közvetlen szemlélője és szereplője az Auschwitz-i krematóriumok és máglyák munkájának, melyeknek tüzeiben apák, anyák és gyermekek milliói enyésztek el.

Mint az Auschwitz-i krematóriumok I-ső orvosa, számtalan boncolási és törvényszéki orvostani jegyzőkönyvet szerkesztettem és láttam el tetoválási számom kézjeggyével. Ezen okmányokat főnököm, dr. Mengele ellenjegyezte, így lettek általam a Berlin-Dahlem-i Institut für rassenbiologische und anthropologische Forschungen címén a világ egyik legelőkelőbb orvosi fóruma számára postázva. Ma is fellelhetők kell legyenek a nagy kutatóintézet irattárában.

Munkám megírásával nem törekszem irodalmi sikerre. Nem író, orvos voltam, midőn a minden képzeletet fölülmúló borzalmakat átéltem és most, midőn leírásra kerültek, nem a riporter, hanem az orvos tollával írtam meg azokat.

Kelt Oradea—Nagyvárad, 1946 március havában.

volt, majd dr. Mengele a hullakamrába vitette. Így következett ezen az éjszakán mind a 14 ikernek a meggyilkolása. Dr. Mengele megkérdezte tőlünk, hogy hány hullának a boncolását vállaljuk naponta, ő úgy gondolja, hogy 7 - 8-at eltudunk végezni. Mi erre azt feleltük, hogyha precíz tudományos munkát kíván, úgy átlag négy halottat tudunk naponta felboncolni. Ebbe bele is egyezett.

Az anyagot a tudományos boncolásokhoz a Lagerből, vagy a frissen érkező transzportokból kaptuk. Május, június, július hónapokban naponta 3 - 4 magyar transzport érkezett az auschwitzi Judenrampe-ra. A szelektálásokat Dr. Mengele és dr. Tilo végezték, felváltva. A szelektálások munkára való alkalmasság szerint, és néha egészen szeszélyesen történtek. A szelektálás a megérkezett transzportot jobb és baloldalra különítette. A jobb oldal az életet, a baloldal a krematóriumot jelentette. Százalékarányosan 75 - 80% került a baloldalra, gyermekek, gyermekes anyák, öregek, terhesek, testi fogyatkozásuk, hadirokkantak. Néhány persze mulva a baloldal laasan lépkedve kézicsomagjaival elindult balfelé. A krematóriumok kétoldoz méterre voltak a Judenrampe-től és parancs szerint kanyarodott be a cca. 2000-es baloldali tömeg az 1-es, 2-es, 3-as és 4-es krematórium kapuján. A krematóriumba érve 10 - 12 betonlépcsőn egy 2000 személyt befogadó földalatti betonhelyiségbe mentek. Az első sor megtorpant a lejárathoz, de midőn az összes világnyelveken írt táblát "Desinfektion" és "Fürdő" elolvasták, megnyugodva lementek a helyiségbe. Ott azonnal parancsot kaptak a levetkőzésre, a terem falai körül padok voltak, a padok fölött fogasok, a fogasokon számok és az SS annyira ment a félrevezetésben, hogy figyelmeztette a tömeget, hogy mindenki jegyezze meg a fogasa számát, hogyha a fürdőből visszajön, a ruháit könnyen megtalálja. A tömeg nyugodt is lett volna, csupán az idézett elő zavart köztük, hogy férfi, nő, gyermek egyaránt előtt volt kénytelen levetkőzni. Kb. 10 pernyi vetkőzés után a 2000-es tömeget már kissé durvábban a következő 2000 személyt befogadó betonhelyiségbe terelték, ahol azonban már semmiféle berendezés, sőt ablak sem volt. Ez volt a gázkamra. A nehéz tügyfaajtókat becsapták mögöttük, a villanyt eloltották és a következő percekben megjelent egy vöröskeresztes luxusautó, amiből egy orvos, százados és egészségügyi altisztje négy darab cca. 1 kg-os bádogdobozt vettek ki. A négy betonlapot, ami a föld felszínéről a földalatti bunkerbe vezető szellőztetőket fedte, eltávolították, gázálcot vettek fel, beültették a bádogdoboz fedelét és a babszenhez hasonló, liláspiros, inkább borvörös színű klórszemcséket bepntötték a négy nyíláson át a gázkamrába, majd a betonlapokkal a nyílásokat azonnal lefedték. Egy alkalommal magam is fültanuja voltam, midőn a gáz bedobásakor az orvos az egészségügyi altisztjét siettetve, azt mondta: "Gib schon das Pressen den Juden!" A gázszemcsék lehullottak és levegővel való érintkezés után klorgázt fejlesztettek, ami 5 - 10 percen belül a legkínosabb fulladásos halált idézte elő. Pélóra mulva elindultak a ventilátorok, a Sonderkommando beosztott emberei kinyitották a gázkamra ajtajait és ott feküdt 2000 elhalt véresen /orrvérzésből kifolyólag/ füccsel beniszkítva, nem egyenletesen széteázorva, a bunker egész hosszúságában, hanem emeletmagasan egymástartnyosulva, aminek magyarázata az volt, hogy a magasabb rétegekbe később érkezt el a klorgáz. A Sonderkommando a halottakat gunicővel lemosta és megkezdődött teher liftet a kazánterembe való szállításuk. A kazánterem 15 kazánból állott, mindegyik külön villanyventillátorral felszerelve. Betanult személyzet húzta a halottakat oly módon, hogy a szájukba sétatotnak a görbe felét dugták. Egy-egy kazánba egyszerre három halottat tettek, amelyek 20 perc alatt égtek hamuvá. Az előzetes előtt a fogrovos-kommandó a halottak aranyfogait eltávolította. Az u.n. hamu-kommandó gondoskodott a hamu időnkénti eltávolításáról és az esetleg el nem égett csontok százúzásáról. A hamut hetenként teherauton a közelben lévő Weichsel /Visztula/ folyóba dobták.

A krematóriumban az égetéseket 1944. nov. 17.-én országosan betiltották, nem is történt több gyilkosság, de hogy élő szemtanúi a politikai SS legsötétebb műhelytitkainak ne legyenek, a Sonderkommando 846 főből álló személyzetét az 1-es, 2-es, 3-as és 4-es krematóriumokból kivégezték d.u. 1/2 2 és 12 1/2 3 óra között. Száz magyar zsidó volt közöttük. Negyven orosz katonatiszt, a többiek zsidók voltak Franciaországból, Hollandiából, Belgiumból és Lengyelországból. Mi orvosok is ott feküdtünk bajtársainkkal a gépfegyverek előtt, de dr. Mengele - kinek fajbiológiai munkáját még nem fejeztük be - kivett bennünket a halálraítéltek közül. Munkánkat most már csendben gázsejtés és tarkolásvések nélkül végeztük, az elnéptelenedett krematóriumban 1945. január 18.-ig, amikor az oroszok Varanovice-nél és Krakko-nél áttörve a frontot, 6 km-re közelítették meg éjjélkor Auschwitzot. Iszonyú zűrzavar keletkezett az SS soraiban, bevitték bennünket a Lagerbe, ahol a soraunkra bíztak és teljesen magunkra hagytak bennünket. Ott összekeveredve a cca. 4000 fünyi Lager-fogollyal, többet senki sem tudta, hogy Sonderkommandosok vagyunk. Még aznap éjjel idegen SS személyzet kísért bennünket transzportba gyors futással Mauthausenba.

Erklärung unter Eid

Ich, Dr. Nyiszli NIKOLAE, Arzt, wohnhaft Oradia-Mare-Str. Vlahuta 44
Rumänien
geboren am 17.6.1901 in Simleu-Silvaniei, nachdem ich darauf aufmerksam gemacht worden bin, dass ich mich
wegen falscher Aussage strafbar mache, stelle hiermit unter Eid freiwillig und ohne Zwang folgendes fest:

1. Ich war bis zu meiner Verhaftung am 15. Mai 1944 als Königslicher Kreisarzt tätig. Am 19./20. Mai 1944 bin ich mit einem grossen Transport aus Ungarn in das Konzentrationslager Auschwitz gekommen. Dort wurde ich entlaust, meine Sachen wurden mir abgenommen und ich bekam einen neuen Häftlingsanzug. Am 20./21. Mai 1944 kam ich ~~mit etwa 600 rumänischen Häftlingen~~ nach Monowitz, das Konzentrationslager der IG-Farben, Werk Auschwitz. In Monowitz wurden wir wieder entlaust, die neue Häftlingskleidung wurde uns abgenommen, und wir bekamen alte, zerrissene Häftlingsanzüge. Am nächsten Tag war ich in der Zell-Quarantäne. Am darauffolgenden Tag wurde ich in Block 8, Beton-Kommando 179, zur Arbeit auf dem IG-Farben-Baugelände eingeteilt. Nach etwa 2 Wochen kam der Befehl, dass ^(Erlaubnis) Ärzte nicht mehr mit den Kommandos zur Arbeit ausrücken sollten. Wir ^{7 Ärzte} Ärzte wurden nach Birkenau, F-Lager, Block 12, gebracht. Dort wurden wir entlaust und bekamen fremde Zivilkleidung. Kurz darauf wurde mir von SS-Hauptsturmführer Dr. MENGELE befohlen, als Pathologe im Krematorium von Birkenau tätig zu sein.]

Am 18. Januar 1945 wurde ich im Zuge der Räumung des Lagers
Birkenau nach Mauthausen gebracht. Von dort wurde ich nach Melk/Donau transportiert. Anfang April 1945 kam ich nach Ebensee, wo ich am 5. Mai in schwerkranken Zustand von den Amerikanern befreit worden bin.

2. Bei der Ankunft in Monowitz am 20./21. Mai 1944 wurde uns - wie bereits erwähnt, waren wir 6000 Häftlinge - eine Ansprache gehalten. Uns wurde mitgeteilt, dass wir im Konzentrationslager der IG-Farbenindustrie, Monowitz, seien, und dass wir nicht zum Leben dort seien, sondern zum Verrecken im Beton. Ich wusste nicht, was das Wort Beton bedeuten soll. Nach ein paar Tagen habe ich von alten Häftlingen erfahren, dass auf dem Baugelände der IG-Farben, speziell bei den Kabel-Kommandos, früher 20-25 Häftlinge während der Arbeit erschossen oder totgeschlagen worden waren. Diese Häftlinge sind in die Gräben, die für die Kabel ausgehoben waren, geworfen und mit Beton übergeben worden. Unter dem Beton soll eine grössere Anzahl von Häftlingen, besonders aus Breslau und Berlin, liegen.

3. IG-Farben-Ingenieure teilten die Arbeit bei allen 200 dort auf der IG-Baustelle eingesetzten Häftlings-Kommandos ein. Anhand von Zeichnungen erteilten sie den Vorarbeitern ihre Instruktionen.

4. Ich war Augenzeuge wie bei mehreren Unglücksfällen; selbst schwerster Natur, auf dem Baugelände keine erste Hilfe gegeben wurde. Die Kranken oder Verunglückten mussten bis zum Einrücken sämtlicher Kommandos auf dem Baugelände liegen bleiben und erst nachdem manchmal stundenlang dauernden Appell kamen sie in den Häftlings-Krankenbau.

5. Es war allgemein bekannt, dass die Kranken nach 3-4 Wochen, falls sie nicht genesen waren, auf Transport geschickt wurden,

6. Als ich in dem Krematorium von Birkenau tätig war, habe ich mich in 3 Fällen überzeugt, dass ca. 2-300 Häftlinge zählende Transporte aus Monowitz zur Vergasung kamen, also Häftlinge, die bei IG-Farben gearbeitet hatten. Auch die SS-Leute haben offen darüber gesprochen.

7. Besonders gekennzeichnet waren die zur Vernichtung nach Birkenau geschickten Häftlingstransporte aus Monowitz nicht, da alle Transporte, die zur Vernichtung bestimmt waren, ihr Lager in ganz zerrissenen Kleidern und Schuhen verliessen.

8. In meiner Eigenschaft als Pathologe im Birkenauer Krematorium habe ich öfters auf dem IG-Farben-Gelände verunglückte Tote mit Begleitschreiben übernehmen und sezieren müssen. Von den Todesursachen habe ich genaue Protokolle erstellen müssen. Mit dieser scheinbar gesetzlichen, um die Häftlinge besorgt seienden Genauigkeit in einzelnen Fällen wollten die IG-Leiter im Einvernehmen mit der SS das spurlose Verschwinden von Tausenden von Häftlingen verschleiern.

9. Ich habe nach vollendeter Vergasung Zyklon B-Kerne in der Hand gehabt. Die grünen emaillierten Büchsen wurden mit einem Roten Kreuz-Auto durch einen SS-Hauptsturmführer und einen SDG an Ort und Stelle gebracht, durch diese in die Gaskammern geworfen. Nach erfolgter Entleerung der Büchsen wurden sie von Häftlingen mit Wasser ausgespült und von den beiden erstgenannten Personen wieder mitgenommen.

10. Zur Vergasung von Häftlingen mit Zyklon B in den unterirdischen Gaskammern von Birkenau kann ich folgendes sagen: Auf Grund meiner persönlichen Beobachtungen - ich musste des öfteren Medikamente und Augengläser aus dem Auskleideraum neben der Gaskammer nach Durchsuchen der Handtaschen der Vergasten herausbefoerdern - weiss ich, dass man die Tueren verschlossen hat und das Licht zentral ausloeschte, sowie die Masse der Menschen in den Gaskammern war. In diesen Augenblick ist ein schwarzlackiertes Rote-Kreuz-Auto angekommen. Es stiegen ein SS-Offizier und ein SDG aus dem Wagen. Sie hielten 4 gruen emaillierte Buechsen in der Hand. Sie gingen an die niedrigen Betonschornsteine, die mit Betondeckeln zugedeckt waren und legten Gasmasken an. Die Buechsen wurden geoeffnet und der Inhalt der Buechse - Zyklon B in koerniger Form von rosa-lila Farbe - in die Oeffnung eingeworfen. Die Koerner zerstreuten sich nicht in der Gaskammer, da sie durch perforierte Roehren abwaertsfielen, und gaben durch Beruehrung mit der Luft sofort Gas ab. Dadurch dass die Gaskoerner zu Boden fielen, hat sich das Gas zuerst auf den niedrigsten Luftschichten entwickelt und stieg dann allmaechlich hoeher. Damit kann ich es erklaren, dass die Leichen nach vollendeter Vergasung im Raum nicht verstreut lagen, sondern in turnfoermigen Haufen. Wahrscheinlich haben die Staerkeren die Schwaecheren niedergeworfen, sind auf die unten Liegenden geklettert, um ihr Leben durch Erreichen noch gasfreier Schichten zu verlaengern. So kam es, dass die Frauen und Kinder und alte Leute meistens unten lagen. Als Arzt stellte sich folgende Diagnose: Tod durch zentrale respiratorische Laehmung.

12. Im Stammlager Auschwitz waren oeffter Besuche, in den Krematorien ebenfalls. Sie waren aber immer in SS-Uniformen, daher nicht bekannt. Zum Beispiel die Oefen von den Krematorien wurden von der Spezialfabrik Topf & Soehne geliefert. Dieser Name war auf jedem Ofen eingegossen. Bei einer Gelegenheit schickte diese Fabrik einen Spezialfachmann fuer die Revision der Apparate. Er war ein Mann von mindestens 60 Jahren. Ich habe einige Worte mit ihm gesprochen, meiner Meinung nach war er ein Ingenieur in der Uniform eines SS-Oberscharfuhrers. So war es auch fuer IG-Leute moeglich, in Auschwitz zu erscheinen und unerkannt zu bleiben.

Ich habe jederder fuenf (5) Seiten dieser Erklaerung unter Eid sorgfaeltig durchgelesen und eigenhaendig gegengezeichnet, habe die notwendigen Korrekturen in meiner eigenen Handschrift vorgenommen und mit meinen Anfangsbuchstaben gegengezeichnet und erkläre hiermit unter Eid, dass ich in dieser Erklaerung nach meinem besten Wissen und Gewissen die reine Wahrheit gesagt habe.

Eskü alatt tett nyilatkozat.

En, Dr. Nyiszli Miklós, orvos, Oradea-1, Vlahuta u. 44. sz. alatti lakos, Románia, 1901 június hó 17. én születtem, Simleul-Sylvaniei-ben, miután arra lettem figyelmeztetve, hogy hamis ~~max~~ vallomás miatt büncselekményt követek el, eskü alatt, önként, minden kényszer nélkül a következőket jelentem ki:

1. Elfogatásom idejéig, 1944. május 15-ig, mint királyi körorvos működtem, 1944. május 19 én egy nagy transzporttal Magyarországról az auschwitz-i koncentrációtáborba érkeztem. Ott tetvetlenítettek, dolgaikat elvették és egy új fegyencruhát kaptam. 1944. május 20. án Monowitzba érkeztem, az I.G. művek koncentrációtáborába. Monowitzban ismét tetvetlenítettek bennünket, az új fegyencruháinkat elvették és rongyos ruhákat kaptunk helyettük. Másnap a sátorquaranténben voltunk, a következő napon beosztást nyertem a 8 sz. barakkba, a 197 sz. betonkommandóhoz mely az I.G. művek építkezési telepén dolgozott. Körülbelül két hét múltán parancs érkezett hogy orvosok, kik pathológiában jártasak nem vonulnak többé ki a kommandókkal, mi, két ilyen orvos Birkenauban, az F. tábor 12-es barakkjába lettünk szállítva. Ott tetvetlenítettek bennünket és idegen civilruhákat kaptunk. Rövid idő múltán Dr. Mengele SS. Hauptsturmführer rendeletére, mint korbáncok a Birkenau-i krematóriumban kellett dolgozzunk.

1945. január 18. én a Birkenau-i tábor kiürítése alkalmával Mauthausenbe vittek, Onnan Melk/Donau-ba szállítottak. 1945 április elején Ebensee-be kerültem, ahol súlyos beteg állapotban 1945 május 5. én az amerikaiak felszabadítottak.

2. 1944 május 20-án, midőn, mint ahogy említettem Monowitzba érkeztem, egy beszéddel fogadtak. Hátzren voltunk. Közölték velünk, hogy mi az I.G. Monowitz-i koncentrációtáborában vagyunk és nem élni, hanem elpusztulni a betonban a sorsunk. Nem tudtam a beton kifejezés mit jelent. Néhány nap múlva megtudtam régi foglyoktól, hogy az I.G. építkezési telepen, különösen a kábelkommandóknál, régebben 20-25 foglyok lőttek agyon, vagy vertek agyon munkaközben. Ezen foglyok holttesteit a kábelek számára készített árokba dobták és a betont rájuk öntötték. A beton alatt így nagyszámu fogoly kell, különösen Breslau- és berlini származásuak, feküdjenek.

3. I.G. mernökök osztották be a munkát az összes ott foglalkoztatott 200 kommandónál az I.G. építkezési telepen. Rajzok nyomán adták ki az előmunkásoknak az utasításikat.

4. Szemtanuja voltam több balesetnek, egészen súlyosaknak is. A telepen első segélyt nem nyújtottak. A betegek, vagy sérültek az összes kommandók bevonulásaig a telepen feküdtek és csupán a néha orákig tartó számbavétel után jutottak a kórházba.

5. Általánosan tudott dolog volt, hogy betegek, kik 3-4 hét alatt nem gyógyultak transzportba kerültek, azaz elgázosításra, vagy tarkólovásra Birkenaubába,

1.12.6. Birkenau-1 működése alatt három esetben győződtem meg arról, hogy
 1.12.6. cca 2-300 foglyot számláló transzportok érkeztek Monovitzból a

R.M.N. ezzel magyarázom azt, hogy a hullák befejezett elgázosítás
 O.M.N. után nem feküdtek szerteszéjjel, hanem egyhalomban, toronyformában.
 R.M.N. Valószínűleg az erősebbek a gyengébbeket letiporták, és azokra
 O.M.N. kapaszkodva igyekeztek a gáztól még el nem ért régióba jutni, meg
 O.M.N. hosszabítani akarva néhány másodperccel életüket. Így történt az,
 O.M.N. hogy nők és gyermekek, valamint öregek alól feküdtek. Mint orvos a

 O.M.N. központi bénulása.

R.M.N. 11. Vezető I.G. személyeket névszerint nem ismerek. Monovitzban
 O.M.N. működött egy vegyészprofesszor, ki vezető személyiség kellett le-O.M.N. gyen. Vezető I.G. személyiségek tudomással kellett bírjanak a meg-
 O.M.N. semmisítési munkáról, mivel nagyrészt Auschwitz városában laktak,
 O.M.N. a krematóriumok kéményeinek és a két nyitott maglya tüzei pedig

12. Az Auschwitz-i törzstáborban gyakran voltak látogatók, a krematóriumokban szintén, ilyenek azonban mindig SS, egyenruhákban voltak, tehát ismeretlenek. Például a krematóriumok kemencéit Topf és Fial gyár készítette, F név volt a kemencékbe öntve. Egy alkalommal ez a gyár egy szakembert küldött a kemencék és üzem felülvizsgálatára. 60 év körüli férfi volt. Néhány szót beszéltem vele. Véleményem szerint mérnök volt, egy SS-Oberscharführer uniformisában. Így az is lehetséges volt, hogy I.G. személyek is megjelenhettek Auschwitzban és ismeretlenek maradhattak.

13. A krematóriumok Sonderkommandóitól naponta mentek élelemért a Birkenauli táborba, így legszigorúbb ellenőrzés mellett is adódott számukra lehetőség ottani foglyokkal érintkezni, mialtal a krematóriumok működése minden fogoly előtt tudott dolog volt.

Ezen öt oldalt kitevő nyilatkozatot, melyet eskü alatt tettem, gondosan átolvastam és sajátkezűleg aláírtam, a szükséges javításokat saját kezűleg eszközöltem és nevem kezdőbetűivel jelöltem meg, és ezennel is eskü alatt jelentem ki, hogy ezen nyilatkozatot legjobb tudásom és lelkiismeretm szerint a tiszta igazságok megfelelően tettem meg.

Des personnes d'orientation différentes lisent des faits émouvants relatés dans mon livre avec des sentiments divers. Un tel, avec sympathie, un tel autre avec indifférence et un troisième avec animosité. Il y en a aussi qui le lisent tel Mr. Paul Rassinier avec un ergotage bienveillant. Mais il y en a beaucoup qui passent à côté de l'essentiel et regardent les détails, sans importance, à travers une loupe ou plutôt un ultra-microscope et ainsi, sans même le vouloir, applatissent et minimisent la série des crimes uniques dans leur genre qui y sont relatés. Je réponds brièvement dans ce qui suit aux diverses questions soulevées par Mr. Rassinier.

1° Je le remercie de reconnaître que mon ouvrage est le premier qui donne une description précise sur le travail des usines d'assèchement d'Auschwitz et Birkenau, aussi que sur la technique de la mort donnée par le gaz. Ceci a été reconnu par la Cour Internationale de Nuremberg aussi, mais également par 17 débats publics organisés dans la présence de plusieurs milliers de déportés.

2° En ce qui concerne les chiffres que j'ai indiqués, j'ai l'honneur de vous communiquer qu'ils sont exacts. Ceci a été reconnu par un des accusés principaux du procès de Nuremberg, le Hauptsturmfuehrer Hoess qui a été le Commandant du Camp du 1^{er} Mai 1940 au 31 Décembre 1943 et qui selon ses aveux enregistrés transcrits S 7821 a déclaré que durant cette période 2 500 000 personnes ont été assassinées dans les chambres à gaz et 500 000 autres sont mortes par suite de la famine, de mauvais traitements et du travail épuisant. Il est donc énoncé l'affirmation selon laquelle les chambres à gaz ont recommencé leur travail en 1943 et qu'en Mars 1944 le Camp d'Auschwitz-Birkenau aurait déjà été évacué. Car enfin nous autres déportés hongrois ~~entrepris~~ nous y sommes arrivés au Mois de Mai 1944 et à fin Juillet déjà 550 000 Juifs hongrois ont péri dans les chambres à gaz. C'était justement en 1944 que l'assèchement a prit les proportions les plus importantes car après Stalingrad les Russes faisaient reculer les armées allemandes sur un front de plusieurs milliers de kilomètres et la perspective encore non envisagée d'une défaite a fait hâter le rassemblement de tous les ghettos encore existants et a fait hâter le travail de crématorium. A ce sujet j'ai écrit assez et d'une façon suffisamment explicite.

3° Donc les chiffres que j'ai indiqués sont entièrement justifiés et ceux qui critiquent sont entièrement erronés. Nous avons évacué Auschwitz-Birkenau le 18 Janvier 1945 et les ~~raus~~ déportés qui ont survécu ont appelé cette évacuation: la marche de la mort; elle s'est terminée, comme je l'indique aussi dans mon journal, à Mauthausen.

4° Le nombre des Crématoriums. A savoir qu'ils fussent 4 ou 5 c'est un ergotage inutile. Cependant pour rassurer je vous communique qu'il y avait 4 à Birkenau et un à Auschwitz, distant à 3 kilomètres. Prochainement je vais vous envoyer le plan original et authentique du Camp de Birkenau, sur lequel figure chaque baraque et chaque crématorium aussi. Vous pourrez vous rendre compte quant à l'exactitude des chiffres des crématoriums.

5° Durée de la crémation. Il est tout à fait inutile de nous adresser aux spécialistes du Père Lachaise, car les experts de ce crématorium ne sont que des petits artisans en comparaison avec ce qui ^{me}servaient les fours en provenance des Etabliss. Topf & Soehne, entreprise spécialisée dans la construction et agencement des crématoriums. De plus je crois pouvoir prétendre au titre d'expert le plus qualifié en cette matière. J'ai eu l'occasion ^{de} pendant 8 mois directement et de près le travail des crématoriums. A un moment d'emprise sentimentale j'ai même formulé à l'Oberscharführer Mussfeld la demande suivante: L'orequ'ils en auront assez de moi et que sur ordre du docteur Mengele il/ devra me liquider d'une balle dans la nuque, qu'il ne le fasse pas dans le couloir sombre de la salle, mais près du premier four. Ainsi mon camarade de service ce jour-là ne serait pas obligé/ de me trainer par une courroie attachée à mes poignés, le long du béton du sol, enlevant ainsi la peau de mon visage et faisant de moi un mort défiguré. Par contre, ils pourront, selon l'expression en usage m'"einschieben" dans le four à l'endroit même où je suis mort.

6° Donc la durée de la crémation est une chose à Père Lachaise et une autre à Birkenau. Ça peut durer une heure dans le premier, cela a duré pas plus de vingt minutes dans le second. Les explications sont les suivantes: Les morts du Père Lachaise étaient généralement convenablement nourris avant leur décès et leur incinération est accompagnée d'une cérémonie solennelle. En outre la durée de l'incinération est directement proportionnelle avec l'intensité de la chaleur et, en raison inverse, avec le degré hygrométrique de l'objet à incinérer. Les morts de Birkenau par suite des séjours dans les ghettos, Camp de Concentration et travail inhumain, n'étaient que ^{des} os, pour ainsi dire des squelettes ambulants. Les fours étaient chauffés avec de la coke et près de chacun un ventilateur ayant la hauteur d'un étage, mue par un puissant moteur électrique, était installé. L'incinération elle-même n'était pas une cérémonie, mais une "Entloesung", anéantissement à la chaîne où ^{on} a été utilisé tout ce que la technique moderne peut fournir. L'anéantissement se poursuivait jour et nuit. C'est très rarement qu'un crématorium s'arrêtait pour une brève période. Lorsqu'une réparation ou entretien/ étaient vraiment indispensables.

7° Le critique ne parle que des sélections périodiques qui concernaient 300 personnes et laisse complètement de côté la destruction des transports. Ces transports ^{se} composaient ^{de} quelques ~~se~~ 5 à 6 rames quotidiennes, chacune de 40 à 50 wagons, amenés de chaque coin de l'Europe, exprès pour être détruit ici. Ce n'est qu'à titre de curiosité que je mentionne que ces rames étaient très souvent composées des vieux et désuets wagons français. Ces rames amenaient en moyenne 4000 déportés chacune (90 personnes dans un wagon). Sur ces 4000 dans les meilleurs cas 1000 étaient envoyés à droite, les autres directement dans un crématorium. En/ outre j'ai parlé aussi de deux bûchers que mon critique semble avoir complètement oublié/ dans son calcul.

8° En ce qui concerne les dimensions de la salle de déshabillage et de la chambre à gaz, je veux bien admettre que je ne les ai pas mesurés. De plus je ne suis ni ingénieur, ni technicien qui pourrait établir simplement d'après appréciation la grandeur d'un endroit. Comme je l'ai dit à la préface même de mon livre, je n'avais pas écrit avec la plume d'un reporter, mais avec celle d'un médecin. Il se peut aussi qu'en 1946 lorsque j'ai écrit mon livre, sous l'avalanche des horreurs et sous le poids des impressions suraigües, ma vue n'ait pas été aussi claire que celle de quelqu'un qui vient de l'extérieur avec un oeil scrutateur. Il se pourrait donc que les salles n'aient été que de 100 ou 120 m de long. Ceci ne change rien quant aux faits et ne peut nullement mettre en doute l'authenticité des données. Je ne peux même pas accepter d'indiquer avec précision rigoureuse les dimensions de ma propre chambre. Enfin je ~~vous~~ remercie, Monsieur Rassinier, de s'être occupé des données que j'ai fournies et de les avoir trouvées uniques dans leurs points essentiels? J'approuve mon critique lorsqu'il affirme que des nombreuses publications renferment des données fausses et contribuent ainsi à faire naître le doute quant à l'authenticité des événements. Cependant je sais pertinemment que n'importe qui peut contrôler mes écrits aussi bien sur leur aspect médical que technique. On ne pourrait y trouver qu'un ~~image~~ d'une fidélité incorruptible des événements sans aucune exagération et exempt de toute passion, comme je l'ai dit d'ailleurs dans ma déclaration signée de ma main. Je peux cependant confier que tout ce que j'ai décrit ~~ne sont que~~ ~~des fragments~~ ~~de~~ un coup d'oeil, lancé dans la lueur ~~éblouissante~~ d'un éclair. Je pourrais écrire mille fois autant si je n'étais saturé des horreurs.

BETRIEBSVORSCHRIFT

des koksbeheizten Topf-Dreimuffel-

Einäscherungsofen

Vor Beschickung der beiden Koksgeneratoren mit Koks muss der Rauchkanalschieber am Ofen geöffnet werden.

Nunmehr kann in den beiden Generatoren Feuer angezündet und unterhalten werden, hierbei ist zu beachten, dass die Sekundärverschlüsse rechts und links der Ascheentnahmetüren (Koksgeneratoren) geöffnet sind.

Nachdem die Einäscherungskammern gut rotwarm (ca. 800°C) sind können die Leichen hintereinander in die drei Kammern eingefahren werden.

Jetzt ist es zweckmässig das seitwärts am Ofen stehende Druckluftgebläse anzustellen und ca. 20 Minuten laufen zu lassen. Hierbei ist zu beobachten, ob zuviel oder zu wenig Frischluft in die drei Kammern eintritt.

Die Regulierung der Frischluft erfolgt durch die Drehklappe die sich in der Luftrohrleitung befindet. Weiterhin müssen die rechts und links der Einführtüren angeordneten Lufteintritte halb geöffnet werden.

Sobald die Leichenteile vom Schamotterrost nach der darunter liegende Ascheschräge gefallen sind, müssen diese mittels der Kratze nach vorn zur Ascheentnahmetür gezogen werden. Hier können diese Teile noch 20 Minuten zum Nachverbrennen lagern. Dann wird die Asche in den Aschebehälter gezogen und zur Abkühlung beiseite gestellt.

Zwischendurch werden neue Leichen in die Kammern nach einander eingeführt.

Die beiden Koksgeneratoren müssen von Zeit zu Zeit mit Brennstoff beschickt werden.

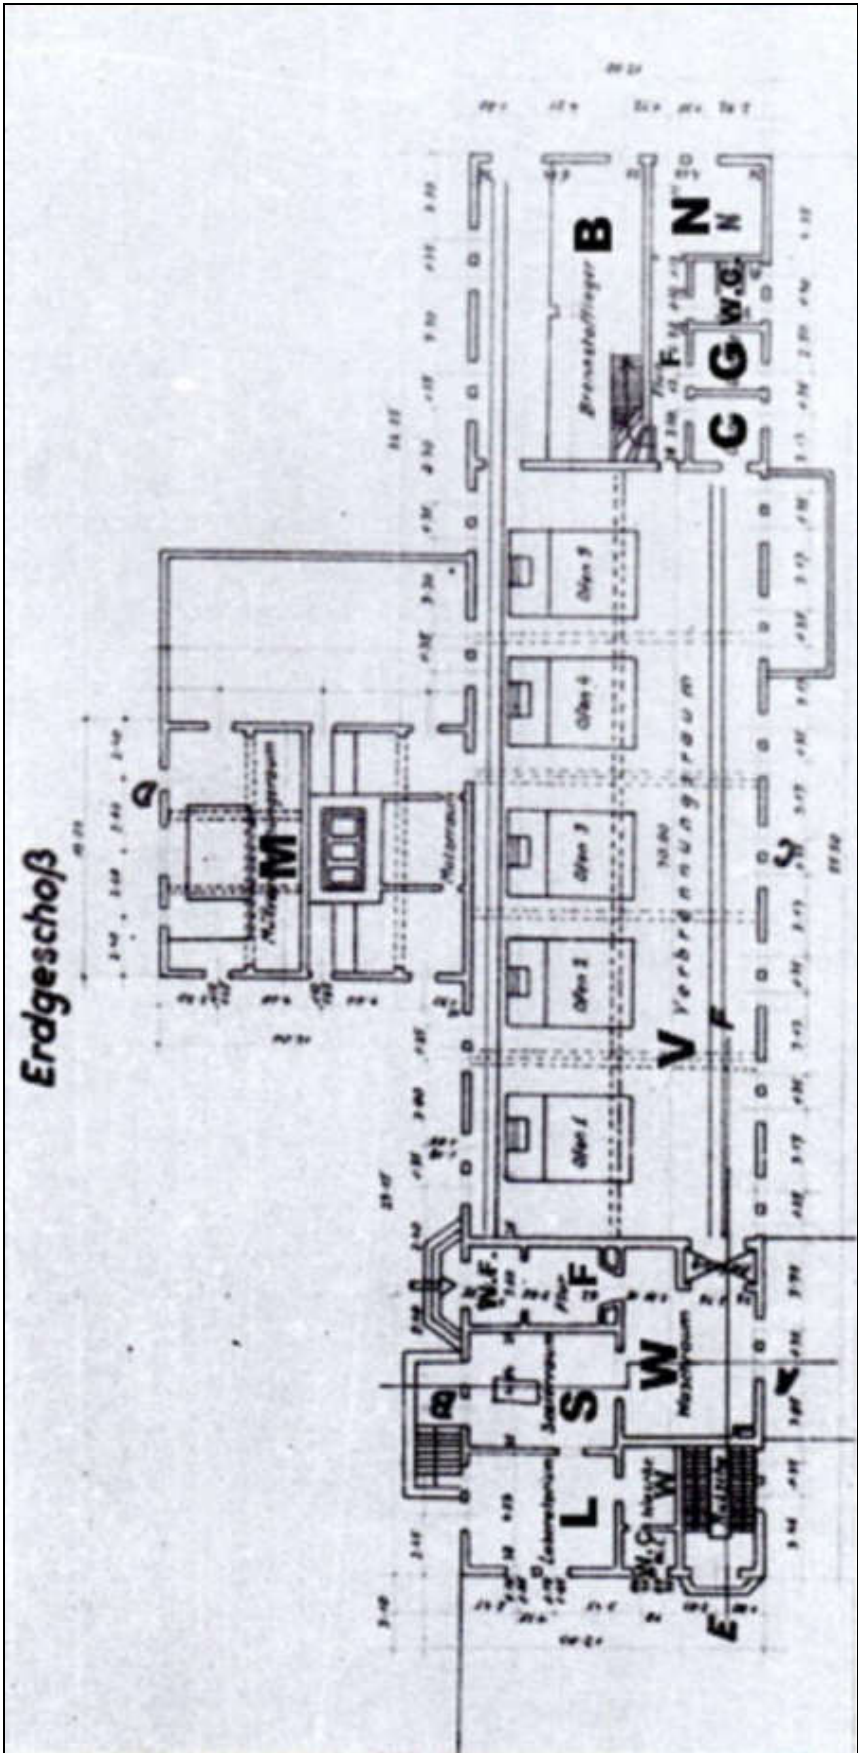

Jeden Abend müssen die Generatorroste von den Koks-schlacken befreit und die Asche herausgenommen werden.

Zu beachten ist ferner, dass nach Betriebsschluss, sobald die Generatoren leer gebrannt und Glutteile nicht mehr vorhanden sind, alle Luftschieber und Türen, desgl. auch der Rauchkanalschieber am Ofen geschlossen sein müssen um den Ofen nicht auszukühlen.

Nach jeder Einäscherung steigt die Temperatur im Ofen. Daher bitte beachten, dass die Innentemperatur nicht über 1000°C. kommt (Weissglut).

Diese Temperatursteigerung kann durch Lufteinblasen verhindert werden.

5. Beide Lungen an ihren Oberflächen stark mit Brustkorb verwachsen. Auch starke pleuropericardiale und interlobäre Verwachsungen. Lungenfell stark (3 mm) verdickt. In der rechten Lungenspitze zwei apfelgroße, dickwandige, mit eitrig-serösem Inhalt gefüllte Höhlen, durch deren Lumen größere Bronchien und Blutgefäße in Form der Stränge durchlaufen. Außerdem zahlreiche ähnliche, haselnußgroße und erbsengroße Höhlen im ganzen oberen Lappen der linken Lunge feststellbar. Zwischen diesen Höhlen und im ganzen unteren Lappen der linken Lunge zahlreiche meistens peribronchial gelegene zusammenfließende, caseöse, weißlich-graue Knötchen, von Hanf- bis zur Linsengröße. Aus den durchgeschnittenen Bronchien und Bronchiolen quillt schleimig-eitrige Flüssigkeit hervor. Ihre Schleimhaut dünn, gerötet, reichlich mit schleimig-eitriger Flüssigkeit besetzt. In den Lungengefäßen dunkles, flüssiges und geronnenes Blut. Die Peribronchial-Lymphdrüsen vergrößert, teilweise verhärtet und verkalkt.

Der obere Lappen der rechten Lunge weist zahlreiche erbsen- bis haselnußgroße, alte und frische Höhlen mit eitrig caseösem Inhalt gefüllt, und zwischen den zahlreichen weißlich-graue acinöse, caseöse von Hanf- bis zur Linsengröße Knötchen, sowie stärkere Produktion des Bindegewebes, auf. Ähnliche aber schwächer ausgeprägte Veränderungen stellt man im mittleren und unteren Lappen der rechten Lunge fest. Außerdem im unteren Lappen dieser Lunge, besonders in paravertebralen Teilen dessen, dunkel-graue, unebene, körnige, luftleere, peribronchial gelegene Herde, aus welchen unter dem Druck trübe, luftleere Flüssigkeit herausquillt. Bronchien, Bronchiolen, Lungengefäße und peribronchiale Lymphdrüsen verhalten sich identisch wie in der linken Lunge.

6. Herzbeutel enthält 2 Esslöffel klarer, gelblicher Flüssigkeit. Das Epi- und Pericard dünn, glatt, glänzend. Das subepicardiale Fettgewebe spärlich zitronengelb verfärbt.

Das Herz klein. In der linken Herzhälfte Totenstarre, rechte Hälfte weich. Beide Herzhälften mäßig erweitert, enthalten speckartige Blutgerinnsel. Die arteriellen und venösen Ostien gut passierbar. Ihre Klappen gut schließbar, ähnlich wie das parietale Endocard dünn, glatt glänzend. Herzmuskel von normaler Dicke und Konsistenz, mäßig durchblutet, an der Schnittfläche dunkel-braun verfärbt, etwas matt. Aorta normal breit, ihre Intima weist im Pars ascendens Lipoidinfiltrationen auf. Die Kranzgefäße von normalem Verlauf, dickwandig, wegsam.

7. In der Bauchhöhle kein pathologischer Inhalt. Das Bauchfell dünn, glatt, glänzend. Bauchorgane normal gelagert.

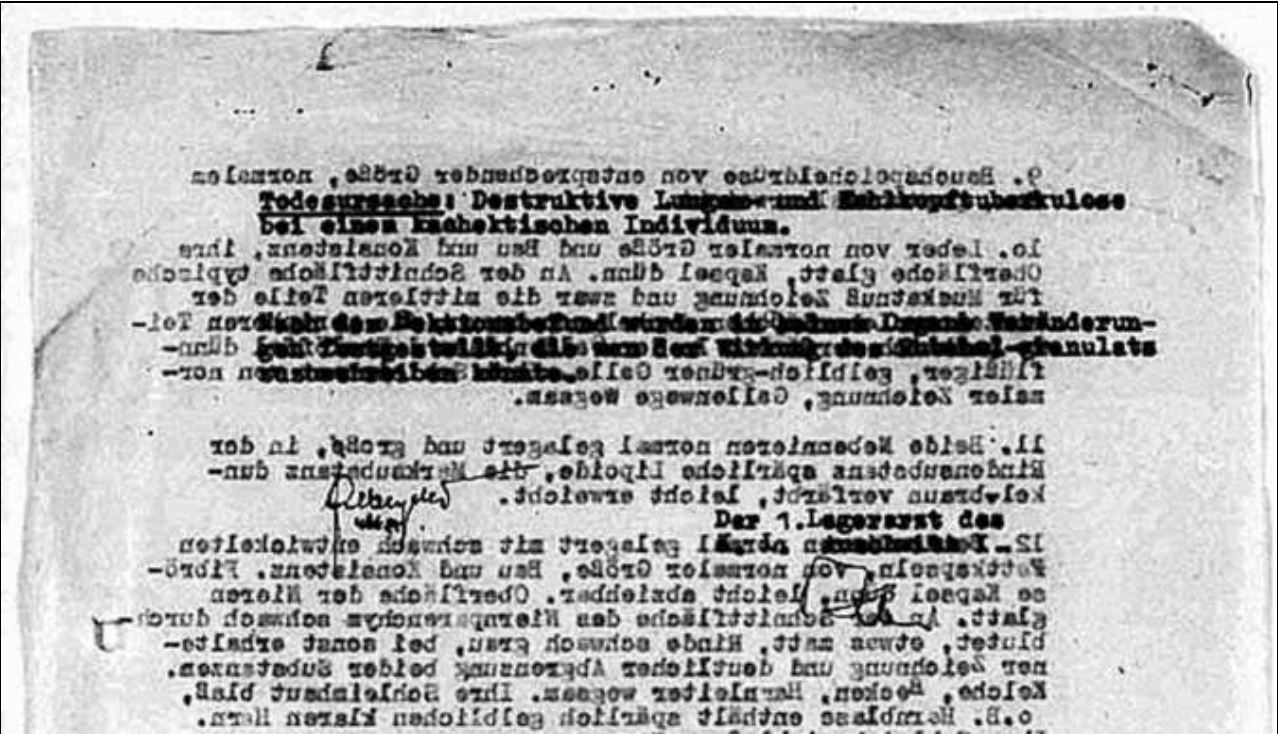

8. Milz leicht vergrößert, ihre Oberfläche glatt, ihr Parenchym an der Schnittfläche dunkel-blau-rot verfärbt, Pulpa geschwollen, leicht abstreifbar.

9. Bauchspeicheldrüse von entsprechender Größe, normalen Bau, postmortal erweicht.
10. Leber von normaler Größe und Bau und Konsistenz, ihre Oberfläche glatt, Kapsel dünn. An der Schnittfläche typische für Muskatnuß Zeichnung und zwar die mittleren Teile der einzelnen Leberlappen dunkel-rot-braun, die peripheren Teile gelblich verfärbt. In der Gallenblase d. Hohlöffel dünnflüssiger, gelblich-grüner Galle, ihre Schleimhaut von normaler Zeichnung, Gallenwege wegsam.
11. Beide Nebennieren normal gelagert und groß, in der Rindensubstanz spärliche Lipide, die Marks Substanz dunkel-braun verfärbt, leicht erweicht.
12. Beide Nieren normal gelagert mit schwach entwickelten Fettkapseln, von normaler Größe, Bau und Konsistenz. Fibröse Kapsel dünn, leicht abziehbar. Oberfläche der Nieren glatt. An der Schnittfläche des Nierenparenchym schwach durchblutet, etwas matt, Rinde schwach grau, bei sonst erhaltener Zeichnung und deutlicher Abgrenzung beider Substanzen. Kelche, Becken, Harnleiter wegsam. Ihre Schleimhaut blaß, o.B. Harnblase enthält spärlich gelblichen klaren Harn. Ihre Schleimhaut blaß, o.B.
13. Mundhöhle, Rachen und Speiseröhre leer. Ihre Schleimhaut blaß, o.B. Adenoidaler Apparat im Rachen schwach entwickelt, nur die Mandeln vergrößert, derb mit zahlreichen gelblichen Pfröpfchen. Magen enthält Reste halbverdauter Speise, ohne spezifischen Geruch. Seine Schleimhaut blaß, ohne Erosionen, Erosionen und Geschwüre. Dünn- und Dickdarm enthalten spärlichen normalen Inhalt, die Schleimhaut des Dünn- und Dickdarms blaß, o.B. Die im Gekröse und hinter dem Bauchfell liegenden Lymphdrüsen nicht vergrößert.
14. Geschlechtsorgane ohne makroskopische Veränderungen insbesondere Hoden und Nebenhoden ohne spezifische Veränderungen.
15. Gelenke und Knöchelgerüst o.B.

Pathologisch-anatomische Diagnose:

Tuberculosis pulmonum, (Duae cavernae tuberculosae obsoletae magnitudine pomi appicis et multiplices cavernae magnitudinis nudis et cavernaculas lobi superioris et tuberculosis acino-nodosa totius pulmonis, sinistri. Multiplices cavernaculae tuberculosae obsoletae recentes lobi superioris et tuberculosis acino-nodosa et fibro-productiva totius pulmonis dextri.) Bronchopneumonia dispersa lobi inferioris pulmonis dextri. Tracheobronchitis catarrhalis chronica. Concretiones pleurales compactae ambilaterales, pleuropericardiales et interlobares. Tuberculosis lymphoglandularum peribronchialium. Ulcera tuberculosa chordarum vocalium ambilateralium. Dilatatio cordis praecipue dextri medi gradus. Degeneratio parenchymatosa myocardii. Infiltratio lipoides intimae aortae ascendentes. Tumor lienis acutus. Hepar moscatum. Degeneratio parenchymatosa renum. Hypolipoidosis substantiae corticalis glandularum suprarenalium. Amygdalitis chronica. Oedema pedum. Hyperaemia passiva organorum praecipue cerebri et meningum. Cachexia.

Introduction

The Polish Jew Rudolf Reder is considered the only survivor of the alleged Bełżec Extermination Camp, or, more precisely, the only one who left a long and detailed description of its alleged vicissitudes (Tregenza 2000, Note 5, p. 259). According to Michał Tregenza, there were in fact at least six other survivors in addition to Reder: Sara Bender of Lemberg (Lwów, now L'viv), Hirsz Binder, Mordechai Bracht and Samuel Velczer of Tomaszów Lubelski, Chaim Hirszman of Janów Lubelski, and a Hungarian Jew who was called "Szpilke" (to whom I will return later). On January 7, 1960, the Gerichtsassessor (judge in training) Zeug, an official of the German Central Office of the State Justice Administrations for the Investigation of National-Socialist Crimes¹ communicated to Tuwiah Friedmann, director of the Haifa Documentation Center, the names and addresses of Samuel Velczer, Herz Binder and Mordechai Bracht, who had requested reparations from the State Office for Reparations (Landesamt für Wiedergutmachung) in Stuttgart, Germany, and Zeug had also sent a questionnaire to the Haifa Center (Friedmann, unpaginated). On January 13, 1960, Zeug wrote to Friedmann that he had learned that Herz Binder had died in February 1959, while Samuel Velczer had moved away. In the meantime, another witness had been identified, Gisela Rosenbaum born Biberstein from Tarnów, who lived in Haifa in 1958 (ibid.):

"In her reparations case at the State Office for Reparations in Karlsruhe, Ms. Rosenbaum credibly stated that she was imprisoned in Belzec from 1942 to 1944, where she was employed at sorting clothes inside the extermination camp."

With the exception of Hirszman, none of these people evidently ever made a deposition. Hirszman was questioned on March 19, 1946 by the Jewish Historical Commission of the Lublin District, but his statement is terse and generic in nature (Libionka, pp. 93-95). Reder's testimony is therefore indeed unique and fundamental.

Reder was born in Dębica, Poland, on April 4, 1881; in August 1942, when he was deported to Bełżec at the age of 61, he lived in Lwów, where he had a soap factory. On November 8, 1949, he married Johanna Robak in Krakow. In 1949, he assumed his wife's surname and became Roman Robak. In 1951, he moved from Poland to Israel, and in 1952 he emigrated to Toronto, Canada, where he died in 1968.²

His early statements (1944-1946) were for many years unknown or ignored outside Poland. Even in 1951, Léon Poliakov, one of the first European orthodox Holocaust historians, did not know of him at all; in his exposition of the Bełżec Camp, he relied exclusively on Kurt Gerstein (Poliakov 1979, pp. 218-224).

Gerald Reitlinger, who wrote his treatise two years later, limited himself to a fleeting and confused reference (Reitlinger, p. 140):

"It was only after the war that a real survivor appeared to describe the miserable Diesel engine which had supplied the carbon monoxide. He was Rudolf Reder, [...]. Reder once saw the victims locked in the gas chamber for hours on end while efforts were made to start the Diesel engine."

Reder, however, had only talked about a gasoline engine, as we will see later.

Reitlinger relied on an English book published in 1948 which contained excerpts from Reder's statements (Muszkat, pp. 229-232), but this witness continued to be ignored otherwise.

In early December 1954, Reder/Robak filed a request for reparations to the Federal Republic of (West) Germany, as provided by a West-German law enacted to the benefit of victims of National-Socialist persecution (see Chapter 1.6.). In accordance with statutory practice, the German judiciary sent Reder a questionnaire with twelve questions, which was sent to all claimants who claimed to have escaped the Bełżec Camp (see Chapter 1.7.). Reder replied in late January 1956.

Subsequently, in August 1960, Reder went to Munich and was interrogated twice by the local prosecutor, but was not asked to testify as a witness during the subsequent Bełżec Trial against Josef Oberhauser (January 18-21, 1965), and in the grounds for the judgment dated January 21, 1965, Reder is not even

Wikipedia gives "Joanna Borkowska" as the maiden name of his second wife, but this is not supported by the Majdanek Museum's web page quoted as a reference, which has since been deleted. (web.archive.org/web/20141129063647/http://www.majdanek.eu/articles.php?aid=471&acid=101&lng=1) In addition, Wikipedia states that Reder's actual date of death was Oct. 6, 1977, but no source is given. Reder was allegedly buried at the Mount Pleasant Cemetery in Toronto. (https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Rudolf_Redder, last accessed on Jan. 23, 2021)

mentioned (Sagel-Grande et al., pp. 629-647). Only in 1977 did Adalbert Rückerl publish a few lines of Reder's interrogation of August 8, 1960.³

At the Eichmann Trial in Jerusalem, Reder's testimony was irrelevant; he was mentioned only in passing during the 67th hearing on June 6, 1961.⁴

In 1977, Michael [Michał] Tregenza, a historian of Polish origin, was the first to make Reder's statements known in more detail, specifically Reder's 1946 booklet Bełżec (Tregenza 1977, pp. 19f.), of which he provided an extensive summary. Ten years later, Yitzhak Arad presented many excerpts from this same booklet in his well-known study on the Reinhardt camps.⁵ In 1999, the Jewish Foundation of Krakow in collaboration with the Auschwitz Museum made Reder's booklet available for the first time in English translation.⁶ Franciszek Piper explained in the introduction to that translation that Reder's statements had been "often cited in historical works as one of the basic sources of knowledge about that camp" and that "in view of their historical value," since they had been published previously only in Polish, it was decided to publish them in English translation (Reder 1999, p. 83). An even more-uncritical Italian translation was published in 2004 by Roberto Sforzi, but without a map of the camp, which undermines the author's entire argumentative structure.⁷

In 2000, in the only currently existing dedicated orthodox study on the Bełżec Camp, Robert Kuwałek made abundant use of Reder's testimony taken mainly from the booklet mentioned, with some brief and fragmented excerpts from three other statements (Kuwałek 2000).

Only in 2013, almost all of Reder's statements were published in Polish by Dariusz Libionka.⁸

As always when faced with a self-proclaimed eyewitness who more-or-less-miraculously escaped from an extermination camp, orthodox historians lose all semblance of critical sense: any witness who claims these attributes for himself is a priori trustworthy and reliable in their eyes, and the mere thought of seeking to verify their reliability is almost a sacrilege to them.

This attitude has ensured that my first critique of Reder's statements dating back to 1985 has remained singular to this day.⁹ Hence, the following state-

⁶ Reder 1999. With incredible chutzpah, the preface was written by Jan Karski, the notorious impostor who had claimed to have visited the Bełżec Camp in October 1942 and to have "seen" an extermination system using "death trains" there. On this see Mattogno 2016, Section I.3., pp. 22-33.

⁹ Mattogno 1985, Chapter VIII, "Il testimone Rudolf Reder," pp. 129-137. In it, I took into consideration Reder's Bełżec booklet and the declaration quoted here in Chapter 1.3.

ment, which Michał Tregenza wrote in 2000 in a laudable, albeit-belated awakening of critical sense with regard to Chaim Hirszman and Rudolf Reder, is very true:

“According to current knowledge, these two reports are contradictory and contain inaccuracies.”

Also throwing Kurt Gerstein into the same pot, Tregenza continued that “all three eyewitness reports on the Belżec Camp are to be considered unreliable” (Tregenza 2000, pp. 242f.). Ignoring his own scathing conclusion, however, he dismissed the issue in a few lines and quoted only a few examples of the witnesses’ unreliability.

In a long-unpublished paper of 2006, Tregenza returned to the subject more-thoroughly by documenting some more contradictions and inaccuracies of Reder’s statements (Tregenza 2006, Chapter 10, pp. 22-30). These critiques, as unsystematic as they were, did not in the least affect the unshakable credulity of his Polish colleagues, and not just the Polish ones. In particular Robert Kuwałek, editor of the compilation of Reder’s statements as published in Dariusz Libionka’s anthology, did not dare express even the slightest hint of criticism of “his” witness par excellence in his 13 apologetic biographical pages.¹⁰

Therefore, a systematic and comparative critical examination of all of Rudolf Reder’s statements is still lacking, and this study aims to fill this lacuna.

In Part 1, I first present the complete picture of Reder’s statements, while Part 2 contains my detailed critical analysis of them.

There is also another important issue that orthodox Holocaust historians have never dealt with: the enigmatic relationship between Rudolf Reder’s and Kurt Gerstein’s accounts, which is the subject of Part 4 of this study. This obviously first requires an accurate exposition and evaluation of Gerstein’s statements, which I present in Part 3.

Part 1:

Rudolf Reder's Statements

1.1. The Testimony of September 22, 1944

The documentation relating to Rudolf Reder includes at least nine statements dating from September 1944 to August 1960, which I deal with in chronological order in this part.¹¹ I translate without literary embellishment and as closely as possible to the original texts, adding clarifications only where necessary.

Reder's first statement is contained in an interrogation report by the Soviet prosecutor of the L'viv Oblast (district) of L'viv (Lwów) dated September 22, 1944. It exists in two versions: the original, handwritten text, countersigned by the witness,¹² and the typed transcript.¹³

I was taken to Bełżec in July [в июле] 1942. Bełżec is located at a distance of 60-70 km from Lwów and is a railway junction from which the railway goes to Warsaw, Jarosław, Tomaszów and Zamość. From the main track starts a spur built by the Germans that reaches the special plant built by the Germans [and] designed for the extermination of people. This plant consists of three huts for 250 /two hundred fifty/ people, two huts for 500 Jewish workers, with a strength of 500 /five hundred/ people, the building is called ‘Bath house and disinfection’; a vase of flowers hung above the entrance to this building; the next building was the kitchen, the warehouse for the [personal] effects of those killed, and food for the workers and the guards, the sick bay for the guards.

The bath house was made of concrete, the other huts were made of wood. When I was taken to Bełżec, one of the SS men asked who had any special training. I stated that I was a mechanic, and since they needed such a worker, they made me operate the gasoline engine [p. 2] of the ‘Deič’ Company^[14] that turned the transporter [транспортер] that lifted the earth from the pits in which the corpses of those exterminated /asphyxiated/ were buried. The steam locomotive carried the convoy of people to the branch leading to Bełżec. In each convoy there were 50 wagons, that is, one convoy carried 5,000 /five thousand/ people. Every day [ежедневно], two to four convoys arrived. They brought people from Poland, France, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Norway, Czechoslovakia. It must be said that the deported people did not know their fate. After their arrival, they were ordered to strip naked in the courtyard. The women had their hair cut with a machine. Then the deportees were ushered in groups to the ‘bath house,’ where they were told that after bathing they would all go to work. The 'bath house' itself was a concrete building divided by a corridor into two parts; in each part of the building there were three rooms, in which there were no windows, and the doors closed hermetically. On one side of the 'bath house,' the part opposite the railway line, there was an annex in which the compressor [компрессор] powered by a gasoline engine was located. Gas cylinders [баллоны с газом] were leading [were connected] to this machine. From the compressor the tubes went to each room. In each room on one wall there was a small grillwork to which the gas pipe led. The undressed people were made to enter the rooms; since the people were afraid of entering the dark rooms, the SS guards pushed those who resisted into the room with the bayonet. From 750 to 770 people entered each room. At full capacity, the entire 'bath house' killed up to 4,500 people /four thousand five hundred/. After twenty minutes, the doors of the rooms were opened, and the workers – Jews – among whom I was as well, fastened the loop of a belt to the hand of a dead man [and] two of us dragged the corpses [to the place] where the dentists were [p. 3] and [who] extracted gold teeth from their mouths. I must explain that the rooms had two doors: one through which people were made to enter and the other, large one, in all three rooms, from which the bodies were dragged out. Those condemned to death who were waiting for their fate in the courtyard did not see how the corpses were removed. The corpses were dragged into [already] dug pits measuring 100 x 25 x 15 meters. After a pit was full, which contained more than 100,000 /one hundred thousand/ corpses, the pits were sprinkled with slaked lime and filled with sand. All day, while this work was being carried out, an orchestra played near the pits. The orchestra played only cheerful melodies in order to drown out the cries of the unfortunates who had been pushed into the rooms. In this way, those who waited for their turn in the 'bath house' did not know the fate of those who had entered the 'bath house.'

Every day a whole basket full of gold, money and diamonds was brought to the Belżec commandant's office, stolen from the people condemned to death. The camp commandant was Stabschef Irman, of Czech-German nationality from the Sudeten region. Deputy commandant was Hauptscharführer Schwarz – a German. Also at the camp was Oberscharführer Feiks – German. The chief of the guards was Zugwachmann Schmidt. Schmidt was distinguished by his extraordinary brutality: if he noticed that any of the Jewish workers of the group of 500 was working poorly, he hung him by the feet from a gallows; after 3 hours, he detached the victim, still alive, from the gallows, then beat him vigorously, threw him on his back, poured water into his mouth, then began to fill his mouth with sand until the man choked. During the time I stayed in Belżec, 30 graves were filled, which corresponds to the killing of 3,000,000 people.

I managed to escape from Belżec in the following manner: the camp headquarters needed iron for the kitchen chimneys. I [p. 4] joined the unit to bring back the iron from Lwów. Four SS men and an officer, Scharführer Schatkowsky,^[15] came with me to Lwów in a car. The officer stopped the car on Legionów Street and went to lunch with 3 SS men, leaving one SS man in the back of the car. When I realized that the SS man had fallen asleep, I fled, and in this way I remained alive. Of the 500 workers in Bełżec, only I survived. I can't say more. My words were reported exactly and read back to me. Reder."

1.2. The Interview of November 1, 1944

On November 1, 1944, an article by Włodzimierz Bielajew appeared in the Polish newspaper Czerwony Sztandar (Red Banner) titled "The Eternal Fire of Bełżec," which contains an interview with Rubin [sic] Reder conducted in the area of the former Bełżec Camp, with a brief introduction and a final comment:¹⁶

"The Story of a Former Detainee"

The next week, when I went to the soft sandy ground of the Bełżec Camp, I heard terrible words again. In front of me sits a rather old man, white-haired, of small build and soberly dressed. His name is Rubin Reder. He was born in Dębica in 1881. He is now 63 years old. Rubin Reder can be considered without exaggeration a man who has returned from beyond. He has returned from a place from which no one else has returned. He went to Bełżec, one of the most-terrible death camps, but managed to escape from it. Here is the literal story [do słownie: sic] of a man who saw Bełżec from the inside:

On July 15 [15 lipca] 1942, when the first big 'action' in Lwów began, I was captured along with others passing through Zamarstynowska Street and loaded onto a covered truck. They took us to a barracks in Podzamcze. In the evening I was ordered to join the other detainees. We were all taken to the Janowska Street Camp. We spent the night outdoors, and in the morning, they took us to the railway cars. At the entrance of each car there were 4 Gestapo officials. When we got into the cars, we were beaten with sticks on the head and in the face. The train consisted of 50 cars – 100 people were crammed into each car. The cars were sealed. On the roof of the cars were turrets. The guards guarded the transport not only from the sentry boxes, but also from above.

At noon we arrived in Bełżec. The train was still at full speed when an intense cadaverous stench reached us through the grates of the cars. It was clear to each of us what lay ahead. The name of the station whizzed past us across the grate. It shattered our last hopes. Each of us was condemned to end his life at Bełżec – the death camp. The train pulled into the camp. The doors were opened. The guards began to kick us out of the cars. Everyone was ordered to undress completely. Women, children, old people, everyone, without exception, began to undress.

A Sudeten German, Stabsscharführer Franz Irmann, announced that we should first take a bath and undergo disinfection [dezynfekcję]. ‘Only after that,’ said Irmann, ‘can I assign you to work.’

In fact, in front of us on a platform was a low building, very long and wide, about 100 x 100 meters, with the sign on the front attic wall saying ‘Bade und Inhalationsräume’ [bath- and inhalation rooms]. A vase of flowers hung under the sign. While we undressed, Irmann ordered all skilled workers – carpenters, shoemakers, tailors and the like – to leave the ranks. As a soap manufacturer, I also have various skills; therefore, after having introduced myself as a machinist [maszynist], I stepped forward among the 8 specialists as well.

Here in the open [pod gołym niebem] the barbers began to cut women’s hair. When the whole procedure was finished, the guards began to push all the new arrivals, except us 8 specialists, into the bath house. Inside it looked very strange, and did not correspond at all to its name. This low and wide building was divided into two parts by a large corridor, in which three doors opened to the right, three to the left. They were the access doors to six rooms with false windows [z pozornymi oknami]. Each room could accommodate 750 people. As soon as the first of my unfortunate traveling companions crossed the threshold of the corridor, they had a bad feeling and wanted to go back. Then the guards began to push them with bayonets. Those who resisted were bayoneted. Eventually, some 4,500 people were crowded in the chambers. The doors were closed tightly. From the gassing device [z urządzenia gazowego] located behind the building, gas was conducted through special pipes. After 20 minutes, all the people locked up had taken their last breath.

A team of 500 people who had been left alive for auxiliary work began pulling the dead bodies out onto the street. The group of dentists, equipped with pincers, examined the mouths of the dead. When they found gold teeth, they pulled them out. Then there, at the camp, the gold teeth were melted into small ingots that were delivered to particularly reliable high-ranking Gestapo officials. Ten inmates left alive dealt exclusively with the thorough search of the clothes of those killed. They searched for jewels by unstitching the seams of clothes, carefully crushing the largest buttons in search for diamonds.

I stayed in the camp for four full months. In this period, 30 huge and deep pits were dug, filled with corpses and covered up around me. Thanks to simple mathematics, I estimate that the Germans killed and buried about 3 million people during this period. When the Red Army then went on the offensive and began to approach Bełżec, the Germans, wanting to erase the traces, began to burn the corpses of the people they had murdered. Here in Bełżec, they killed not only the population of Poland and western Ukraine. They also brought in people condemned to death from Belgium, Holland, Czechoslovakia, France and Vienna. Only of the Germans, there was not a single one. They killed them in their own country, in Dachau and in other camps.

In general, the rate of killings I witnessed allows me to estimate that around 5 million people have been killed in Bełżec from the time of the creation of this camp to the time of its liquidation.

In October 1942 [w październiku 1942], they began to build a new kitchen in the camp. I took charge of this work. For the final commissioning of the kitchen, sheet-metal pipes were required for the chimney. There were none at the camp. I said cautiously to Irmann: 'In Lwów I could get some sheet metal – I have acquaintances there, but I don't know anyone here.' Contrary to my expectation, Irmann sent me to Lwów in search of sheet metal. But he ordered four Gestapo officials and a young officer to guard me. I got the sheet metal in Lwów and might actually then have returned, but as it was lunch time, the officer and the three guards went to eat and left me in the truck under the supervision of a 'volksdeutsch' [ethnic German] official of the Gestapo named Trotwein. The truck was parked next to the sidewalk in Legionów Street. It was a hot October day [dzień październikowy]. Trotwein was probably overwhelmed by the brandy he had drunk, by exhaustion and by sleepiness. He fell asleep while sitting next to me. I cautiously slipped out of the truck and left it as if nothing had happened, mingling with passers-by. A good woman, to whom I had once rendered many services, welcomed me into her home. She hid me in her house for twenty months. When people came, she hid me with blankets under two beds. In this way I saved myself, and if my salvation were only to tell the world of another unparalleled crime by the Hitlerites, for that alone it would be worth for me to live the rest of my life.

What can be added to this tale? The 'eternal flames' of Bełżec must not be extinguished in the memory of humanity, which has the sacred historical duty not only to completely destroy the brown plague of fascism, but also to do everything possible to ensure that the crimes committed in our splendid world by criminals with the mark of the swastika can never again be repeated in their full extent."

1.3. The Testimony of 1945

In 1945, Reder made an otherwise-undated statement to the Krakow section of the Centralna Żydowska Komisja Historyczna (Central Jewish Historical Commission), of which two versions exist. One was published with the title "Bełżec Rudolf Reder Komory gazowe" ("Bełżec Rudolf Reder Gas Chambers"; Borwicz et al., pp. 56-59), the other simply untitled as Declaration No. 93 (Blumental, pp. 221-224). The contents are very similar, but there are differences in structure and partly also in content. The archiving number of the aforementioned Commission – 162 for the first, 594 for the second – suggests two distinct statements, but the second version is undoubtedly a reworking of the first made by some diligent official of the aforementioned Commission. In addition to the almost-identical general structure of the writing, certain “corrections” were introduced in the second version. First of all, “gas chambers” (“komory gazowe”) are mentioned explicitly only in the second version, which makes little sense, because Reder declares that he did not know whether the famous “gasoline engine” produced gas or “condensed air”! However, this clarification does nothing but highlight a fundamental inconsistency which is found in all the witness statements.

Then there is a passage that evidently offended the sensitivities of the Jewish Commission – “Zugführerzy-Żydzi, element bandycki – zapisywali, jak kto pracuje,” “The squad-leader Jews, the criminal element, wrote down how everyone worked” – which was consequently changed to: “Pracowników słabych ograbiali Niemcy,” “The Germans robbed weak workers...”

I translate both versions.

a) First version:

“On August 16, 1942, during the Lwów action, I was taken to the Janowska [street] camp. The next day I was loaded onto a railway car at the Kleparów Station. The transport had 50 cars of 100 people each, about 5,000 men, women and children. Escort: Gestapo; freight cars, covered and sealed. It was known that they would go to Belżec. A 7-hour trip. The train arrived at Belżec station and then, on a siding, to the camp. The camp [was] in a young forest, cut down to a radius of 3 kilometers in all directions, the ground sandy. From a distance the camp was invisible, cut trees were tied to those that grew so that they formed a hedge. Other cut trees were tied to the top of small trees in order to achieve invisibility. The cars entered the camp’s courtyard; the spur was 200-300 meters long. The camp was surrounded by barbed wire, and on the inside [od strony wewnętrznej] of the fence were stacked iron-wire nets. One couldn’t escape, because one would get caught in the nets. In the middle of the courtyard there was a high tower with a sentry with a submachine gun, a carbine and search lights. There were no towers on the perimeter – the ‘askari’ patrolled there.

There were two large wooden huts for 250 people, on ground level, with small windows, two-story bunk beds, a bare board.

After they were unloaded, everyone, men and women, was ordered to strip completely naked in the courtyard. They were told that they would take a bath and then go to work. The people rejoiced, as they believed it was just going to be work. Ten Jews of the ‘service personnel’ took the clothes, searched them, put aside any gold and money; the clothes ended up in a warehouse, while the precious objects were brought every evening in a suitcase to an office where they were inventoried and sent to the camp's headquarters, which was located at the railway station. A Jew and an SS man brought them there.

There were 6 rooms in a ground-level building, in the center a corridor, 3 rooms on the left and 3 rooms on the right. The building was made of concrete, without windows, the roof was covered with roofing felt, the building was 3 to 3-and-a-half meters high.

The women's hair was cut in the courtyard [na dziedzińcu] – Jewish barbers did that. The women sat already naked on stools and were shaved one after the other. Uninterrupted blows to their faces and heads. The people were pushed en masse 'into the bath house,' disorderly, without counting them, 'like cattle to the slaughter.' In the corridor of the 'bath house', the people realized what was happening – the rooms were open, the doors had been opened by them [the Germans], darkness, screams. With the bayonet, with the rifle, the askari pushed in those who did not want to enter. The people were pushed into the chambers standing so tightly that the doors could hardly be closed. There were about 750 people in there; 6 times 750 people yields 4,500. The gassing lasted 20 minutes. The gas was produced by a gasoline-powered machine, operated by two askari machinists, [which was] located in a room at the end of the corridor. From this small room, the gas arrived in the chambers through tubes of small diameter. I cannot tell whether the machine produced gas (or condensed air [zgęszczone powietrze]). The poisoning lasted 20 minutes. The corpses were thrown out after the external doors were opened, leather straps were put around their hands, and they were dragged out. Behind the building, a pile of corpses 2 meters high was formed; from this pile, they were dragged 200-300 steps through the sand to the pits. On the way from the building to the pit, the 'dentists,' chosen from among the inmates and 10 in number, opened the mouths of the corpses, tore out the gold teeth, then melted the gold into ingots, which ended up at the headquarters. People from outside who were entering the building by the steps did not see what was happening on the sides of the building, that is, with the corpses and the graves, because dense vegetation covered them.

The transports had 50 cars, 3-4 times a day, hence 15,000-20,000 people a day. From each transport, skilled workers, such as mechanics, carpenters, shoemakers, tailors, were chosen immediately after arrival. The witness presented himself as a mechanic [maszynista monter]. He was assigned to the machine that extracted sand from pits destined to [become] graves. Two persons operated it. The work lasted from 6 to dusk. One pit was 100 meters long and 25 meters wide. One pit held about 100,000 people. In November 1942 there were 30 pits, hence 3 million corpses. The corpses were thrown into it without any order [bez porządku]; the next day a sinister sea of blood flowed to the edge of the pit. The ground [was] sandy. The corpses lay up to a meter above ground level. The pits were sprinkled with slaked lime, then filled with sand. The camp's service personnel consisted of 500 men. Each day they decreased by 30-40. The squad-leader Jews, the criminal element, wrote down how everyone worked. The worst workers, the weakest, were selected, at noon they were called, taken to a pit and shot. From new transports, they brought the number back up to 500.

At the top of the camp were Stabsscharführer Fritz Irrmann of the Sudetenland, Hauptscharführer Schwarz of the Reich, Oberscharführer Feix of the Reich, the volksdeutsch Russian Zugwachmann Hans Schmidt, a lank, small thug, and the volksdeutsch Russian Schneider, in total 5 SS men.

At one point in November, there were many transports, and the 500 men of the service personnel could not cope with the work. So, Schmidt chose 100 men already completely stripped naked and destined for the gas. They worked all day, in the cold, naked and without food; in the evening, he [Schmidt] took them to a pit and shot them. He lacked bullets for 20 people, so he took the handle of a pickaxe and killed them with a blow to the head. When a single blow was not enough, he hit them again.

At 4 in the morning, the workers left the hut, received tea and 200 grams of bread at the kitchen window. The men lined up in the courtyard, [where] they taught [them] German songs. Oberscharführer Feix made sure everyone sang, he particularly loved 'Montanaro, don't you mind?' An orchestra was playing; the conductor was Wassermann from Krakow. The composition of the orchestra generally did not change; it was completed with people from new transports. The work took place to the sound of music. Work [lasted] until 12, then lunch: barley broth, in the evening coffee or tea without bread.

There was no contact with the [outside] world. Peasants brought potatoes, left them in front of the camp gate. Nobody entered the camp.

Among these 500 that the witness met at the camp were Polish and Czechoslovakian Jews. They began building the camp and the chamber in early 1942; it began operating in April-May 1942.

The witness was at the camp from August 17, 1942 to the end of November 1942.

In 1944, according to statements by a mechanic who reported it to the witness, the pits were reopened, doused with gasoline, burned, the bones ground to [make] fertilizer."

b) Second version:

"On August 16, 1942, I was taken to the Janowska [Street] Camp in Lwów, and the next day I was loaded onto a railway car at the Kleparów Station. I knew that was the transport of death. The transport had 50 cars, in each car there were 100 people. The train carried around 5,000 people, men, women and children. It was under the escort of the Gestapo. [They were] covered freight cars, sealed, the windows closed with grates. Everyone in the cars knew that they were going to Belżec to their death in the gas chamber [w komorze gazowej]. The journey lasted 7 hours, [it was] terrible, frightening and hopeless. The train arrived at Belżec Station, entered the camp on a narrow-gauge track. The camp was located in a young coniferous forest, cut down to a radius of 3 kilometers in all directions in a sandy soil. From a distance, the camp was invisible, because cut trees attached to the growing trees formed a light-proof hedge hiding the barracks and gas chamber that were there. Cut trees were fastened to small trees for even greater invisibility. The cars entered the camp yard, the siding was 200-300 meters long. The camp was surrounded by barbed wire, and iron-wire nets were piled up on the inside of the fence, so one could not cross them, lest you get caught in the nets. In the middle of the courtyard there was a high tower with a sentry with a submachine gun, carbine and search lights. There were no towers on the perimeter. The askaris stood guard. Nearby there were two large wooden huts, on ground level, which had small windows. Each hut housed 250 people designated as personnel who slept on bunk beds, on bare boards.

Ten Jews from the service personnel rummaged through the clothes, putting aside any gold and money; the clothes ended up in a warehouse; precious objects were brought to the camp office.

The building in which the gas chambers were located [komory gazowe] was a small white house on ground level. In the middle there was a corridor, to the left of which there were three rooms, and also three rooms to the right. The building was made of concrete, without windows; the roof was covered with roofing felt; the height of three and a half meters.

The women's hair was cut in the courtyard. Jews and Jewish barbers [sic] did that. The women sat already naked on stools and were shaved one after the other. 1.4. The Interrogation of December 29, 1945

This interrogation was preceded three days earlier by a statement in which Reder only recounted the details of his deportation to Bełżec (Libionka, pp. 30-32), which it is not worth reproducing here.

Reder was interrogated by Investigating Judge Jan Sehn in the framework of investigations by the Central Commission of Inquiry into German Crimes in Poland:¹⁷

“[p. 1] Krakow, December 29, 1945. District Investigating Judge Jan Sehn, acting under the decree of Nov. 10, 1945 of the Central Commission and the District Commission of Inquiry into German Crimes in Poland /Dz. U.R. P. n. 51, item 293/ as a member of the Central Commission, questioned in accordance with Article 107, 115 of the Code of Criminal Procedure the inmate of the Bełżec Camp mentioned below who stated the following:

My name is Rudolf Reder, son of Herman and Fryderyka Jortner, born on April 4, 1881 in Dębica, of Jewish religion, of Polish nationality and citizenship, of industrial profession, living in Krakow, 38 Długa Street.

When the German-Russian war broke out, I lived in Lwów, where I had been manufacturing soap at 7 Panieńska Street since 1910. On August 16, 1942, I learned that the German police would carry out an action against the Jews, so I hid in a room of my Ukrainian acquaintances Kobzdej, in their building at 31 Zamarstynowska Street. In this room, however, the police found me – I believe this happened as a result of a denunciation by Kobzdej and his family – I was beaten, loaded with others on a freight truck and taken to a barracks in Podzamcze. Here, an SS soldier who was escorting me took me to a side room, thoroughly searched me and stole 18,040 zloty from me. Apart from this cash, I still had 3 zlotys. The SS soldier left me this rest, mockingly saying that he left it for the trip. A short time later this same soldier offered to release me if I gave him a watch and 3,000 zlotys. To this I replied that I could borrow this from acquaintances, and I begged this SS soldier to take me to these acquaintances. He agreed to this, and we drove by truck to the Jewish hospital, where my daughter, a physician, and her husband worked. I got a watch from the boys [p. 1a] and 3,000 zloty and handed them over to the SS soldier who was escorting me, who pocketed them, pulled out his gun, made us all raise our hands, and threatened to teach and convince me that a German soldier cannot be bribed.

Seeing that I was trapped, I took advantage of the confusion and began to flee. The SS soldier, however, grabbed me during the escape, beat me very violently and took me back to the Podzamcze barracks. On the evening of the same day, we were transported from this barracks to the collection camp on Janowska Street, where we spent the whole night outdoors and the next day, that is, on August 17, 1942, at 6 am, we were loaded onto a freight train. 100 people were loaded into a cattle car. The train had 50 similar cars; the entire transport therefore counted about 5,000 people. They were just Jews of various ages and sexes. We assumed that we would go to Belżec, because in the last period before the arrest in Lwów it was said that the Gestapo took Jews to Belżec. However, we did not know what Belżec was, as the Gestapo were said to bring Jews there for labor. But it was rumored that Belżec was a camp without people. Our conjectures turned out to be correct, because in fact around noon on August 17, 1942, our train stopped at Belżec Station. From the station, the train slowly entered the camp, which was a few hundred meters away from it. The entire train entered the fenced-in camp area. The camp was surrounded by a high barbed-wire fence, and on the outside [po zewnętrznej stronie] of this fence it also had a barrier of nets. It was a metal mesh several meters wide stretched horizontally on wooden supports. Right in the center of the camp there was a high watchtower in which SS soldiers stood guard in all directions. On this tower there were also spotlights that illuminated the whole camp and its closest surroundings. [p. 2] Armed guards patrolled on both sides of the fence. On the left, behind the entrance gate, there was the guard post, in which SS soldiers stood guard with police dogs. Still to the left, behind the guard house, there were 3 barracks for the camp's armed service, Germans and recruits from among Ukrainians or Russian prisoners. Behind a large courtyard, which extended from the entrance gate on both sides of the railway track [po obu stronach toru kolejowego] inside the camp, there was a large hut, in which they cut the women's hair, as I convinced myself later [sic]. Behind this hut, on the other side of the camp, there were two huts where the inmates employed in the gas-chamber service [komór gazowych] were housed. Each of these barracks housed 250 inmates. To the left of the hut for cutting the women's hair – proceeding from the entrance gate – was the building of the [gas] chambers. Between the hut for cutting the women's hair and the building with the chambers, there was a small courtyard [małe podwórko] separated from the front courtyard and the back of the camp by a wooden palisade. In the palisade, at the rear of the camp, there were doors through which one could enter this courtyard. The building of the chambers was made of concrete [z betonu] and covered with a flat roof with roofing felt. It was built on a platform [na podwyższeniu], so that it was accessed via steps from the side of the small courtyard, and along the two longer walls there was a kind of raised unloading ramp. Through the steps, on the side of the small courtyard, one entered the door, above which hung a sign with the words 'Bade und Inhalationsräume,' and a large vase of flowers, so that the decoration of the entrance imitated the entrance to a bathhouse. From the entrance door, along the entire length of the building, there was a corridor that had on each side three single-leaf doors, massive and hermetic, which closed on hinges. These doors led to rooms without windows that had on the other side, that is, on the side of the raised unloading ramps that I described earlier, a door sliding sideways on rails consisting of 2 leaves. On the opposite side of the building, that is, behind the wall in front of which the corridor ended, there was a small room in which the machines [maszyny] were located. I personally saw that in this small room there was a gasoline-powered engine [p. 3a] which seemed very complicated. I remember it had a drive wheel [koło napędowe], but I didn't observe any other constructional or technical details. This engine was permanently served by 2 Russian machinists from the camp's armed service personnel; I only know that it consumed 4 cans of gasoline a day, because that was the amount of gasoline brought into the camp every day. It was during the delivery of gasoline to the engine room that I had the opportunity to look inside. The [gas-]chamber building and the area closest to it were camouflaged. On high poles at a rather considerable height on the roof of the chambers there was a net on which leaves and branches had been thrown.

After the arrival of the train in the courtyard of the camp, we were all thrown out of the cars and ordered to undress completely. This was attended by the camp commandant, SS-Stabsscharführer Fritz Irrmann /originally from the Sudetenland/, who told us that we would all go to the bathroom to wash, and after the bath we would be sent to work, so he asked for skilled workers to come forward. I introduced myself along with 7 other men and declared myself a mechanic [maszynista-monter]. Irrmann ordered us skilled workers to put our clothes back on, and he took us to the workplace immediately. He ordered me, as a mechanic, to operate the gasoline machine with which huge pits were dug in the immediate vicinity of the camp [w bezpośrednim pobliżu obozu]. I worked in this capacity for 2 months. The following month, that is, at the end of November, I worked as a bricklayer at the extension of the camp kitchen. Thanks to these assignments, I had the opportunity to move around the camp area, and to ascertain on the basis of my own direct observation the treatment of detainees brought to Bełżec. Everyone was unloaded from the train; the women were pushed into the hair-cutting hut. There, their heads were shaved with machines, and then, they were shoved through the small courtyard [which was located] between this hut and the entrance to the gas chambers, into the gas chambers. All the men, except for this small percentage who were selected for work in the camp area, were shoved onto the road around the hut used to cut women's hair and, through the door that led to the small courtyard at the rear of the camp and then through [p. 4] the small courtyard, [were also shoved] into the gas chambers. In these chambers, people were crammed to such an extent that even after death they stood upright in the chambers. After all the chambers were filled, all the doors were hermetically sealed, the outer doors were slid shut and locked on both sides [of the two door leaves] for airtight closure, and then the engine was started. The work was directed by the inmate Moniek, a coachman from Krakow. The engine was running without interruption for exactly 20 minutes, after which Moniek gave the signal to one of the operators, and this engine was turned off. After the engine was turned off, inmates of the service staff, under Moniek's command, opened all the doors and, with the help of straps that were tightened around the hands of the corpses, the corpses were pulled by two [workers] out of the rooms and then dragged to the mass graves, previously dug with the use of machines. On the road, between the chamber ramp and the pit, dentists extracted gold teeth from corpses. The pits were all dug to a [identical] size and measured 100 meters long, 25 meters wide and 15 meters deep. The corpses were thrown into the pits haphazardly [w nieładzie], and only the upper layers that protruded one meter above the level of the ground surrounding the pits were systematically arranged, one corpse next to another. The prisoners covered the pile of corpses thusly arranged with sand. Before covering them, the corpses were sprinkled with lime. During the first days, a high mound of soil towered over such a pit. As time went by, this soil subsided, and the ground slowly leveled off.

I am unable to say what the chemical aspect [chemizm] of the mechanism of killing people in the Belżec chambers consisted of. I only know one thing, that from the engine room a pipe of one inch^[18] in diameter went into each of the gas chambers [z komór gazowych]. The outlets of these pipes ended in the individual chambers. I don't know whether any gas was released through these pipes into the chambers, whether the air in the chambers was compressed [zgęszczano] or whether the air was pumped out of the chambers. I was often on the ramp when the doors were opened. However, I never smelled any odors, and entering the rooms immediately after opening the door never had any harmful effects on my health. The corpses found in the chamber did not show [p. 4a] an unnatural color at all [żadnego nienaturalnego zabarwienia]. They all looked like living people, mostly their eyes were open. Only in a few cases did it happen that the corpses were stained with blood. The air in the rooms, after their opening, was clean, transparent and odorless [szyste, przezroczyste i bezwonne]. In particular, no smoke or combustion gases from the engine could be perceived. These gases were discharged by the engine directly to the outside and not into the chambers [Gazy te były odprowadzane z motoru wprost na dwór a nie do komór].

During my stay in the camp, i.e. over a period of 4 months, 3-4 trains arrived at the camp per day, consisting of 50 cars each. With these transports, Jews were brought from Poland, Czechoslovakia, Holland, Hungary, France, Denmark, Italy and Romania. All these unfortunates were told that they would go to Poland as settlers, and that is why the Jews took all their possessions with them. These possessions were taken from them immediately after unloading the cars, and were sent to the Reich. The same thing also applies to the gold in their teeth, which was melted into ingots right there, and together with other valuables, was delivered to the camp headquarters, which were located beyond its fence, in a building located near the railway station. The women's hair was sent in railway cars to Budapest. At the end of November, there were around [wokół] the camp already 30 filled pits of the dimensions I have already indicated. I note that the Belżec Camp was still operating throughout 1943 and a part of 1944.

During the first moments after closing the chambers filled with people, frightening screams and moans could be heard, but after a few minutes, there was a dead silence. It never happened that anyone was alive after the chambers were opened. The corpses of the slain were still warm. To cover the moans, an orchestra made up of inmates played from morning to night. SS men supervised the working inmates, beat them and goaded them on to work. Those who hesitated were mercilessly beaten. Of particular sadism was the volksdeutsch Schmidt, Zugwachmann, of Latvian origin. Every day he killed [p. 5] 30-40 [men] from the group of inmates spared for work. He compensated for the decrease [in manpower] by [taking inmates from] subsequent transport. He put people at the [edge of a] pit, then hit them with all his force on the head with the wooden handle of a pickaxe, and then threw them into the pit. In addition to the aforementioned Irrmann and Schmidt, Hauptscharführer Heinz Schwarz, Oberscharführer Faix, Zugwachmann Schneider, Oberwachmann Kunz and Oberwachmann Trottwein served in the camp.

In October [w październiku] of 1942, Himmler carried out an inspection of the camp in the company of SS Major General Katzmann, head of the Gestapo of the Lwów District. During this inspection, a gassing [gazowanie] of people and the burial of their corpses took place. After this inspection, the camp's armed service personnel received praise. From the happy faces of the inspectors and service staff it could be seen that the inspection had had a positive outcome.

At the end of November [z końcem listopada] of 1942, I went with a car under the escort of the SS to Lwów to buy sheet metal. We arrived in Lwów in the evening, spent the night in the Gestapo jail; the next day, still escorted by SS men, I completed the business of buying the sheet metal, and around noon I was put on the truck under the supervision of an SS man, who was Trottwein. After a while, I noticed that Trottwein had put his rifle aside and had fallen asleep. I took advantage of it, opened the door, and ran away. Since then, I had been hiding for 20 months in my factory [w mojej fabryce]. Anastazja Hawryluk, who had been my maid for many years, helped me in this. With her help, I survived the entire German occupation and waited for the Germans to retreat from Lwów. From the stories of the surrounding population, I know that in 1944, as the Russian front approached, the Germans reopened the pits in Belżec, sprinkled them with gasoline, and burned [them], extracted the unburned remains from the pits with machines, ground the bones [to make] artificial fertilizer, and covered the pits, thus erasing the traces of the crimes. An acquaintance of mine, the fitter Scharf-Szpilka, who had assembled the bone-grinding machine, told me about the bone grinding.

Read [out]. With this ends the interrogation of the witness and the report. Witness: Rudolf Reder. Recorded by: Krystyna Szymańska. District Investigating Judge Jan Sehn."

1.5. The Booklet “Bełżec” (1946)

In 1946 the Jewish Historical Commission of the Krakow District published a memorial by Reder titled Bełżec, with an introduction by Nella Rost (Reder 1946). The witness’s account covers pages 35-65. I translate it completely.

“[p. 35] As of August 1942, we still did not have a separate ghetto in Lwów. Some streets had been reserved exclusively for Jews. These, therefore, formed the Jewish quarter, which consisted of some isolated streets from the third quarter of Lwów, such as: Panieńska, Wąska, Ogrodnicka, Słeczna and others. We lived there anxiously and in constant anguish. Two weeks before the resettlement, there was generic talk of the impending doom. We were desperate. We already knew then what the word ‘resettlement’ [wysiedlenie] meant. In fact, it was said that a worker who had built the chambers during the first days of the installation of the death factory had managed to escape from the Bełżec death garrison, and that he had spoken of the ‘bath house,’ which was in reality the building intended for the gas chambers. He had predicted that none of the people who would be shoved into it would return.

It was also said that one of the Ukrainians employed in the killing of the Jews had told what was happening at Bełżec to one of his friends who, terrified as she was, felt it was her duty to disclose this and warn the doomed. The news about Bełżec reached us in these ways.

The legend of Bełżec, which we knew about and which made us shiver, thus became truth. Therefore, in the streets of the Jewish quarter, frightened people wandered about [p. 36] with a sense of helplessness already several days before August 10, and asked one other: ‘What should we do? What should we do?’

Only on 10 August, early in the morning, did the guards completely surround all the ends of the neighborhood’s streets. Gestapo, SS, Sonderdienst walked the streets in sets of five or six a few steps apart.^[19] The Ukrainian militiamen helped them a lot. Two weeks earlier, Major General [sic] Katzmann, the main cop of Lwów and Eastern Little Poland,^[20] had delivered the stamps [work permits] for some labor centers. Some centers also received stamps at the police station at the Smolka Post. There were not many of these ‘lucky ones.’ In mortal anguish, most were looking for some way out, a hiding place, an escape, but practically no one knew what to do or how to escape.

Meanwhile, for several days, the patrols searched house by house, hideout by hideout; the Gestapo men had granted stamps to some, yet not to others; those who did not have a stamp and those whose stamps were not accepted were forced out of the houses; they were not allowed to take along even a rag of clothing, or even a piece of bread. Then they gathered the mass of people, and those who resisted received a bullet in the head; I was in my workshop working, but I didn't have a stamp, so I locked myself up and remained silent, although I heard them coming. The Gestapo men broke down the door, found me in a hiding place, beat me on the head with their whips, and took me away. They crammed us all into streetcars, loaded us in so tightly that we could not move or even breathe, and took us to the Janowska [Street] Camp.

It was already evening. We were crammed together on a large meadow in a closed circle. We were 6,000. We were ordered to sit down, and we could not stand up, we could not move, not even extend our arms or legs. From a tower, a spotlight was turned on us; it was as bright as day, and we were surrounded by armed cops; we sat incredibly tight, all together, young and old, women and children of all ages. Some precise shots were fired; someone had gotten up; perhaps he wanted to be shot.

[p. 37] We sat like that all night. There was dead silence. Neither the women nor the children wept. At 6 in the morning we were ordered to get up from the damp grass, to line up in rows of four, and a long line of doomed people marched towards Kleparów Station. Gestapo men and Ukrainians surrounded us with a tight cordon. Not even a single man managed to escape. At the station, we were pushed onto the ramp [platform]. A long freight train was already waiting right behind the ramp. It had 50 cars. The loading of the train began. The doors of the cars were opened; on both sides there were Gestapo men, two on each side, with whips in their hands, and they beat everyone who entered in the face and on the head. The Gestapo men beat everyone. Each of us had [whip] marks on our faces, bumps on our heads. The women were sobbing, the children, close to their mothers, were crying. Goaded on by the Gestapo men, who were without compassion, they pushed one other. The entrance was high up; one had to climb up, [yet] they pushed one another down – after all, we rushed there all alone, as we wanted to get it already over with. On the roof of each car sat a Gestapo man with a submachine gun. Gestapo men beat and counted 100 [people] for each car. All this happened so quickly that the loading of a few thousand people did not last more than an hour.

In our transport, there were many men, even workers with various kinds of work certificates [who were] supposedly 'safe,' young and older children, young girls and old women.

They sealed all the cars. Crammed together into a crowd of huddled people, we stood close together, almost on top of each other. Sweltering, suffocating, we were close to madness. Without a drop of water, without a crumb of bread. The train moved at 8 am. I knew that the stoker and driver in the locomotive were Germans. The train went fast, but it seemed to us that it was moving very slowly. The train stopped three times: in Kulików, Żółkiew and Rawa Ruska. The stops were probably necessary for the regulation of railway traffic. During the stops, the Gestapo men [p. 38] descended from the roofs of the cars and did not let anyone approach the train. They did not allow [anyone] to bring any water, which the people, out of compassion, wanted to hand over through the barred window to those who were dying of thirst.

We went on, no one said a word. We were aware of going to death, of having no escape; apathetic, without complaint. We were all thinking about one thing: how to escape; but there was no possibility. The railway car in which we were traveling was completely new, the window so narrow that I could not stick my head out. In other cars it was certainly possible to break down the doors, because for a few minutes we heard them shooting at the fugitives. Nobody said anything and nobody comforted the women who complained, nobody stopped the babies from crying. We all knew it: we were going to a certain and terrible death. We wanted this to be over already. Maybe someone was saved, I don't know ... You could only try to escape from the train.

Around noon the train arrived at Bełżec Station. It was a little station. There were small houses around it. In these houses lived the men of the Gestapo. Bełżec is located on the Lublin-Tomaszów line. It is 15 kilometers away from Rawa Ruska. At Bełżec Station, the train was diverted from the main track and was taken to a siding that ran for a stretch of another kilometer directly to the gate of the death camp. Ukrainian railway workers also lived near the station, and there was a small post office. An old German with a thick black beard – I don't know his name, but I would recognize him immediately – arrived at Bełżec by car; he looked like an executioner; he took command of the train and made it enter the camp. The ride to the camp took two minutes. For four whole months I always saw this same scoundrel. The siding ran across the camps. On both sides there was a completely free space, without any buildings. The German who had brought the train to the camp got out of the car. He 'helped.' Hitting and screaming, he chased people off the train. He personally entered each car and checked if there was still anyone. [p. 39] He was informed of everything. When the train was empty and checked, he gave the signal with the flag and made it leave the camp.

This whole area of Bełżec was occupied by the Germans. Nobody could be seen [inside]. Civilians who had gotten lost [and were trespassing] were shot. The train arrived in the courtyard, which was about a kilometer long and wide [który miał około jeden kilometr wzdłuż i szerz] and was surrounded by barbed wire and iron nets, placed on top of each other, of two meters in height. The fences were not electrified. One entered into the courtyard through a large wooden gate covered with barbed wire. Next to the gate was a small house in which the telephone station was located. In front of this house there were some SS men with dogs. When the train arrived at the gate, the sentry opened it and went into the house. At that moment the 'reception of the train' took place. A few dozen SS men opened the railway cars shouting 'los' [Let's go!]. They routed the people out of the cars with whips and [rifle] butts. The cars' doors were located more than a meter above ground. Those who were driven out with whips had to jump, everyone, old and young. Having to jump on the ground, they would break their hands and legs. Children got hurt, everyone fell; dirty, exhausted, terrified. In addition to the SS men, the so-called 'Zugführer' were on duty. They were overseers of the permanent death-service personnel at the camp, dressed in the usual way, without camp badges. The sick, the elderly and the young children, that is, those who could not walk on their own, were carried on stretchers, and unloaded at the edges of huge pits that had been excavated. There the Gestapo man Irrmann shot them, after which he threw them into the pit with the butt of his rifle. This same Irrmann, a specialist in killing old people and small children, was a tall, dark, good-looking Gestapo man with a normal facial expression, like the others who lived in a house in Belżec, near the station, and – like the others – [they were] without a family and without women.

He came to the camp early in the morning, stayed there all day, and received the transports of death. Immediately after the unloading of the victims from the train, they were gathered in the courtyard surrounded by armed askari, and there Irrmann gave a speech. There was a dead silence. He stood close to the crowd. Everyone was eager to listen, [p. 40] suddenly hope arose in us. 'If they give us a speech, maybe we will live, maybe there will be some work, maybe, but...' Irrmann said very loudly and clearly: 'Ihr gehts jetzt baden, nachher werdet ihr zur Arbeit geschickt' ['Now you go bathing, afterwards you will be sent to work']. That's all. Everyone rejoiced; after all, they were glad to go to work. They applauded. I remember these his words having been repeated day after day, mostly three times a day, repeated for the four months of my stay there. This was the moment of hope and illusion. For a moment, the people breathed in relief. There was complete calmness. The crowd proceeded in absolute silence, the men across the courtyard directly to the building on which was written in large letters: 'Bade und Inhalationsräume' [bathing and inhalation rooms]. The women went about 20 meters [further on] to a large hut measuring 30 by 15 meters. In this hut, the women's and girls' hair was cut. They entered without knowing why they were being led there. Now was the time for calmness and silence. Then I learned that only a few minutes later, when they were given wooden stools and arranged themselves crosswise in the hut, when they were ordered to sit down, and 8 Jewish barbers, silent like a set of robots, approached them in order to shave their hair with a machine [down to] the skin, at this moment the whole truth was revealed to their minds, and none of them, and none of the men, could have had any more doubts on the way to the gas chambers.

All but a few men who had been selected as skilled workers needed there – everyone – young and old, children and women – all went to a certain death. Girls with long hair were sent to the haircut, while girls with short hair went directly to the chambers with the men.

Suddenly – without passing from hope to final despair – moans, screams arose – many women had hysterical attacks. But many women died calmly, especially young girls. In our transport there were 1,000 intellectuals, very young men and – as in all subsequent transports – a majority of women.

[p. 41] I stood on one side, in the courtyard, with the group [of men] left behind to dig the pits, and I watched my brothers, sisters, acquaintances and friends pushed to their deaths. By the time the women, completely naked, were driven with whips like cattle to the slaughter, without being counted, all in a hurry – the men were already dying in the chambers. The shearing of the women lasted no more than 2 hours, and so did the preparation for the killing and the killing itself.

A dozen SS men urged the women with whips and pointed bayonets to the chamber building up three steps into the vestibule, and the askaris counted [odliczali] 750 people for each room. Women who refused to enter got stabbed in their body with bayonets by the askaris; blood flowed, and in this manner, they pushed them to the execution. One could hear doors open, moans and screams, desperate pleadings in Polish, Hebrew; the wailing of children and women that made one's blood freeze, and then a terrible common scream... This lasted 15 minutes – the machine ran for 20 minutes, and after 20 minutes of silence, the askari opened the exterior doors, and I began to work together with other workers without marks and without tattoos, spared from previous transports as I had been.

We dragged the corpses of people who had still been alive a little while earlier, we dragged them with the help of leather belts [za pomocą pasków skórzanych] to the huge [already-]prepared mass graves, and an orchestra played near them; it played from morning to evening.

[p. 42] A short time later, I was already familiar with all the [camp's] terrain. It was located in the middle of a young pine forest. The afforestation was dense, and to further reduce the penetration of light, other trees had been tied to the trees; the thickness of afforestation along the place where the chambers were located had been doubled. Behind them [was] a sandy road along which the corpses were dragged. Over it, the Germans had built a roof made of taut iron wires, on which they had scattered green foliage. It was meant to protect the ground from aerial observation. This part of the camp was obscured under the leaf roof. From the gate, one entered a huge courtyard. In the courtyard, there was a large hut in which the women's hair was shorn off. Next to this hut there was a small courtyard [małe podwórko], enclosed by a board fence of tightly nailed boards, without the slightest gap, 3 meters high. This fence, made of gray boards, led up to the actual chambers. In this way, no one could see what was happening behind the fence. The building in which the chambers were located was not high; it was long and wide, of gray concrete [z szarego betonu], had a flat roof covered with roofing felt, and above it again a wire-mesh roof covered with green foliage. From the courtyard, 3 steps, one meter wide, without railings, led up to it. A large vase of colorful flowers was placed on the building's facade. On the wall [na ścianie] was written legibly and clearly: 'Bade und Inhalationsräume.' Through the steps, one entered a dark corridor [p. 44²¹] one-and-a-half meters wide, but very long. It was completely empty, four concrete walls. From the corridor, to the right and left, doors led to the chambers. The doors, made of wood, one meter wide, opened using a wooden handle. The chambers were completely dark, windowless and absolutely bare. In each chamber, a round opening the size of an electrical switch was visible [widoczny był]. The walls and floor of the chambers were made of concrete. The corridor and the chambers were lower than normal rooms; they were no more than 2 meters high [nie więcej niż dwa metry]. Furthermore, in the front wall of each chamber, there was a moving [sliding] door, 2 meters wide, through which the people's corpses were carried away after [their] suffocation [uduszenie]. Outside the building, there was a rather small annex, measuring perhaps 2 by 2 meters, in which the 'machine' was located, a gasoline-powered engine ['maszyna', motor pędzony benzyną]. The chambers were one-and-a-half meters above ground; [there was] a ramp next to the doors, at the same level as the chamber, from which the corpses were thrown onto the ground.

Inside the camp, there were two huts for the death personnel, one for general workers, the other for so-called skilled workers. Each hut contained 250 workers. The bunks were on two levels. The two huts were identical. The bunks consisted of simple boards, and a small board [ran] underneath the head [as a pillow]. Near the huts were the kitchen, then the warehouse, the administration, laundry, tailor shop, and finally elegant huts for the askari.

On both sides of the building[s] were filled or empty pits. I saw a whole row of pits already full and filled to the top [wysoko] with sand. After a while, the ground subsided. There had always to be an empty reserve pit.

[p. 45] I stayed at the death camp from August to the end of November – this was the period of mass asphyxiation [duszenia] of the Jews. A few companions in misfortune, those few who had managed to stay there longer, told me that in this period the death transports reached their peak. They arrived every day, without a day off, mostly 3 times a day, and each train had 50 cars, and each car held 100 people. When the transports arrived at night, the victims of Bełżec waited in the closed cars until 6 am. On average, 10,000 people were killed per day.

It happened [on occasion] that the transports were even larger and more frequent. Jews came from everywhere, and only Jews. There were never any other transports. Bełżec was used exclusively for the killing of Jews. At the railway cars, the Jews were unloaded by Gestapo men, the askaris and the 'Zugführer'; a few steps further on, in the courtyard during the undressing, there were already Jewish workers – they asked in a low voice: 'Where are you from?' They answered in a whisper: 'From Lwów, from Krakow, from Zamość, from Wielicz, from Jasło, from Tarnów, etc.' I saw this every day, two, three times a day.

With each transport, the same thing happened as with mine. They were ordered to undress, things remained in the courtyard, Irrmann always spoke hypocritically and [said] always the same thing. At that moment, the people always rejoiced; I saw this same glimmer of hope [p. 46] in the people's eyes.

The hope to go to work. But a moment later, toddlers were separated from their mothers, the old and the sick were carried on stretchers, the men and girls were urged forward with [rifle] butts further and further up the fenced-in alley directly to the chambers, and the naked women were directed just as brutally into the other hut, where their hair was shorn off. I knew exactly the moment when everyone understood what awaited them, and the fear, desperation, screams and terrible moans mixed in with the tune of the orchestra. The first men were goaded with bayonets, running wounded into the gas chambers. The askaris counted [odliczali] 750 people for each chamber. Even before all six chambers were completely filled, the people in the first chamber had already been suffering for two hours. Only when all six [chambers] were crammed with people so tightly that the doors could be closed only with difficulty, was the machine started.

The machine was one-and-a-half by one meter in size; there was an engine and wheels [motor i kola]. The engine roared for quite long time intervals; it went pretty fast, so fast that the spokes of the wheels could not be distinguished [szprych w kołch]. The machine ran for 20 minutes by the clock. It was turned off after 20 minutes. The external doors of the chambers that opened onto the ramp were opened immediately, and the corpses were thrown onto the ground, rising up to an enormous pile of a few meters high. When opening the doors, the askari did not take any precautions, nor did we notice any smell; I never saw gas cylinders,^[22] nor any other admixtures [domieszek] that were poured out – I only saw petrol canisters. About 80-100 liters of gasoline were consumed every day. Two askari were in charge of the machine. But when the machine broke down once, I was called too, because I was called ‘der Ofenkünstler’ [the furnace artificer]; I looked at it and saw glass tubes [rurki szklane] that were connected to the tubes that went into each chamber. We were of the opinion that the machine either produced high pressure [wysokie ciśnienie], or caused a vacuum [próżnię], or the gasoline produced carbon monoxide which killed the people. The begging for help, the screams, the desperate cries of those who were locked up and asphyxiated in the chambers lasted 10 or 15 minutes; terribly loud; then [p. 47] the screams stopped; in the end, everything was quiet. I listened to desperate screams and pleadings in various languages, because there were not only Polish Jews, there were also transports of foreign Jews. Among the transports of foreign Jews there were mostly French, Dutch, Greek, even Norwegian Jews. I don’t remember any transports of German Jews. Instead, there were Czech Jews. They arrived in cars identical to those of the Polish Jews, but with luggage, with normal outfits and with provisions. Our transports were full of women and children. The transports of foreign Jews mostly contained men, and there were few children. Evidently the parents had been able to leave them under the custody of their fellow citizens, and to save them from a terrible fate. Jews from foreign countries arrived in Belżec completely ignorant, certain that work would await them. They were well dressed, carefully prepared for the journey. The treatment of these people by the German cops was exactly the same as that of the Jews in the other transports, and the killing system was also exactly the same. They also perished in a terrible and desperate manner.

During my stay in the camp there may have been 100,000 foreign Jews; they were all gassed [zagazowani].

When the askaris opened the hermetically closed doors after 20 minutes of asphyxiation, the corpses were standing upright [trupy były w pozycji stojące], the faces as if dreaming, unaltered, not blue; blood [shed] here and there by the wounds inflicted by the bayonets of the askari; their mouth a little open, the hands contracted, often wrapped around the lungs [chest]. Those who stood closest fell like mannequins through the wide-open doors.

[p. 48] All women were shorn before being killed. They were driven into the hut; the remaining women waited their turn near the hut, naked, barefoot, even in winter and in the snow [nawet w zimie i na śniegu]. Among the women, weeping and despair dominated. At this moment, the screaming and moaning began; mothers hugged their children; they lost their mind. It broke my heart every time; I couldn't stand this sight. The group of shorn women was goaded on, and the others walked on hair of various colors, with which the whole floor of the hut was covered like a high, soft carpet. After all the women of the transport had been shorn, four workers with brooms made of limewood swept all their hair together into a large pile of hair of various colors, half the height of the room, put it with their hands into burlap bags, and took them to the warehouse.

The warehouse for the hair, linen, clothing of the gas-chamber victims [komory gazowej] was located in a small separate hut, perhaps 6 by 8 meters. The goods and hair were stored there for 10 days, and after 10 days, the hair and the clothes were separately put into bags, after which a freight train arrived and took away this loot. Men working in the office told me that the hair was sent to Budapest. In particular, a Sudeten Jew employed in the office, the lawyer Schreiber, gave me this information. He was a decent man. [p. 49] Irrmann had told him he would take him away when he went on leave. Once Irrmann went on a short leave. I heard Schreiber say to him: 'Nehmen Sie mich mit?' ['Are you taking me along?']. And Irrmann replied: 'Noch nicht' ['Not yet']. In this way, he deceived him, and Schreiber certainly perished like everyone else. He himself told me that every few days an entire railway car of hair bags was sent to Budapest. Except for the hair, the Germans escorted all the baskets of gold teeth.^[23]

Along the path that led from the gas chamber to the pits and therefore in the space of a few hundred meters, there were some dentists with pincers, and

[they] stopped everyone who dragged the corpses; they opened the mouths of the dead, looked inside them and extracted the gold, after which they threw it into the basket. There were 8 dentists. They were mainly young people, spared from a transport in order to do this job. I knew one of them well; his name was Zucker, a native of Rzeszów. The dentists lived separately in a small hut together with the doctor and the pharmacist. At sunset, they brought baskets full of gold teeth to the hut, and there they picked out the gold and melted it into small ingots. The Gestapo man Schmidt guarded them, and when the work proceeded too slowly, he beat them. A transport had to be processed within two hours. The teeth were cast into ingots one centimeter thick, half a centimeter wide and twenty centimeters long.

Every day, jewels, money, dollars were taken from the warehouse; the SS men themselves took them and put them in suitcases that a worker took to Belżec, to the headquarters. A Gestapo man walked in front of them, but Jewish workers carried the suitcases. It was close to the Belżec railway station, 20 minutes by road. The Belżec Camp, i.e. the executions at Belżec, was subject to these headquarters. Jews who worked in the administration told me that an entire transport of gold, jewels and money was sent to Lublin, where the main headquarters were located, to which the Belżec headquarters were subordinated. The worn-out clothes of the hapless Jewish victims were taken by the workers and carried to the warehouse. 10 workers were there who had to carefully unstitch every piece of clothing under the surveillance and the whip of the SS men [p. 50], who shared the money found among themselves. Special SS men were assigned to this surveillance, and always the same ones. The Jewish workers who were in charge of selecting and unstitching the clothes could not get hold of anything, and did not even want to. What could we care about the money and the jewels? We couldn't buy anything, nor did we have any hope of staying alive. None of us believed in a miracle. Each worker was searched very carefully, but we often walked on abandoned dollars that had gone unnoticed; we didn't even take these. They were useless, and so we had nothing to do with them. A shoemaker once intentionally and openly took five dollars. He and his son were shot; he went to death happily, he wanted to end it. Death was certain, so why torture yourself any further... Dollars in Belżec served us to die more easily...

[p. 51] I was part of the permanent death personnel; all in all, we were 500 in total. There were only 250 'specialists,' and 200 of them worked at a task that did not require special skills: the excavation of graves and the dragging of corpses. We dug pits [doły] and huge mass graves [groby masowe], and dragged the corpses there. The specialists also had to participate, in addition to carrying out their work. We dug with shovels; there was also a machine that loaded and spread the sand on the ground. The machine unloaded sand near the pit. A mountain of sand formed with which the pit was covered that was overflowing with corpses. About 450 men were permanently employed at the pits. Digging a pit took a week. To me it was very terrible that we were ordered to pile the corpses [up to] a meter on top of an already full pit, and to cover them with sand, and ominous, thick blood burst out of the pits and flooded the whole surface. We had to go from one edge of a pit to the other [edge] in order to go to another pit. We immersed our legs in the blood of our brothers; we walked on heaps of corpses, and that was very nasty, very atrocious... While we were working, the cop Schmidt watched us, pummeled us, beat us. If someone – in his opinion – did not work fast enough, he ordered him to stop, gave him 25 lashes with the whip, ordered him to count them, and if he miscounted, gave him 50 instead of 25. [p. 52] A severely beaten man could not take 50 lashes; usually the victim was dragged to the hut and died the next day. This was repeated a couple of times a day.

Furthermore, 30-40 workers were shot every day. Usually the doctor handed over the list of exhausted men – or the list of ‘criminals’ – to the so-called ‘Oberzugführer,’ the head guard of the inmates, so that every day 30-40 inmates died. At lunchtime they were taken to a pit and shot. This list was also completed each day, with the same number of people spared from some transport every day. Only the registration – of old and new inmates – was brought to the administration office, and it was calculated that the number of inmates always amounted to 500. There was no numerical registration of the victim transports.

For example, we knew that Jews had built this camp and had installed the death machine. No one from this group was there anymore. It was a miracle if any of the Belzec service personnel survived for 5 or 6 months.

The actual machine was operated by two askari fiends, always the same. I found them [employed] at this work and left them there [still doing it]. The Jewish workers had no contact with them, as with any other askari. When people of a transport asked for a little water, the askari shot the Jewish workers who gave it to them.

In addition to digging the pits, it was the death personnel’s job to get the corpses out of the chambers, throw them onto a large pile, and then drag them to the pits. The ground was sandy. Two workers had to drag one corpse. We had leather straps with a buckle that we placed on the hand [wrist] of a corpse, often the head sank into the sand, and we dragged it... They ordered us to load onto our backs the corpses of small children two at a time, and to carry them like that. When we dragged the corpses, we suspended digging the pits. When we dug pits, we knew that thousands of our brothers were being asphyxiated in the chambers. We had to work this way from early morning to dusk. [p. 53] Twilight ended the working day, because this ‘work’ was carried out only during daylight.

Already at half past four in the morning, the askari on guard who went around the hut at night knocked on the door and shouted: ‘Auf! Heraus!’ [‘Get up! Get out!’]. Before we could even get up, Cop Schmidt would arrive and chase us out of the hut with his whip. We ran outside carrying one boot or barefoot.

Generally, we did not undress; we even wore boots [overnight], because in the morning we could not get dressed in time.

It was still dark in the morning when we got woken up; there was no light. Schmidt ran to the hut hitting left and right. We got up sad, exhausted to the extreme, just as when we went to sleep. We had received only one thin blanket; we could cover ourselves with it or put it on the bunk. Old, worn-out rags had been chosen for us in the warehouse; – when someone only sighed, he got it in his face.

In the evening, the light remained on for half an hour; then it was turned off. The ‘Oberzugführer’ went around the hut with the whip, and we could not talk. We talked with our [bed] neighbors very quietly.

The service personnel consisted mainly of people whose wives, children and parents had been gassed. Many had taken from the warehouse ‘tales’ [talleth: prayer shawls] and ‘tfilim’ [tefillin: phylacteries, prayer belts], and when the hut was locked at night, we heard the ‘kadiesz’ prayer [kaddish: memorial prayer] in the bunks. We recited the prayer for the dead. Then there was silence. We did not complain; we had given up completely. Perhaps these 15 ‘Zugführer’ still deluded themselves; we did not.

We all vacillated like people who had no will. We were a crowd. I know several names, but only a few. It was also irrelevant who one was and what one’s name was. I know that the physician was a young doctor from Przemyśl; his name was Jakubowicz. I also knew a merchant from Krakow, Schlüss, and his son; the Czech Jew Ellbogen, who apparently had had a bicycle store; the cook Goldschmidt, from the well-known Karlsbad restaurant ‘Brüder [Brothers] Hanicka.’ Nobody was interested in the others; we mechanically lived this terrible life.

[p. 54] At 12 we received lunch – we passed in front of two windows, in one we received a mess tin, in the other half a liter of pearl-barley soup, that is with water, sometimes with a potato. Before lunch we had to sing a song – we had to sing also before the evening coffee. – While the cries of those asphyxiated were heard from the chambers, the orchestra played; in front of the kitchen there was a high gallows...

[p. 55] The life of the SS at Belżec and at the execution capital itself [i.e. in the camp] took place without the presence of women. Even the orgies were exclusively male. The men did all the work. It was like this until October. In October, a transport of Czech Jews arrived from Zamość. These were a few dozen women whose husbands worked in the death staff. It was decided to spare the [these] few dozens of women from this last transport. Forty were assigned to work in the kitchen, laundry and tailoring. They were not allowed to meet their husbands. In the kitchen they peeled potatoes, washed the pots and brought water. I don’t know what became of them. They certainly shared everyone’s fate. They were just refined women. They arrived with luggage. Some had pieces of butter with them. They gave away what they had. And they helped, if anyone was working in the kitchen or near the kitchen. They were staying in a small separate hut: they had a 'Zugführerin' over them. During the work (I repaired the stoves everywhere and went around the whole camp), I saw that these women were talking to each other. They weren't mistreated as we were. The work for them ended at dusk; they sat down in twos to [receive] soup and coffee. Like us, they had not been deprived of their clothes; they were not given a prison uniform. It wasn't worth putting on this uniform for such a short time. Straight from the railway cars, with their heads shaved, they were assigned to the workshops and the kitchen. From the kitchen window and the tailor's shop, they could see the death transports arriving every day...

[p. 56] The death camp was steeped in mass murder day after day. There was a day of deadly mass terror and mass murder. But there were also individual cases of personal mistreatment. I experienced and saw that too. There was never a roll call in Bełżec. There was no need for it. The display of horror took place without public announcement. I have to report about a transport from Zamość. It was around November 15th. It was already cold; snow and mud were on the ground. In such a storm, a large transport arrived from Zamość, one of many. The entire Judenrat [Jewish council] was on the transport. When they were all already naked, the men were forced into the chambers, the women into the haircutting hut, as usual. The president of the Judenrat was ordered to remain in the courtyard. The askaris urged the transport to the execution, and an entire group of SS men stood around the president of the Judenrat. I don't know what his name was; I saw a middle-aged man, pale as a corpse and quite calm.

The SS ordered the orchestra to move into the courtyard and wait for instructions. – The orchestra, made up of 6 musicians, usually played in the area between the gas chamber and the pits. It played incessantly with instruments stolen from those murdered. At that time, I was doing some brickwork nearby, and I saw them all. The SS ordered the orchestra to play the melody 'es geht alles vorüber [p. 57], es geht alles vorbei' ['Everything will pass, everything will be over'], – 'Drei Lilien, kommt ein Reiter gefahren, bricht die Lilien' ['Three lilies, a horseman arrives, picks the lilies'] - violins, flutes and accordions played. This lasted for some time. Then they put the president of the Zamość Judenrat on the wall and beat him with whips [with strips] ending in lead balls, especially on the head and in the face. Irrmann, the big Gestapo man Schwarz, Schmidt and some askari tortured him. This victim was ordered to dance and jump to the beats and [to the sound of] the music. After a few hours, a quarter of a loaf was brought to him, and he was forced to eat it while being beaten. He was standing, covered in blood, indifferent, serious; I didn't hear a moan. The tormenting of this man lasted six hours. The SS stood there and laughed at him: 'das ist eine höhere Person, Präsident des Judenrates' ['This is a higher (important) person, the president of the Jewish council'] – they shouted loudly in a rogue way. It was only at six in the evening that the Gestapo man Schmidt shoved him to the pit, shot him in the head, and kicked him [causing him to fall] onto the heap of gassed corpses.

There were also other notable events. Shortly after my arrival in Belzec, a very young guy was chosen from among the others of a transport, I don't know from which city (I didn't always know where a transport came from). He was the embodiment of health, strength and youth. He astounded us with his serenity. He looked around and asked almost happily: – 'Has anyone already escaped from here?' That was enough. – Some of the Germans overheard him, and he, still almost a boy, was tortured to death. They undressed him, hung him upside down on the gallows; he hung there for three hours. He was tough and was still alive. They pulled him down, laid him down on the sand, and with sticks [sic] shoved sand down his throat. He died.

On occasion, more transports arrived than usual. It happened that, instead of 50 cars, 60 and more arrived. Shortly before my escape in November, 100 people from such an overcrowded transport, who were already naked, had to be left [alive] for the work of burying corpses, because the Gestapo men had calculated that the permanent service personnel would not have managed to put so many gassing victims into the grave in such a short time. They spared only young men. All day they dragged corpses to the pits under the whips; they were not given a drop of water, [p. 58] naked in the snow and in the cold – in the evening, the cop Schmidt took them to the pit and shot them with a Browning. For about ten, there were not enough bullets, so he killed them one after the other, up to the last, with the handle of a pickaxe. I did not hear complaints; I only saw that in the death queue they were trying to overtake each other, these abandoned relics of life and youth.

The whole camp was placed under the surveillance of askari guard chains and a few dozen SS men. Some were distinguished at every step by their particular atrocity. [They were] just beasts. While some killed and beat 'coolly,' others enjoyed killing; they laughed; I could see that they were happy when they looked at the naked people stabbed with bayonets who were being goaded toward the chambers.

With joy they watched the people, particularly the young, desperate and discouraged. We knew that the camp commandant lived in a beautiful little house at the Belzec Station. He was an Obersturmführer, whose name I don't succeed to remember, although I continually strive to recall this name; it had a short sound. He came to the camp rather infrequently; he showed up on the occasion of some event. He was a tall, broad-shouldered cop, over 40 years of age, with a normal facial expression – so perhaps apparently a born thug. He was a perfect beast.

Once the killing machine broke down. Informed of this, he arrived on horseback, ordered the machine to be repaired, and did not let people out of the asphyxiation chambers; – they had to [wait to] die of asphyxiation for another couple of hours. He leaned down in anger, screamed and was all excited. Although he rarely showed up, it was the terror of the SS. He lived alone, [p. 60] with an askari orderly at his service. Every day the askari reported to him. The commandant and many of the Gestapo men had no permanent contact with the camp. They had their own canteen, and a cook was brought in by the Germans who cooked for all the Germans. No one ever came with their family, no one lived with a woman. They raised whole flocks of geese and ducks. People said that a whole basket of cherries had been sent to him in the spring. Crates of vodka and wine were brought [to him] every day.

I fixed a stove there [at the commandant's house]. There were two young Jewish girls to pluck the ducks; they threw an onion and a turnip to me. I also saw a local girl who worked there as well as the attendants themselves.

Every Sunday evening, they brought the orchestra, and organized a party with drinks. There, only the Gestapo men met, eating and drinking. They threw the remains of food to the musicians. When the commandant appeared at the camp for a few minutes, I saw the Gestapo men and the askari trembling with fear.

In addition to him, four other brigands managed [the camp] by way of Gestapo men, supervising and directing the entire slaughterhouse. Hardly ever did all the cops show up. One of them, Fritz Irrmann, a man of about 30 years, Stabsführer, in charge of supplies at the camp, was a specialist in shooting children and old people. He carried out every atrocity with absolute calm, acted in a mysterious and silent way; every day he spoke to the desperate people who went to the bath house and to work. [He was] a meticulous criminal.

Oberscharführer Faix Reinhold carried out his atrocities differently. He was originally from Gablonz upon Neisse [today's Jablonec nad Nisou], apparently married, father of two. He had a cultured man's way of speaking. He spoke quickly. When someone did not understand him immediately, he beat him, screamed at the top of his lungs like a madman. When he once ordered the kitchen to be repainted, and a Jewish doctor of chemistry did it, who was standing right in the corner under the ceiling on a ladder, he ordered him to descend from the ladder repeatedly, then beat him in the face with the whip so that it was swollen and covered in blood. He did his job like that. Faix gave the impression of being abnormal.

[p. 61] He played the violin. He ordered the orchestra to play continuously the melody 'Montanaro, Don't You Mind?' until exhaustion. He ordered people to sing, dance, and he mocked and mistreated them. [He was] a mad beast.

I don't know which of them was more infernal and more terrible, whether it was Faix or the big, stocky, dark assassin Schwarz (originally from the center of the Reich). He checked that the askaris were beastly enough to us and that they mistreated us severely enough. He watched us during the excavation of the pits, that is, he didn't give us a moment of respite. With the screams, with the whip, with ruthless blows he chased us from the pits to the chambers, where piles of corpses awaited the ultimate road toward the deep pits. He pushed us there and again ran to the pits. On the very edge of the graves, children, old people, sick people waited and gloomily looked down with dazed eyes. They were waiting for death. They had been allowed to look at the corpses and the blood at length, and to inhale into themselves the fumes of putrefaction, only to be liquidated a moment later by the blows of the bloodthirsty Irrman. Schwarz continually beat everyone. You couldn't protect your face from the blows. – 'Hände ab!' ['Hands down!'] – he yelled, and mistreated us with pleasure. The young volksdeutsch Heni Schmidt, probably Latvian, enjoyed his bestial mission even more. He rarely spoke German, instead of 's' he said 't' (not 'was' [what], but 'wat'). He spoke Russian with the askari. He never wished to leave the camp even for a day. Light-footed, quick, slender, with the mouth of a gangster, constantly drunk, he ran all over the camp from 4 in the morning to the evening, mistreating, gladly watching the tormenting of the victims and rejoicing at this sight. – 'He is the worst cop' – murmured the inmates and immediately they said to themselves, 'They are all the worst.' He was the first to appear where people were harassed the most. He was always [present] when the hapless victims were pushed into the chambers, listening to the shrill screams of the women that came out of the terrible chambers and split the air. He was the 'soul' of the camp, the vilest, the most terrible, the most bloodthirsty. With joy he stared at the gloomy faces, exhausted to the extreme, of those who returned to the hut in the evening. He had to hit [p. 62] everyone with the whip on the head with all his strength. When any of us managed to escape from him, he would chase him and torture him. These Gestapo men and others who beat less – they were monsters. None of them was human for even a moment.

From 7 am to dusk they tormented thousands of people in various ways. At dusk they returned to their quarters near the station. The askaris served at night with submachine guns. During the day, the Gestapo men received the death transports with a parade.

The cops' biggest party was Himmler's visit. It was in mid-October [w połowie października]. Since the morning we saw that the Gestapo criminals were behaving in a mysterious way. That day the entire killing of 1,000 people took less time. Everything happened very quickly. Irrman announced: 'Es kommt eine höhere Person, muss Ordnung sein' ['A higher (important) person is coming, there must be order']. They didn't say who, but we all knew it, because the askari muttered it among themselves.

At about 3 pm, Himmler arrived with Major General Katzman [sic], the main murderer of Lwów and the district, along with an adjutant and 10 Gestapo men. Irrman and the others led the guests to the chambers, from where the corpses fell [sic] and from where they were thrown into the place where a horrible pile of young and very-young children's bodies grew. The inmates dragged the corpses. Himmler watched, watched for half an hour, and left. I saw the joy and the great cheerfulness of the Gestapo men; I saw that they were very happy, that they laughed. I heard they were talking about promotions.

[p. 63] I cannot define in what state of mind we, the doomed prisoners, lived and what we felt in hearing these terrible cries of people who were asphyxiated every day, and the begging of the children. Three times a day we saw thousands of people close to losing their minds. And we were very close to madness. We carried on day after day, not knowing how. We had no illusions, not even for a moment. We were dying little by little every day, along with all the transports of people who for a brief moment had still experienced the torture of illusion. Apathetic and discouraged, we did not even feel hunger and cold. Everyone was waiting for their turn, knowing they had to die and that they had to suffer in an inhuman way. Only when I heard the children cry out – ‘Mom! But I have been good! [It’s] dark! Dark!’ – our hearts ripped to pieces. But then we stopped having feelings.

By the end of November, 4 months had already passed of my incredible stay at the Bełżec execution [camp]. One morning, Cop Irrman told me that the camp needed sheet metal, a lot of sheet metal. At that point, I was swollen and bruised, pus came out of the sores. Gestapo man Schmidt tormented me with a stick on both sides of the face. With malicious laughter, Irrman told me to go under guard to Lwów to [look for] sheet metal – ‘Sollst nicht durchgehen’ [‘You must not escape’]. After getting into the car, I left with four Gestapo men and a guard. In Lwów, after a full day of loading up [p. 64] sheet metal, I stayed in the car under the surveillance of a cop; the others went to have fun [zabawić]. I sat for a couple of hours without thoughts and without moving. I happened to observe that my guard had fallen asleep and was snoring. Instinctively, without thinking for a moment, I slipped out of the car; the cop was asleep. I stopped on the sidewalk, pretended for a moment more to rummage around the sheet metal; I walked away slowly; there was a great deal of movement in Legionów Street. I pulled down my cap; there was blackout in the streets; no one saw me. I remembered where a Polish woman lived, my housekeeper; I went to her. She hid me. Over twenty months the sores all over my body healed. Not just the sores. The images of the atrocities experienced haunted me. While awake and when dreaming, I heard the cries of the tortured victims. And the begging of the children. And the roar of the engine. I couldn’t get the criminal face of every Gestapo man out of my mind. I stayed [there] until the moment of liberation.

When the Red Army drove the German cops out of Lwów, I was able to step out into God’s world, look around without fear, breathe fresh air and, for the first time since the time of German captivity, think of something and feel – I longed to see the place where two and a half million [dwa i pół miliona] had been asphyxiated, who wanted to live, to live.

I went there early. I talked to the inhabitants in the vicinity. They told me that in 1943 there had been less and less transports, that the Jewish killing center had moved to the Oświęcim [Auschwitz] gas chamber. In 1944, the pits were reopened, the corpses were doused with petrol, and burned. A thick black smoke hovered for tens of kilometers around the gigantic furnaces [palenisk]. The stench and bad air spread widely with the wind over a large area. For long days and nights, for long weeks.

And then – said the inhabitants of the vicinity – the bones were ground up and the wind dispersed the dust over the fields and into the woods.

The bone-grinding machine was installed by an inmate from the Janowska Camp, Szpilke, who was brought to Bełżec for this purpose. He told me that he found only piles of bones, all [p. 65] the buildings were gone. Then he managed to escape and save himself. He currently resides in Hungary. He reported this to me already after the liberation of Lwów by the Red Army.

When the production of ‘artificial fertilizer’ with millions of human bones ended and the torn pits [sic] were filled, the surface of the blood-soaked soil was leveled in an orderly and accurate way. The German criminal monsters covered the graves of millions of Jews at the Bełżec execution [camp] with dense vegetation.

I took my leave from my informants and went along the street known to me as the ‘siding.’ It was gone. A field led me to a pine forest, alive, fragrant. There was a lot of tranquility there then. In the middle of the woods was a large bright meadow.”

1.6. The Affidavit of December 7, 1954

This statement was made in Toronto by Reder, who at the time called himself Roman Robak, in order to obtain reparations from the Federal Republic of [West] Germany for the victims of National Socialism. The Polish text published by Libionka (Libionka, pp. 62-66) is a simple translation of the German text found in the files of the Bełżec Trial against Josef Oberhauser, where it is registered as a “transcript of a photocopy” (“Abschrift von Fotokopie”), but the original was undoubtedly in English, as evidenced by the final certificate in this language. Since I was unable to locate the English original, I consequently retranslate the German translation from the files of the Oberhauser trial.

The first page contains personal information, which I have already mentioned earlier when introducing this person. Only at the bottom of the first page does the witness mention Bełżec, and then in detail on the subsequent two pages:²⁴

“[p. 226...] I was deprived of my freedom when I was sent to the Lemberg [Lwow] Ghetto. In November 1942, I fled from the Belzec Concentration Camp and remained in hiding in Lemberg until July 1944.

I have been at the following places and detention centers:

- 1) Lemberg Ghetto (Poland): Dec. 1941 – Aug. 16, 1942*
- 2) Belzec Extermination Camp: Aug. 16, 1942 – Nov. 1942.*

[p. 227] On 1). The Lemberg Ghetto was established in December 1941. At first the ghetto was not surrounded by walls or barbed wire, but it was surrounded by the German and Ukrainian police. Leaving the ghetto was prohibited under threat of death. In August 1942, the ghetto was surrounded with a 3m-high, double-board fence. Jewish alleys were Wrzybranowakiego, Mlynarska, Jakuba Hermana, Akademicka, Legionow, Panienska, Zoltkiewska, Marcina, Balanowa, Kollontaja, Plac Smolski and others. The elder of the Jews was the lawyer Dr. Leib Landau. Schildhorn was the head of the Jewish Police. The Poles were allowed to enter the ghetto. I lived in the ghetto at 12 Wrzybranowakiego, had to wear the Star of David, and had to do forced labor. I wore a white armband with a blue Star of David. I worked in the Lemberg soap factory, Panienska 7, which was put into operation by the Germans. I worked as a master boiler in the factory and received no pay. Engineer Kaufmann was the factory manager. I worked there until I was arrested at home by the Gestapo on Aug. 16, 1942. I was taken to the Podzamcza military barracks, from where I was taken to ZAL [labor camp] Janowska with many other Jews. We were kept here for one night, and the next morning we were loaded into railway cars at the Kleparow Railway Station after we had been ruthlessly beaten.

Ad 2). On Aug. 17, 1942, I was deported to the Belzec Extermination Camp. The place is not far from Rawa Ruska, about 20 km to the north. We were unloaded and had to strip naked. Skilled workers were asked to step out. I reported as a mechanic. Only 8 men were left behind, the rest were gassed immediately. We were about 4500 people in the transport. The camp commandant, Oberstabsscharführer Fritz I r r m a n n (he came from the Sudetenland) told us that we would be sent to work after having taken a bath. All the prisoners were taken to a large hut, where the heads of the women had been shorn. Then they were driven into a narrow corridor, there was a door with the label 'Bath and Inhalation Rooms.' In front of the door hang a flower pot with a flower. When the door was opened, there was another corridor, three doors on the right and three doors on the left, which led into 6 gas chambers. Each chamber held 750 people. The building was made of concrete. I know from my own observation that the gassing took no more than 20 minutes. A certain Heinz S c h m i d t was employed in the camp. He was an ethnic German from Latvia who became a German PoW from the Russian army and was doing the most terrible and atrocious work in the camp. The gas was driven through pipes by means of a machine in a small cabin. I operated a machine that shoveled the earth up from the pits that were to serve as graves for the gassing victims. I also had to drag the bodies out of the gas chambers and into the graves. For this latter work [p. 228] about 500 Jews were deployed. Every day 3 transports came with Jews, one transport each with 50 cars, a total of 12,000 to 13,000 people, and these people had to be buried by evening. I dragged the bodies by putting a strap on the wrist, and a second worker did the same, and so we hauled the bodies to the grave. We had to drag up to 500 meters. There were about 30 graves, each grave was 100 meters long, 25 m wide and 15 m deep. In my opinion, one could bury about 10,000 [sic] bodies in one grave. The corpses were placed up to 50 cm above the surface of the earth because the grave later settled. When the grave was full, the corpses were sprinkled with lime and covered with sand. I was also a bricklayer in the camp. I r r m a n n called me a stove fitter. Reinhold F e i x, Oberscharführer, was Fritz Irrmann's accomplice. Both came from the Sudetenland. He was married and had two children at home. Sometimes he told me he was sending parcels home. I was spared because I worked a lot and was considered diligent, which I often heard. The Belzec Extermination Camp was guarded by 250 'askari,' i.e. Russians, Ukrainians, Mongols, in black uniforms (who had previously become German PoWs). We were kept in separate barracks, and were also guarded by the askari. At 3:30 am we were woken up by S c h m i d t, who was always drunk. Schmidt knocked out all my teeth with a pistol, with one blow. In November 1942, the extermination camp was inspected by Him[m]ler and by SS and Police General K a t z m a n n. They found the camp to be run first-class, the management of the camp, namely Irrmann and Faix, received high awards, and one street in the camp was named Faix Street. In November 1942, I managed to escape from the Belzec Camp. I fled to Lemberg and hid with my present wife. Back then, my wife's name was Johanna Robak, and she lived in Lemberg, Sakramentek 5. I was liberated there in July 1944 when the Russians occupied Lemberg.

I was in the camps under the name Rudolf Reder. In 1949, I changed my name to Roman Robak. Otherwise I have never given incorrect information about my personal details. I have not received any advance payments in the course of reparations for victims of National Socialism.

I affirm the accuracy of my statement under oath. I am aware that this affidavit is intended for submission to the compensation authority, and that submitting a false affidavit is punishable under law and can result in the loss of claims for compensation.

I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true and knowing that ist [sic] is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of 'The Canada Evidence Act'.

On December 7, in support of this application, Reder's wife Johanna Robak also filed an affidavit, of which only the final part is relevant:²⁵

"One evening, towards the end of 1942, the applicant [Reder] came to my home. He was ragged, had broken teeth, swollen legs, and a body full of wounds. At night he had a fever of about 40 degrees [centigrade]. I hid him at home in the attic, above the courtyard warehouse. He remained hidden there until July 1944, until the occupation of Lemberg by the Russians. He told me that he had fled from the Belżec Camp. He was all bloated from starvation and looked terrible.”

1.7. The Testimony of January 26, 1956

As indicated earlier, the German judiciary had sent Reder/Robak a questionnaire with 12 questions (see Friedmann), which, in summary, asked:

1. How long was the witness detained in Belżec?
2. Had he been detained in Belżec itself or in a nearby camp?
3. What work did he have to carry out in the camp?
4. How many gas chambers existed in Belżec?
5. Can he remember the name of the camp commandant?
6. Does he know the names of other SS men in the camp?
7. What crimes did he personally witness?
8. Does he remember an SS Untersturmführer Josef Oberhauser?
9. What function did Oberhauser perform at the camp?
10. Did he see Oberhauser commit any crime?
11. Can he name other former Belżec prisoners?
12. Does he know former inmates from the Treblinka, Sobibór, Chełmno or Majdanek Camp?

Reder answered these questions as follows:²⁶

“I have been asked 12 questions, which I answer as follows:

1) I was detained in the Belżec KZ [Konzentrationslager, concentration camp] from August 16, 1942 to the end of November 1942.

2) At the Belżec Camp there was no labor camp; there was only one large camp.

3) Immediately after our arrival, our clothes were taken away, and we were already naked when they asked us who had a profession. I introduced myself as a machine operator. Some blacksmiths, shoemakers, carpenters, tailors, etc. also came forward, and we got the clothes back. The next day, I was immediately assigned to the machine that extracted sand from large pits, and had to operate this machine. We arrived by train at the Belżec railway station, and then to a spur, and the train could enter the camp directly. The camp itself was located in a forest, in which an area of 1-2 km² was less forested. These large pits were in the camp grounds. They were to be used for burying the corpses of those gassed. Every day, 3 transports of about 100 cars arrived, and in each car were about 100 people; when they arrived on the scene, some were already dead. So, every day we had to bury 14,000 people, that is, corpses. When the detainees got off the cars, they first undressed, and then they were pushed into a large hut, and there they were told they would go to the bath house. Women first had their hair cut. The gas chamber was disguised as a bath house by way of a sign placed above the door with the words 'Bade und Inhalationsräume.'

²⁶ Libionka, pp. 69-71. This is followed by a declaration by Reder/Robak of January 26, 1960, also made in Toronto, in which he recognized the man (presumably Heinrich Unverhau) portrayed in three photographs that had been sent by the German judiciary as the Untersturmführer he had described earlier (ibid., p. 72).

The building was made of cement. In the center there was a corridor and doors on each side. The people were pushed from the corridor into the 6 chambers, standing, until the chambers were filled; then the doors were closed, and the gas was put in. However, the chambers also had doors to the outside, and after the gassing, these doors were opened, and the corpses were pulled out. The gassing lasted about 20 minutes.

Since, as I mentioned, about 14,000 people were gassed every day and had to be buried, I and others were engaged not only in excavating the pits, but also in removing the corpses from the gas chambers and transporting them to the pits.

We had received leather straps that were tied to the hand of the corpses, and so they were thrown into the pit. When a pit was full, we sprinkled the corpses with liquid lime and covered them with sand. Because the corpses settled, we arranged the corpses in a heap about one meter above ground level. Before we received the lime, the ground had leveled out. We carried out this terrible work every day, without taking a break. We had to leave the huts at 4 am and worked until night.

4) I repeat, there were 6 chambers, but in one building.

5) I don't remember the name of the commandant. He didn't come to the camp often and lived near the train station. I saw him for the first time when the gas-sing device stopped working, and the people were half-gassed. He was called by phone at his home, and I saw that he gave orders.

6) I remember the name of an Oberscharstabsführer, I correct myself, Oberstabsscharführer Fritz Irrmann, from the Sudetenland, of Oberscharführer Arnold Faix, also from the Sudetenland, of a corporal from Latvia named Hinz Schmidt. I know that Irrmann and Faix were originally from the Sudetenland because I took packages addressed to their families to the post office.

7) The three SS men mentioned above and also the rest did not send the elderly and the children to the gas chambers at all. These had to sit at the edge of the pit with their faces towards the pit, and they were shot in the head and fell dead into the pit. We too were tormented and beaten bloody, although we followed his orders.

8) An Untersturmführer was the camp's deputy commandant. I don't remember his name, but I can describe him, and I should be able to recognize him. Photographs for evidential purposes were promised, but ultimately not attached. He might have been 33-34 years old then. He was tall, strong and wore an SS uniform. He came continually to the camp and directed the extermination. He gave all the orders, was present when the transports arrived, and also observed the shootings.

At the camp there was also a Ukrainian weapon, I correct myself, a guard unit, which was composed of 250 men, and this Untersturmführer was the commander of the guards. As I have already said, the Obersturmführer was not often in the camp, and the Untersturmführer did everything.

10) I saw the aforementioned criminals with my own eyes.

11) I don't know of any ex-prisoners who left Belżec [alive].

12) Among my acquaintances there are no witnesses from Treblinka, Sobibór, Chelmno and Majdanek.

I would like to correct a spelling mistake that appears in the third paragraph. A transport consisted not of 100, but of 50 cars.

Since I also built stoves for the guard quarters, they called me a stove fitter [zdunem]. The defendant [Oberhauser] therefore may not remember my name, but he can remember me as a 'stove fitter.' I also want to point out that, when we dragged the corpses, there were dentists along the path with pincers, and they tore out [their] gold teeth or gold crowns.

I also want to describe how I managed to escape from the camp.

In November it was already cold, and the guards needed stoves in the huts. The stoves were built, but the chimneys were lacking, and Irrmann asked me where he could get sheet metal, since there was no such material in the vicinity. I told him that I was from Lwów, and there I knew where to get the material. The next day he ordered me to get dressed, because I had to accompany four guards and a non-commissioned officer on the way to Lwów. The aforementioned were all armed, so that for my part an escape was not expected. We left with a truck, arrived in Lwów in the evening; I was handed over to the Gestapo for the night, and [the next day] I was picked up and went to the office, where we were given vouchers. We received a voucher and also some material, and we had to go back at noon. We stopped at a restaurant, and the non-commissioned officer with the guards went to town and ordered the fourth [guard] to watch me. I sat next to the driver's seat, with the guard behind [me]. The others stayed in the restaurant for a long time, and when I turned around, I noticed that the Ukrainian guard had fallen asleep. I assumed that [the others] would have had a good time during the [previous] night, and that they would be tired. When I realized that he had fallen asleep and even heard him snoring, I decided to flee. I opened the door, moved slowly, got out of the truck very quietly, and ran away to [my] acquaintances.

I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of 'The Canada Evidence Act.'"

1.8. The Interrogation of August 8, 1960

This and the following statement were made by Reder/Robak to the public prosecutor's office at Munich, again in the context of the pre-trial investigations leading up to the trial against Oberhauser.²⁷

Interrogation protocol:

Mr. Roman Robak testifies voluntarily. After having become aware of the subject of the interrogation and having received the exhortation to make truthful statements, the witness stated the following:

About the person: Robak Roman, formerly Reder Rudolf, born April 4, 1881 in Dębica, Lwów District/Poland, citizen of Canada, chemist by profession, currently retired, married, resident of Toronto/Canada, 174 Lippinscott Street, without any relationship or affinity with the defendant.

On the subject: I was born on April 4, 1881 in Dębica in the Lwów District. I operated a soap factory on Panieńska Street in Lwów. After the occupation of Galicia by the Russians in 1939, at first, I continued to run the factory without hindrance, until the outbreak of the war between the Germans and the Russians.

Immediately after the outbreak of this war, Lwów was occupied by German troops. This was in late June or early July 1941. Right after the invasion by German troops, the factory was taken from me. I couldn't even enter its grounds. From this moment until August 16, 1942, I lived in hiding in Lwów in various places with my daughter Zofia. On August 16, 1942, the Gestapo arrested me and took me to the Janowska Street Camp. My daughter managed to escape and hide in Krakow. My daughter went with her husband to England. Now her name is Smith, and she lives in North Wembley at 18 Baxford Road.

The next day, I was taken from the Janowska Street Camp to the Belżec Extermination Camp with a transport of about 5,000 Jews. It was a transport of about 50 railway cars, and about 100 Jews were crammed into each car. My son Bronysław was already arrested on August 10, 1942. I never saw him alive. Then in Belżec I learned that he had been killed before I arrived in Belżec.

When I arrived in Belżec, the camp was already in full swing. The camp was divided into two parts, the actual death camp and the labor camp. The two camps were strictly separated from each other; people who were in one camp were not allowed to go to the other and vice-versa. During the time I was in the Belżec Death Camp, there were only women in the labor camp. All these women were from the Zamość Concentration Camp. At the Belżec Death Camp, there were four or five huts for Jewish helpers and three huts for Ukrainian guards. The Germans of the camp lived outside the camp. Also at the death camp, there was a large hut with the gas chambers. In the hut there were 6 gas chambers in all, that is 3 and 3 along the corridor that extended throughout the hut. At the end of the hut there was a small room in which the machine was located, whose exhaust gases were fed into the 6 gas chambers through pipes. The pipes through which the gas was fed into the chambers were installed on the ceilings of the gas chambers. Near this death hut there was another hut in which people had to undress and in which women had their hair cut.

I can describe the actual killing system as follows:

During my stay at the Belżec Death Camp, 3 transports of 50 cars arrived every day, in each of which 100 Jews were crammed. These trains arrived at Belżec Station, from where a German train operator took them [over] and drove them into the middle of the camp on a spur. I do not know the name of this machinist; he was a short, stout man with a thick, protruding [long] black mustache. He was about 50 years old then. This machinist always checked that the Jews were not hiding in the cars, and when they tried to hide in them, he chased them out. When he found Jews who wanted to escape death this way, he always handed them over to the volksdeutsch Christian Schmidt or the camp commandant Jirmann (Irmann), and the latter immediately shot them or beat them to death. After the cars had entered, the Jews were told that they would go to work, but first they would have to bathe and undergo inhalation because of the danger of contagious diseases. Immediately after leaving the train, men and women had to strip naked. The women were taken to the hut mentioned above where their hair was shorn off. Then they went to the death hut, where a sign with the words 'Bade- und Inhalationsräume' hung on the door. Also above the door hung a flower in a vase [a vase with a flower]. The camp administration formed an orchestra of 8-10 Jewish inmates who played all day. Irrmann gave a speech at the arrival of each transport during which he told the people that they would be put to work. Therefore, no Jew refused to enter the alleged bath house and inhalation rooms. For as long as I was in Belżec, only once did a woman escape from the gas chamber, but the volksdeutsch Schmidt immediately shot her in the courtyard. When all the chambers were full, they were locked from the outside, and the machine was started. The killing process took about 20 minutes. After the doors were closed, the Jews who were in the rooms began to understand what was meant to be done with them, and they began to cry and shout. But after a few minutes, everything was quiet. After 20 minutes, the outer doors of the gas chambers were opened, and the bodies of the Jews were taken to the mass graves. For this purpose, about 500 Jews were kept [alive] in the Belżec Camp, who were to carry out this work. We had to drag the corpses to the pits, two of us per corpse, with the use of leather belts around the wrist, by first wrapping these belts around the wrist of the dead.

The Jewish group dug the graves by hand. On the edge of the pit there was a machine with a conveyor, onto which the excavated sand was poured. These pits were 100 meters long, 25 meters wide and 15 meters deep, so that each pit could contain 100,000 corpses. At the time of my escape from Belżec, 30 such pits had been created. Until my escape in November 1942, 15 or 16 pits were already full, liquid lime had been poured into them, and they were covered with sand, which subsided after a few days, so that the pit was [became] even with the surface of the ground.

Small children up to 3 years old and old people were not killed in the gas chambers, but were placed on the edge of the pit, facing the pit, and Irrmann shot them from behind. Irrmann, Feix and Christian served as executors.

One day so many Jews were gassed that our normal group of 500 men was not enough to bury the corpses. Therefore, another 100 additional Jews were selected from one transport, who were to help us carry the killed Jews to the grave. When this work was done, these 100 Jews also had to perish. Since it was probably not worth killing these 100 Jews in the gas chambers, Schmidt ordered them to go to the pits, and he shot them from behind with the automatic pistol. When he was finally out of ammunition, he took the handle of a pickaxe and beat the last of the Jews with it, hitting them on the head with the thick end [of the handle]. On the way [to the pits], Jewish dentists checked the corpses, opening their mouths with pincers and looking for the gold teeth. The gold teeth were extracted from the slain, the gold was delivered, melted and cast into small bars, which were brought to Lublin.

Whole railway-cars full of sacks of hair shorn from women were sent to Budapest; it was said that mattresses were made with this hair. Clothes, shoes and underwear were also collected and taken to a large shed at the Belżec railway station. There was a group of Jewish men, led by an SS man, who sorted and shipped these clothes. I don't know what this SS man's name was; he didn't beat me, but the other Jews he did [beat]. When we took the clothes, shoes, underwear or women's cut hair from the death camp to the train station, guards always accompanied us.

In November 1942, I had to build small chimneys for the stoves. That is, I also worked in the camp as a stove fitter. So, I told Irrmann that there were large sheet-metal warehouses in Lwów, and that you could get it there. The next day I had to get changed and go to Lwów in a truck. In the truck between the driver and me there was a group of guards and a non-commissioned SS officer, and the fourth man was a Ukrainian Wachmann [guard]. We arrived in Lwów in the evening; I was handed over to the Gestapo to stay overnight, and the next day I was taken back. Then we loaded the sheet metal, and at noon the NCO and all but one of the guards went to eat. The Wachmann who was left on the truck fell asleep, then I took advantage of it and ran away. I fled to my present wife. Although the Gestapo had its own office in the house where my present wife lived back then, I was able to hide there until the Russian reoccupation of Lwów. My wife worked for the Gestapo as a cleaning lady, so in the aforementioned house there was a two-bedroom apartment with a kitchen and a bathroom, and she hid me in turn once in the attic, once in the basement. Since my wife also had to take care of a dog that belonged to the Gestapo, she received a lot of meat from the Gestapo men, and she fed me with this meat all the time.

After the Russians returned to Lwów at the end of 1944, I first reopened my soap factory. But I couldn't operate it for long, because it was expropriated by the Russians. From Lwów I went to Krakow as early as 1945. There, too, I opened a small soap factory. I was able to keep this factory until 1949. Due to problems with the financial office, that is, due to the accusation that the soap manufacturers in Krakow used edible grease to make soap, one day all the soap manufacturers in Krakow were arrested. I had to spend 3 months in preventive arrest, and this was the cause of my emigration. My wife paid a bail deposit of 400,000 zloty to the Polish investigative court. The Polish authorities in a sense collected this bail as a fine on the grounds that I had allegedly used edible fat for the production of soap. In addition, I had to pay a tax of 1,200,000 zlotys. Since I didn't have this much money, I turned to a lawyer, who advised me to change my name and leave. The district authorities gave me permission to take the name of Roman Robak. With the name of Robak, I then obtained passports for my wife and me for emigration to Canada."

1.9. The Interrogation of August 11, 1960

Public Prosecutor's Office of Munich I

Munich, August 11, 1960

Present: Prosecutor Heintl

Court Clerk Gatty

Interrogation protocol:

The witness Roman Robak testifies voluntarily. After having become aware of the subject of the interrogation and having received the exhortation to make truthful statements, the witness stated the following:

About the person: Robak Roman (Reder Rudolf), born April 4, 1881 in Dębica, married, retired (former soap manufacturer), citizen of Canada, residing in Toronto/Canada, 174 Lippincott Street.

On the subject: As I said in the course of the interrogation of August 8, 1960 to the prosecutor's office of Munich I, after the German troops entered Lwów, where I was living at the time, I was arrested on August 16, 1942 by the Gestapo and first taken to the labor camp at Janowska Street in Lwów. From this moment on, I was able to live hidden in Lwów. As I said earlier, the Janowska Street Camp was a Labor camp for Jews. At the same time, it served as a collection and transit camp for Jews who were deemed unfit for labor and who were then taken to the Bełżec Extermination Camp located not far away.”

The interrogation concerned the Janowska Street Camp and the German shootings in Lwów, a subject that is not part of the present study. I translate only the first part:

“Having been asked about the main officials of the Lwów Gestapo, I remember, in order, first General Katzmann, who resided in the Lwów city office and to whom, according to my information, the entire Lwów Gestapo was subordinated. The commandant of the Janowska Street Camp was the Gestapo man Weber, and the Gestapo functionary Rokita was his deputy.”

Among other things, they are said to have selected in the Janowska Street Camp the Jews unable to work and thus destined for Bełżec (Libionka, pp. 79-81). In a note, Libionka specifies that the commandant of the camp was SS Obersturmführer Gustav Willhaus, that SS Untersturmführer Richard Rokita was the “camp leader” (Lagerführer), and that Heinz Weber was the head of the department of “labor deployment of the Jews” (ibid., Note 141, p. 79).

In the subsequent critical analysis of Reder’s statements in Part 2 of the present study, I refer to his statements simply by giving the respective dates (format dd.mm.yyyy):

1. = 22.9.1944
2. = 1.11.1944
3. = 1945
4. = 29.12.1945
5. = 1946
6. = 1954
7. = 1956
8. = 8.8.1960
9. = 11.8.1960.

Part 2:

Critical Analysis of Rudolf Reder's Statements

2.1. The Background of the Deportation

Reder's account already begins with a series of jarring contradictions concerning the place where he was arrested. This happened on August 16, 1942 in a room of his Ukrainian acquaintances Kobzdej, in their building at 31 Zamarszynowska Street (29.12.45) and at the same time in his soap factory:

"I was in my workshop working, but I didn't have a stamp, so I locked myself up and remained silent, although I heard them coming. The Gestapo men broke down the door, found me in a hiding place, beat me on the head with their whips, and took me away." (1946)

But contrary to this, this factory had been expropriated from him by the Germans and he could no longer access to it:

"Right after the invasion by German troops, the factory was taken from me. I couldn't even enter its grounds." (8.8.60; all subsequent underscoring in quotations were added by me unless indicated otherwise)

Not satisfied with these contradictions, Reder adds another:

"I worked as a master boiler in the factory and received no pay. Engineer Kaufmann was the factory manager. I worked there until I was arrested at home by the Gestapo on Aug. 16, 1942." (1954)

Therefore, Reder could no longer enter his factory, but he continued to work there, and was arrested at the Kobzdej house, at the factory, and at his own house!

Reder recounts his misadventure with the German soldier, who first robbed him of 18,040 zlotys, and then promised him freedom in exchange for a watch and 3,000 zlotys. Both went to "the Jewish hospital, where my daughter, a physician, and her husband worked. I got a watch from the boys and 3,000 zloty and handed them over to the SS soldier". This happened on the day of his arrest, on August 16, 1942 (29.12.1945). In contradiction to this, he later stated:

"From this moment until August 16, 1942, I lived in hiding in Lwów in various places with my daughter Zofia. On August 16, 1942, the Gestapo arrested me and took me to the Janowska Street Camp. My daughter managed to escape and hide in Krakow." (8.8.1960)

2.2. Prior Knowledge of Bełżec

What was known about the Bełżec Camp in Lwów in August 1942? The witness speaks of this as follows:

“We assumed that we would go to Belżec, because in the last period before the arrest in Lwów it was said that the Gestapo took Jews to Belżec. However, we did not know what Belżec was, as the Gestapo were said to bring Jews there for labor. But it was rumored that Belżec was a camp without people.”

Also in this regard, the witness provides another contradictory version:

“In fact, it was said that a worker who had built the chambers during the first days of the installation of the death factory had managed to escape from the Belżec death garrison, and that he had spoken of the ‘bath house,’ which was in reality the building intended for the gas chambers. He had predicted that none of the people who would be shoved into it would return.

It was also said that one of the Ukrainians employed in the killing of the Jews had told what was happening at Belżec to one of his friends who, terrified as she was, felt it was her duty to disclose this and warn the doomed. The news about Belżec reached us in these ways.” (1946)

2.3. The Arrival at Belżec

Reder was deported to Belżec in July 1942 (22.9.1944), precisely on the 16th (1.11.1944). In later versions, however, the date is August 17 (1945) or even August 16 (1956). His stay in the camp for “four full months” (1.11.1944) or in any case for four months, as stated in the other versions, confirms the dating of mid-July rather than that of mid-August, given that the witness managed to flee at the end of November.

In almost all his statements, the witness states that he arrived at the camp with a transport of 5,000 Jews, but he also says: “We were about 4500 people in the transport” (1954).

It should also be noted that the journey from Lwów to Belżec was a “7-hour trip” (1945), but in fact, despite three stops, it lasted only four hours:

“The train moved at 8 am. [...] Around noon the train arrived at Belżec Station.” (1946)

2.4. Arriving at the Camp: The Railway Spur

It should be noted that the Belżec Camp was a quadrilateral of the following dimensions:

- North side: 249 meters
- East side: 285 meters
- South side: 205 meters

- West side: 250 meters.²⁸ On this side was the railway spur, which was about 260 meters long due to a slight curvature.

It is also important to note that the camp was located on the side of a low hill whose ridge extended in the west-east direction and whose peak was about 14 meters above the road and railway level.²⁹ In 1997, when I visited the camp area together with Jürgen Graf, the slope of the hill in the center of the camp was 190 meters long,³⁰ and the railway track was 82 meters away from the current gate to the camp area. The camp's west side was quite steep, and from a certain point already high up (see Documents 6-8) it was bordered by a long, stepped concrete wall atop which a metal fence was placed. The highest step was located about 8 meters above the beginning of the wall (lowest step), at a distance of about 170 meters.

That said, I return to Reder.

First of all, he never mentions the hill in question, an inexplicable fact, because in his story this would have affected the dragging of the corpses on the sand from the alleged extermination building to the mass graves, for 26 of which (according to his map) it would have been done uphill. According to the aforementioned topographical map and the map by Szrojt, the difference in height from the extermination building to the top of the hill was about 10 meters over about 90 meters in length, which represents a significant slope of 11%. A photograph of me taken from behind the 1970s monument that symbolically indicated the site of the mass graves clearly shows this slope (see Document 9).

Next, and this is much-more-serious, the witness stated:

"From the station, the train slowly entered the camp, which was a few hundred meters away from it. The entire train entered the fenced-in camp area."
(29.12.1945)

Keep in mind that this was a train of 50 cars. A note concerning the transports related to the Nisko Plan dated October 14, 1939 gives the following length for a German railway freight car (without bumpers): open (offener Güterwagen): 8.40 meters; covered (gedeckter Güterwagen): 9.40 meters.³¹ A covered boxcar following the UIC standard is 11.08 meters long including bumpers.³² It would therefore have been impossible to fit 50 such cars (plus the locomotive) onto a track of merely 260 meters ($11.08 \times 50 = 554$ meters, without the locomotive). Reder was well-aware of this, because he stated:

²⁸ These are the measurements indicated on the two camp maps published by Szrojt (1947), unnumbered insert between pp. 40 and 41. See Document 4.

³¹ YVA, O.93-I, p. 198.

“The cars entered the camp’s courtyard; the spur was 200-300 meters long.” (1945)

Kuwałek writes inexplicably that the spur could accommodate 40 boxcars, although only a maximum of 15-20 were shunted onto it (Kuwałek, p. 44), but later he asserts that at the Belżec Station Jewish transports were divided into sections of eight to ten boxcars, each of which was then taken separately into the camp (ibid., p. 129). The “Report on the results of the investigation into the Belżec Extermination Camp affair,” compiled by the Zamość prosecutor on April 11, 1946, says instead that 20 boxcars were brought into the camp at a time (Libionka, p. 233).

In this regard, Reder provides further details:

“An old German with a thick black beard – I don’t know his name, but I would recognize him immediately – arrived at Belżec by car; he looked like an executioner; he took command of the train and made it enter the camp. The ride to the camp took two minutes.” (1946)

The witness claimed that he could have easily recognized him, because “For four whole months I always saw this same bandit” (1946); despite this, he later described him as “a short, stout man with a thick, protruding [long] black mustache” (8.8.60). The story simply is a fabrication, because Reder asserts in this context:

“The railway car in which we were traveling was completely new, the window so narrow that I could not stick my head out.” (1946)

But then how could he have seen the scene described above, which evidently requires an observer outside the train?

2.5. Surface Area of the Camp

Reder states that “The camp [was] in a young forest, cut down to a radius of 3 kilometers in all directions, the ground sandy” (1945). Yet a post-war survey³³ as well as air photos taken in 1944 show that the camp area was never completely cleared of trees (Rudolf 2018, pp. 138-143). In fact, only the actual area of the camp had been cleared of most trees, but that area was only about 6.2 hectares in size (0.024 sq miles).³⁴ In the areas surrounding the camp, the forests were merely thinned out beyond the northern, eastern and southern edges of the camp. Reder’s claim is therefore disproportionate, because according to him an area of about 28 km² (2,800 hectares; 11 sq miles) had been cleared, while the real area, cleared and thinned out, was on the order of only 0.1 km².

³³ According to the “Report of the inspection of the Belżec Death Camp” by the investigating judge of Zamość dated October 10, 1945, in the area of the camp, towards the center, there were still a group of pine trees (sosny) more than twenty years old; another group of similar pine trees extended toward the south side, and a third group of 31 pine trees was located in the northwestern corner. Libionka, p. 122. Cf. Rückerl, p. 144. These trees were also drawn in the two field maps published by E. Szrojt.

Consistent with this nonsense, the witness dramatically increased the area of the camp: according to him, the courtyard alone measured “about a kilometer long and wide” (1946), and was therefore 16 times larger than the entire camp.

It is worthwhile insisting on the fact that we are not dealing with mere exaggerations here, but with deliberate lies, because this huge surface area was needed to allow for the claimed presence of 30 pits measuring 100 m × 25 m (hence 75,000 m² in total, more than the area of the entire camp). These 30 pits then served to allow the asserted mythical number of 3,000,000 buried corpses which, in turn, served to justify the preposterous influx of Jewish transports. Hence, this madness has its own logic, the logic of intentional lies.

2.6. The Camp’s Structure

Due to his tasks at the camp, Reder stated that he could move freely throughout the camp, and therefore knew it perfectly:

“Thanks to these assignments, I had the opportunity to move around the camp area, and to ascertain on the basis of my own direct observation the treatment of detainees brought to Belżec.” (29.12.1945)

“I repaired the stoves everywhere and went around the whole camp.” (1946)

However, in his description, he never mentions essential facilities such as a sick bay for inmates, latrines, washrooms and showers for guards and inmates, motor pool and garage, etc. In particular, in none of his statements does Reder mention the Diesel engine that powered the camp’s electricity generator. However, on the watchtower in the center of the camp there were “spotlights,” and in the inmate’s sleeping huts, “[i]n the evening, the light remained on for half an hour” (1946). I will return to this issue later.

I limit myself here to examining only three essential points.

a. The Protective Nets

“The camp was surrounded by barbed wire, and on the inside [od strony wewnętrznej] of the fence were stacked iron-wire nets.” (1945)

“The camp was surrounded by a high barbed-wire fence, and on the outside [po zewnętrznej stronie] of this fence it also had a barrier of nets.” (29.12.1945)

b. The Railway Spur

“Behind a large courtyard, which extended from the entrance gate on both sides of the railway track [po obu stronach toru kolejowego] inside the camp, there was a large hut, [...]” (29.12.1945)

This spur arrangement also appears on Reder’s map (see Document 10). In reality, however, this railway track ran parallel and close to the camp’s western fence, as can be seen in air photos and also in the map published by Szrojt (Document 4), where the track crosses the entire camp along its southern border, while the track on Reder’s map stops before reaching the camp’s center. At least, Reder is consistent with his lies: had the camp really been one kilometer long, a 200- to 300-meter-long track would not have reached its center.

c. The Two Camps and the “Tube”

The verdict of the Oberhauser Trial of January 21, 1965 states that the camp was divided into two sectors (Rückerl, p. 133):

“Camp Area II was completely separated from Area I by a fence. Both camp areas were connected to each other by a narrow corridor made of barbed wire with interwoven vegetation and bast mats, which was called ‘the hose.’ Through this passage, the Jews were driven from the barracks to the entrance of the building in which the gassing device was located and where the actual extermination process took place.”

Reder knew nothing of either the two camp sectors or of the “hose.”

“To the left of the hut for cutting the women’s hair – proceeding from the entrance gate – was the building of the [gas] chambers. Between the hut for cutting the women’s hair and the building with the chambers, there was a small courtyard [małe podwórko] separated from the front courtyard and the back of the camp by a wooden palisade. In the palisade, at the rear of the camp, there were doors through which one could enter this courtyard.” (29.12.1945)

Reder’s map mentioned earlier illustrates this arrangement well (Document 10). The “Hut in which women’s heads were shaved” (Barak w którym golono głowy kobietom) was located in front of the alleged killing building, and was separated from it by a small courtyard (podwórko), as wide as the hut (about 15 meters) and delimited on the left and right by a fence. Next to the hut was another fenced-in area, the “Part of the courtyard fenced off with a screen – the men’s path” (Część dziedzińca odgradzona parkanem – droga mężczyzn) whose outer limit was the extension of the outer wall of the killing building; this “path,” according to the drawing, was as wide as a “chamber” (komora), and had an entrance parallel to that of the hut and an exit into the aforementioned small courtyard.

Only in 1954 did Reder adapt to the version of the “tube.”

On the other hand, his 1946 description of the camp also contrasts significantly with that of his 1945 statement. The Ghetto Fighters House Archives has a drawing of the Bełżec Camp bearing the caption “OBÓZ ŚMIERCI – BEŁŻEC [sic] – wg. zeznań Rudolfa Redera nr 594” (“The Bełżec Death Camp – according to the statement No. 594 by Rudolf Reder”; see Document 11). The number 594 is the identification number of this particular declaration by Reder of 1945 as assigned by the Centralna Żydowska Komisja Historyczna (Central Jewish Historical Commission), which I have mentioned earlier; the drawing was created by a member of this Commission.

Already from a simple comparison it appears that the two maps, that of 1945 and that of 1946, diverge significantly.

The 1945 map graphically illustrates the following statements:

“The cars entered the camp’s courtyard; the spur was 200-300 meters long. [...] In the middle of the courtyard there was a high tower with a sentry [...]. Nearby there were two large wooden huts [...]. The women’s hair was cut in the courtyard. [...] The gas was produced by a gasoline-powered machine, operated by two askari machinists and placed in a room at the end of the corridor. From this small room, the gas arrived in the chambers through tubes of small diameter. [...] The corpses were thrown out after the external doors were opened, [...]. From the outside, people entering the building by the steps did not see what was happening on the sides of the building, that is, with the corpses and the graves, because dense vegetation covered it all.”

On the map (Document 11), a watchtower is depicted facing the end of the railway track, right in the center of the “main square” (“główny plac”), which is flanked on both sides by thick tree hedges. The hedge at the bottom separates the square from the area containing two “staff barracks” (“Baraki dla obsługi”), which is in turn separated from the mass-graves area by another tree hedge. No haircutting hut is shown, because according to this statement, the cutting took place outdoors in the courtyard.

The killing building has six “gas chambers” (“komory gazowe”) arranged on either side of a central corridor. Along the corridor, the drawing curiously has a label “sliding doors” (“Rozsuwane drzwi”), although those are supposed to have been the external doors opening toward the ramp and the mass graves. On the visible outside wall, the building has three “doors through which corpses were thrown out” (“Drzwi którymi wyrzucano zwłoki”), but it does not have an external “ramp.” Behind the building in an annex is drawn the “Machine [that] produced the gas” (“Maszyna wytwarzała gaz”); this is represented as two wheels (although Reder spoke of “wheels” [koła] only in 1946) connected by a transmission belt and a kind of boiler from which a tube starts, without any gasoline engine. On both sides of the building, 30 mass graves (Groby) are arranged in a symmetrical and orderly manner (15 + 15), but the 1946 map contains 32 graves, 26 of them on one side and 6 on the other.

2.7. The Camp's Function

According to Reder, the Bełżec Camp once had a labor camp attached to it, but then again, it did not:

"At the Bełżec Camp there was no labor camp; there was only one large camp." (1956)

"When I arrived in Bełżec, the camp was already in full swing. The camp was divided into two parts, the actual death camp and the labor camp." (8.8.1960)

2.8. Admitting the Deportees: Hair Cutting and Clothing

According to the current orthodox Holocaust narrative, the deportees, after having left the train, were taken to two barracks (Kuwałek, pp. 132f.):

"Only in the second phase,^[35] when there were two undressing huts, did the men undress separately from the women and children. In addition, the women's hair was cut in the undressing hut."

As mentioned earlier, however, Reder reported only one hut, which was merely used to cut the women's hair. But even on this, he finds a way to contradict himself. He states that the men went directly to the killing rooms along with the "girls with short hair," passing through the fence that was next to the aforementioned hut ("up the fenced-in alley directly to the chambers," 1946), but at the same time they also entered the hut ("the detainees got off the cars, they [...] were pushed into a large hut, and there they were told they would go to the bath house," 1956; "another hut in which people had to undress and in which women had their hair cut." 8.8.1960). Furthermore, the women's hair was cut in that dedicated hut, but then again merely outdoors:

"Here in the open [pod gołym niebem] the barbers began to cut women's hair." (1.11.1944)

"The women's hair was cut in the courtyard [na dziedzińcu] – Jewish barbers did that." (1945)

"Everyone was unloaded from the train; the women were pushed into the hair-cutting hut. There, their heads were shaved with machines, [...]" (29.12.1945)

"All the prisoners were taken to a large hut, where the heads of the women had been shorn. Then they were driven into a narrow corridor, there was a door with the label 'Bath and Inhalation Rooms.'" (1954)

"When the detainees got off the cars, they first undressed, and then they were pushed into a large hut, and there they were told they would go to the bath house. Women first had their hair cut." (1956).

But first there was the deceptive speech, which Reder describes as follows:

³⁵ The one concerning the activity of the second killing building, to which Reder refers.

“Irrmann said very loudly and clearly: ‘Ihr gehts jetzt baden, nachher werdet ihr zur Arbeit geschickt’ [‘Now you go bathing, afterwards you will be sent to work’]. That’s all. Everyone rejoiced; after all, they were glad to go to work. They applauded. I remember these his words having been repeated day after day, mostly three times a day, repeated for the four months of my stay there.” (1946)

“Irrmann” therefore gave the speech in German (Reder had heard it several times a day for four months, so he must have remembered it very well), but strangely enough, the crowd of Polish deportees, who spoke Polish or maybe Yiddish, but not necessarily German, understood it easily, as they cheered and applauded – and all this without interpreters, who are never mentioned by Reder on any occasion.

Another contradiction concerns the victims’ clothes. Reder states that the camp had a warehouse for personal effects (22.9.1944), about which he states:

“The warehouse for the hair, linen, clothing of the gas-chamber victims [komory gazowej] was located in a small separate hut, perhaps 6 by 8 meters. The goods and hair were stored there for 10 days, and after 10 days, the hair and the clothes were separately put into bags, after which a freight train arrived and took away this loot.” (1946)

Later he accepted the official thesis of the German judiciary, according to which this warehouse was located at the Belżec railway station:

“Clothes, shoes and underwear were also collected and taken to a large shed at the Belżec railway station. There was a group of Jewish men, led by an SS man, who sorted and shipped these clothes.” (8.8.1960)

The camp’s storage shed was 48 square meters in area. The Effektenbaracken of the so-called Kanada camp section of Birkenau measured 41.39 m × 12.64 m × 2.75 m, therefore had an area of 523 square meters and a volume of 1,438 cubic meters.³⁶ Assuming the same height, the volume of Reder’s shed was 132 cubic meters. In this space, the deportees’ personal effects (suitcases, shoes, clothes, etc.) were stored for ten days. According to Reder, on average some 15,000 deportees arrived at Belżec every day, therefore 150,000 people in ten days. Claiming that such a tiny shed would have sufficed to store the personal belongings of 150,000 people is patent nonsense.

Even Reder’s story about the destination of the hair is pure fantasy. In this regard, he states:

“The women’s hair was sent in railway cars to Budapest.” (29.12.1945)

“Men working in the office told me that the hair was sent to Budapest. In particular, a Sudeten Jew employed in the office, the lawyer Schreiber, gave me this information. [...] He himself told me that every few days an entire railway car of hair bags was sent to Budapest.” (1946)

As I have noted elsewhere (Mattogno 2020a, pp. 98f.), in the Breslau (now Wrocław) District there were two companies that processed human hair: the Paul Reimann Company and the Held Company, both based in Friedland (now Mieroszów). The first company collected, among other things, supplies from the Majdanek Camp, about which copious documentation exists (Dziadosz 1967). The hair collected in Belżec, along with all personal belongings, were notoriously sent to Lublin, so the story about Budapest as the hair’s destination is simply blatant nonsense.

2.9. Camp Staff: SS and Auxiliaries

In general, Reder attributes a cartoon-like sadism to the German staff and auxiliary forces of the camp: they were all bandits, beasts, monsters – aping the most-vulgar black propaganda of the time.

From his first statement, the witness firmly asserted that the camp commandant was named Irman[n] (later Irrmann or Jirmann):

“The camp commandant was Stabsscharführer Irman, of Czech-German nationality from the Sudeten region. Deputy commandant was Hauptscharführer Schwarz – a German.” (22.9.1944)

The witness reiterated this in the next two statements:

“At the top of the camp were Stabsscharführer Fritz Irrmann of the Sudetenland, Hauptscharführer Schwarz of the Reich, Oberscharführer Feix of the Reich, the volksdeutsch Russian Zugwachmann Hans Schmidt, a lank, small thug, and the volksdeutsch Russian Schneider, in total 5 SS men.” (1945)

“This was attended by the camp commandant, SS-Stabsscharführer Fritz Irrmann /originally from the Sudetenland/ [...]” (29.12.1945)

But Fritz Jirmann was a mere SS Scharführer, equivalent to a staff sergeant in the U.S. armed forces. The camp commandant was SS Hauptsturmführer (Captain) Gottlieb Hering, his deputy SS Hauptsturmführer Gottfried Schwarz.

In Reder’s 1946 booklet Belżec, however, the commandant becomes an anonymous Obersturmführer (first lieutenant), and “Irrmann” is downgraded to a mere stooge:

“We knew that the camp commandant lived in a beautiful little house at the Belżec Station. He was an Obersturmführer, whose name I don’t succeed to remember, although I continually strive to recall this name; it had a short sound. [...]”

Hardly ever did all the cops show up. One of them, Fritz Irrmann, a man of about 30 years, Stabsführer, in charge of supplies at the camp, was a specialist in shooting children and old people."

Nine years later, Reder promotes him to the rank of Oberstabsscharführer (which didn't exist), and returns the camp command back to him:

"The camp commandant, Oberstabsscharführer [sic.] Fritz I r r m a n n (he came from the Sudetenland) told us that we would be sent to work after having taken a bath." (1954)

But two years later, that elusive camp command gets taken away again:

"I don't remember the name of the commandant. [...] I remember the name of an Oberscharstabsführer, I correct myself, Oberstabsscharführer Fritz I r r m a n n, from the Sudetenland, [...]" (1956)

During the interrogation of 8.8.1960, Reder/Robak was confronted with the names and photographs of former German members of the Bełżec Camp's SS staff whom the German judiciary had identified. He claimed that he had never seen Josef Oberhauser, that he did not know the names of Erwin Fichtner, Herbert Floß, Gottlieb Hering, Franz Reichleitner, Franz Stangl, Gottfried Schwarz, Kurt Boländer, Hubert Gomerski, Raimund Kaiser, Hirt, Fleisch, Werner Dubois, Krigas or Krigard, Hans Girtzig, Albrecht, Arthur Dachsel, Josef Barbel, Paul Roth or Groh, Rudolf Kamm, Spieß, Karl Schluch, Ernst Zirke, Heinrich Gley and Heinrich Unverhau, but declared that the latter was the SS man who supervised the sorting of clothes in the shed near the railway station, according to his belated and contradictory statement. Reder claimed that he knew Jirrmann, who for him was the camp commander, and Feix (Faix), as well as Corporal Christian [Heinz] Schmidt, Schneider, Keizer (sic, possibly referring to Raimund Kaiser) and Faix (Libionka, pp. 77f.).

The SS garrison of the camp consisted of about 20 men, that of the Ukrainian auxiliaries from 120-130 (Kuwałek, pp. 56, 78). Of these 140-150 men, Reder mentions only "Irrmann," Schwarz, (Reinhold) Feix, Schmidt, (Friedrich) Schneider, also (Samuel) Kunz, "Trottwein" (Karol Trauttwein) and the elusive Scharführer Schatkowsky.

Reder furthermore claimed that there were 250 auxiliaries (1954), whom he gave the fanciful name "askari" ("askarzy"). He was ignorant of the usual denomination of "*Trawniki*männer" ("Trawniki men") or "Hiwis" (Hilfswillige; volunteer helpers). Kuwałek claims that they were also called "askarzy" (ibid., p. 79), but without clarifying that he took this term from Reder. Another curious term used by Reder for the camp's SS men is "gestapowcy," Gestapo men or officials. Needless to say, the Gestapo was not at all involved in running the camp in any way, shape or form.

2.10. The Transports' Origin

Reder claims that Jewish transports arrived at Belżec not only from Poland but also from France, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Norway, Czechoslovakia (22.9.1944), furthermore from Vienna (1.11.1944), Hungary, Italy and Romania (29.12.1945), and finally from Greece (1946). In this regard, he specified:

"During my stay in the camp there may have been 100,000 foreign Jews; they were all gassed." (1946)

This is arrant nonsense. In his transport schedule for Belżec, Arad divides them into "A. District of Lublin," "B. District of Galicia (Lvov)," "C. District of Cracow," "D. District of Radom," in total 517,000 deportees (Arad, pp. 383-389). These districts were all part of pre-war Poland. In his chronological list of transports, Kuwałek confirms that they all came from Poland (Kuwałek, pp. 235-251). It is worth pointing out that Reder does not speak of the arrival of groups of French, Belgian, Dutch Jews, etc., but of Jewish transports from France, Belgium, Holland, etc.

2.11. Size of Transports and Number of Deportees

I start by summarizing the witness's statements in this regard:

"In each convoy there were 50 wagons, that is, one convoy carried 5,000 /five thousand/ people. Every day, two to four convoys arrived." (22.9.1944): 10,000-20,000 people a day.

"The transports had 50 cars, 3-4 times a day, hence 15,000-20,000 people a day." (1945)

"During my stay in the camp, i.e. over a period of 4 months, 3-4 trains arrived at the camp per day, consisting of 50 cars each." (29.12.1945): 15,000-20,000 people a day, for a period of four months = 1,800,000 to 2,400,000 in four months.

"They arrived every day, without a day off, mostly 3 times a day, and each train had 50 cars, and each car held 100 people. When the transports arrived at night, the victims of Belżec waited in the closed cars until 6 am. On average, 10,000 people were killed per day." (1946)

Hence, generally some 15,000 deportees arrived every day, but "on average" the daily victims amounted to 10,000!

"Every day 3 transports came with Jews, one transport each with 50 cars, a total of 12,000 to 13,000 people, and these people had to be buried by evening." (1954)

Here, too, we have a contradiction: either there were 15,000 deportees per transport, or if only 12,000 to 13,000 people were deported in three transports, then the railway cars did not contain on average 100 people each, but rather between 80 and 87.

This huge influx of transport is a preposterous fairy tale. In a summary table of transports to Bełżec, Kuwałek mentions a total of 179 transports from March 17 to December 11, 1942, which carried a maximum of 453,021 Jews (ibid., p. 170), which means that, during those 260 days, the frequency of transports was $(179 \div 260 =) 0.69$ transports per day, that is two transports every three days, and the average daily number of deportees arriving at Bełżec was $(453,021 \div 260 =) 1,742$ per day rather than Reder's 10,000 to 20,000, while the average number of deportees per transport was $(453,021 \div 179 =) 2,531$ rather than 5,000 (or 4,500) as claimed by Reder.

2.12. Fictitious Transports

In his 1946 booklet, Reder mentions twice the arrival of a transport from Zamość:

"In October, a transport of Czech Jews arrived from Zamość. These were a few dozen women whose husbands worked in the death staff."

"I have to report about a transport from Zamość. It was around November 15th. It was already cold; snow and mud were on the ground. In such a storm, a large transport arrived from Zamość, one of many. The entire Judenrat was on the transport."

In the list of Jewish transports to Bełżec compiled by Arad, only one transport left from Zamość, and that was on April 11, 1942 (Arad, p. 383), when Reder had not yet arrived there. Kuwałek states that on October 19, 1942, about 5,000 Jews were deported from Izbica, some of whom came from Zamość and the surrounding area; about half of them were sent to Bełżec (Kuwałek, p. 247). Even if this were true, three insurmountable inconsistencies would still remain:

1. Reder talks about two transports.
2. In both cases he explicitly refers to a transport from Zamość ("przybył [arrived] z Zamościa transport"; "transport z Zamościa").
3. The date does not match for either of the two cases, because the October one contained only "a few dozen women," and not 2,500, while the "large transport" came almost a month later. Strictly speaking, even this could not have been the transport of October 19, 1942 because Reder, according to whom normal transports arriving daily for four months contained 5,000 deportees, could not reasonably have considered a transport as "large" ("duży") that contained "only" 2,500 deportees.

2.13. An Incongruous Transport

According to Reder, 15,000 to 20,000 inmates arrived at the camp every day, and the dragging and burying of corpses were carried out by the camp's working inmates without difficulty. But there was one exception:

"At one point in November, there were many transports, and the 500 men of the service personnel could not cope with the work. So, Schmidt chose 100 men already completely stripped naked and destined for the gas. They worked all day, in the cold, naked and without food; in the evening, he [Schmidt] took them to a pit and shot them. He lacked bullets for 20 people, so he took the handle of a pickaxe and killed them with a blow to the head. When a single blow was not enough, he hit them again." (1945)

"On occasion, more transports arrived than usual. It happened that, instead of 50 cars, 60 and more arrived. Shortly before my escape in November, 100 people from such an overcrowded transport, who were already naked, had to be left [alive] for the work of burying corpses, because the Gestapo men had calculated that the permanent service personnel would not have managed to put so many gassing victims into the grave in such a short time. [...] For about ten, there were not enough bullets, so he killed them one after the other, up to the last, with the handle of a pickaxe." (1946)

"One day so many Jews were gassed that our normal group of 500 men was not enough to bury the corpses. Therefore, another 100 additional Jews were selected from one transport, who were to help us carry the killed Jews to the grave. [...] When he was finally out of ammunition, he took the handle of a pickaxe and beat the last of the Jews with it, hitting them on the head with the thick end [of the handle]." (8.8.1960)

Therefore, once, in November 1942, more than 6,000 deportees arrived in a single transport. Kuwałek writes that the greatest number of deportees arriving at Belżec in that month was during November 18-20; during these three days, between 8,000 and 10,000 Jews arrived (ibid., p. 250), which in round numbers amounts to an average of 2,700 to 3,300 deportees per day, which is already a lot compared to the usual average of 1,742 per day, but it is a far cry from what Reder claimed.

The story was invented by Reder in order to stage another fictional episode of sadistic cruelty on the part of the SS – the killing of inmates with a pickaxe – or rather and inexplicably with its handle. However, during the interrogation of Dec. 29, 1945, Reder did not mention any exceptional transports at all, but attributed this killing system to Schmidt as a customary practice:

"Of particular sadism was the volksdeutsch Schmidt, Zugwachmann, of Latvian origin. Every day he killed 30-40 [men] from the group of inmates spared for work. He compensated for the decrease [in manpower] by [taking inmates from] subsequent transport. He put people at the [edge of a] pit, then hit them with all his force on the head with the wooden handle of a pickaxe, and then threw them into the pit."

2.14. Number of Victims

In this regard, Reder becomes entangled in an inextricable series of falsehoods, absurdities and contradictions.

First of all, the number of victims is not even in correlation with his crazy statements about the extent and frequency of transports. I noted already earlier that, according to his data, a maximum of 2,400,000 deportees are said to have arrived at Belżec during the four months he claimed to have been in the camp.

Contradicting himself, however, Reder states:

"During the time I stayed in Belżec, 30 graves were filled, which corresponds to the killing of 3,000,000 people." (22.9.1944)

"I stayed in the camp for four full months. In this period, 30 huge and deep pits were dug, filled with corpses and covered up around me. Thanks to simple mathematics, I estimate that the Germans killed and buried about 3 million people during this period." (1.11.1944)

"In November 1942 there were 30 pits, hence 3 million corpses." (1945)

This assumes that an average of 25,000 deportees arrived at the camp each and every day without interruption ($25,000 \times 120 \text{ days} = 3,000,000$ deportees). In fact, as noted earlier, since Reder arrived at the camp on August 17, 1942 and fled at the end of November, his actual stay was about 3.5 months or 105 days in round numbers. During that period, about $(3,000,000 \div 105 =)$ 28,570 people needed to have been killed on average every day in order to reach the 3-million target, but only at most 20,000 are said to have arrived every day.

Besides these contradictions, Reder points out:

"At the time of my escape from Belżec, 30 such pits had been created. Until my escape in November 1942, 15 or 16 pits were already full, [...]" (8.8.1960)

In November 1942, therefore, the 30 mass graves were at the same time all full of corpses, or only 15 or 16 of them, which means that in the latter case the death toll had reached "only" 1,500,000 to 1,600,000 by then, rather than 3 million.

In further contradiction to this, Reder states that in Belżec "two and a half million had been asphyxiated" (1946), and to push this to a climax of absurdities, he even claimed the following madness:

"In general, the rate of killings I witnessed allows me to estimate that around 5 million people have been killed in Belżec from the time of the creation of this camp to the time of its liquidation." (1.11.1944)

2.15. Mass Graves

One of the few constant elements in all versions of Reder's accounts is the presence of 30 mass graves at the camp in November 1942 measuring 100 m × 25 m × 15 m, hence each with a surface area of 2,500 m² and a volume of 37,500 m³. The witness assures us that these pits were dug manually by the inmates using shovels, then a "machine" extracted the sand from the pit.

I repeat the witness's statements in this regard:

"I was assigned to the machine that extracted the sand from the pits destined to [become] graves." (1945)

"He ordered me, as a mechanic, to operate the gasoline machine with which huge pits were dug in the immediate vicinity of the camp. [...] After the engine was turned off, [...] the corpses were pulled by two [workers] out of the rooms and then dragged to the mass graves, previously dug with the use of machines." (29.12.1945)

"The next day, I was immediately assigned to the machine that extracted sand from large pits, and had to operate this machine." (26.1.1956)

If these words make any sense, then these statements indicate first of all that the mass graves were dug by machines (presumably excavators). Moreover, the words "in the immediate vicinity" suggest that the graves were located outside the camp, although nearby. In fact, Reder asserted during the interrogation of Dec. 29, 1945 that the pits were "around [wokół] the camp."

Yet contradicting this claimed use of machines to dig the pits, Reder also asserted:

"We dug pits and huge mass graves, [...]. We dug with shovels; there was also a machine that loaded and spread the sand on the ground. The machine unloaded sand near the pit. A mountain of sand formed, with which the pit was covered that was overflowing with corpses. About 450 men were permanently employed at the pits. Digging a pit took a week." (1946)

"The Jewish group dug the graves by hand. On the edge of the pit there was a machine with a conveyor, onto which the excavated sand was poured." (8.8.1960)

According to this crazy version, the tough work of digging a huge, 15-meter deep pit was done manually, whereas the easy job of transporting the excavated sand from the edge of the pit to a location "near the pit" was done by a motorized conveyor belt.

The following important points about Reder's mass-grave claims must also be considered:

- a. Reder claims that digging a pit took a week, hence digging 30 pits would have taken 30 weeks. But Reder claims that these pits were all excavated during his stay at the camp, which lasted only some 105 days or 15 weeks.

- b. The mass graves were located “200-300 steps” away from the killing building (1945), meaning probably about 150-225 meters, or “a few hundred meters” (1946), but at the same time at “500 meters” (1954), therefore outside the real perimeter of the field.
- c. All of Reder’s assertions about mass graves – regarding their number, size and distribution on the camp grounds – have been refuted by the results of archaeological investigations conducted in the years 1997-1998 on the grounds of the former Belżec Camp by Prof. Dr. Andrzej Kola of the Nicolaus Copernicus University of Toruń. By taking soil-core samples with a hand drill, he claims to have identified 33 mass graves with a maximum depth of 5.2 meters, a total area of 5,490 square meters, and a total volume of 21,310 cubic meters.³⁷ Reder, however, claimed that 30 pits were dug during his four-month stay at the camp alone, each measuring 100 m × 25 m × 15 m, with a total surface area of 75,000 square meters and a cumulative volume of 1,125,000 cubic meters. I have explained the reason for this crazy lie already earlier.
- d. Reder does not abstain from spreading the crudest black-propaganda nonsense of that time period. When a pit was full, the corpses were allegedly piled up to a height of one meter above ground level – or maybe only half a meter – and from this pile a “sea of blood” burst out:

“The corpses were thrown into it without any order; the next day a sinister sea of blood flowed to the edge of the pit. The ground [was] sandy. The corpses lay up to a meter above ground level.” (1945)

“To me it was very terrible that we were ordered to pile the corpses [up to] a meter on top of an already full pit, and to cover them with sand, and ominous, thick blood burst out of the pits and flooded the whole surface. We had to go from one edge of a pit to the other [edge] in order to go to another pit. We immersed our legs in the blood of our brothers; we walked on heaps of corpses, and that was very nasty, very atrocious...” (1946)

“The corpses were placed up to 50 cm above the surface of the earth because the grave later settled.” (1954)

“Because the corpses settled, we arranged the corpses in a heap about one meter above ground level.” (1956)

How this “sea of blood” could have flowed from the corpses of alleged asphyxiated victims “the next day” remains a medical enigma. This nonsense was famously adopted and embroidered by Eli Wiesel, who wrote in reference to Babi Yar (Wiesel, p. 86):

³⁷ See Mattogno 2016, p. 73 (list of Kola’s survey results; in that list, the surface area of Grave #27 was erroneously given as 540 m², when it is in fact only 111 m², hence the total given there for all graves is too large by 429 m²). In fact, Kola adopted an arbitrary and fallacious test procedure for the number, shape, and dimensions of the mass graves; its data is demonstrably inflated; see Mattogno/Kues/Graf, pp. 1147-1155.

“Later I learned from a witness that for months and months the ground had not stopped trembling; and that from time to time geysers of blood had spurted out.”

- e. Finally, it should be noted that the claimed use of the excavated sand makes no sense at all:

“The machine unloaded sand near the pit. A mountain of sand formed, with which the pit was covered that was overflowing with corpses.” (1946)

If 15 meters in depth of sandy soil had been extracted from a single pit and 100,000 corpses had been placed in it instead, the excavated sand would have piled up to a height of up to 15 meters above ground level, which means that, with 30 of these pits, the camp would have been filled with veritable mountains of this unused sand.

2.16. Himmler’s Visit to Bełżec

Now to Reder’s claim – with contradicting dates – that Himmler personally visited the Bełżec Camp:

“In October of 1942, Himmler carried out an inspection of the camp in the company of SS Major General Katzmann, head of the Gestapo of the Lwów District.” (29.12.1945)

This allegedly took place either “in mid-October” (1946) or “In November 1942” (1954).

Libionka tries to justify this blatant historical falsehood as follows: “Himmler probably [prawdopodobnie] never visited the Bełżec extermination camp,” but “it may be that” [możliwe, że] he passed through Bełżec on his journey from Lublin to Lwów in August 1942. Globocnik accompanied him on that trip. The camp “could [mógł] have been visited” by Globocnik and finally “perhaps [być może] also accompanied by Katzmann.” In support of these outlandish conjectures, he cites page 220 of Dieter Pohl’s book Nationalsozialistische Judenverfolgung in Ostgalizien 1941-1944 (Libionka, Note 97, p. 41). Pohl, however, limits himself to writing that Himmler arrived in Lemberg (Lwów) on August 17, 1942 in the company of Globocnik, without even mentioning Katzmann.

2.17. Reder's Escape

The events relating to his escape are described by Reder in various versions in striking mutual contradiction. It took place “in October 1942” (1.11.1944) but at the same time at “the end of November” (1946). The occasion was the fact that “the camp headquarters needed iron for the kitchen chimneys” (22.9.1944) or “sheet-metal pipes were required for the chimney” (1.11.1944), but at the same time, in “November it was already cold, and the guards needed stoves in the huts. The stoves were built, but the chimneys were lacking” (1956) and he “had to build small chimneys for the stoves” (8.8.1960).

I quote the various versions of his account of the trip to Lwów:

1. “Four SS men and an officer, Scharführer Schatkowsky, came with me to Lwów in a car. The officer stopped the car on Legionów Street and went to lunch with 3 SS men, leaving one SS man in the back of the car. When I realized that the SS man had fallen asleep, I fled, and in this way I remained alive.” (22.9.1944)
2. “Contrary to my expectation, Irmann sent me to Lwów in search of sheet metal. But he ordered four Gestapo officials and a young officer to guard me. I got the sheet metal in Lwów and might actually then have returned, but as it was lunch time, the officer and the three guards went to eat and left me in the truck under the supervision of a ‘volksdeutsch’ official of the Gestapo named Trotwein. The truck was parked next to the sidewalk in Legionów Street. It was a hot October day. Trotwein was probably overwhelmed by the brandy he had drunk, by exhaustion and by sleepiness. He fell asleep while sitting next to me. I cautiously slipped out of the truck and left it as if nothing had happened, mingling with passers-by.” (1.11.1944)
3. “At the end of November of 1942, I went with a car under the escort of the SS to Lwów to buy sheet metal. We arrived in Lwów in the evening, spent the night in the Gestapo jail; the next day, still escorted by SS men, I completed the business of buying the sheet metal, and around noon I was put on the truck under the supervision of an SS man, who was Trotwein. After a while, I noticed that Trotwein had put his rifle aside and had fallen asleep. I took advantage of it, opened the door, and ran away.” (29.12.1945).
4. “After getting into the car, I left with four Gestapo men and a guard. In Lwów, after a full day of loading up sheet metal, I stayed in the car under the surveillance of a cop; the others went to have fun. I sat for a couple of hours without thoughts and without moving. I happened to observe that my guard had fallen asleep and was snoring. Instinctively, without thinking for a moment, I slipped out of the car; the cop was asleep.” (1946)
5. “The next day he ordered me to get dressed, because I had to accompany four guards and a non-commissioned officer on the way to Lwów. The aforemen- tioned were all armed, so that for my part an escape was not expected. We left with a truck, arrived in Lwów in the evening; I was handed over to the Gestapo for the night, and [the next day] I was picked up and went to the office, where we were given vouchers. We received a voucher and also some material, and we had to go back at noon. We stopped at a restaurant, and the non-commissioned officer with the guards went to town and ordered the fourth [guard] to watch me. I sat next to the driver's seat, with the guard behind [me]. The others stayed in the restaurant for a long time, and when I turned around, I noticed that the Ukrainian guard had fallen asleep. I assumed that [the others] would have had a good time during the [previous] night, and that they would be tired. When I realized that he had fallen asleep and even heard him snoring, I decided to flee. I opened the door, moved slowly, got out of the truck very quietly, and ran away to [my] acquaintances.” (1956)

6. “The next day I had to get changed and go to Lwów in a truck. In the truck between the driver and me there was a group of guards and a non-commissioned SS officer, and the fourth man was a Ukrainian Wachmann [guard]. We arrived in Lwów in the evening; I was handed over to the Gestapo to stay overnight, and the next day I was taken back. Then we loaded the sheet metal, and at noon the NCO and all but one of the guards went to eat. The Wachmann who was left on the truck fell asleep, then I took advantage of it and ran away.” (8.8.1960).

The officer, who was at the same time a non-commissioned officer, was Scharführer Schatkowsky, a person whose name is not to be found in any record of the times and places concerned. The name of the man who was to guard Reder in the truck was Trotwein or Trottwein (probably actually Karol Trauttwein), a “volksdeutsch” (ethnic German; 1.11.1944) who was an “Oberwachmann” (29.12.1945), but at the same time this guard was “a Ukrainian Wachmann” (8.8.1960), meaning a “Ukrainian guard” (1956).

According to one version, all the events connected with the escape took place on a single day, according to the other, on two days: Reder arrived in Lwów in the evening, stayed there overnight in Gestapo custody, and fled the next day.

But there is also a third version: “In November 1942, I managed to escape from the Belzec Camp. I fled to [nach] Lemberg and hid with my present wife” (1954). The German preposition of motion “nach” (to[ward]) confirms that Reder had escaped from Bełżec, and only after his escape had he gone to Lemberg/Lwów.

The rest of the story is even more contradictory, both the person who welcomed and hid him, and the place where he was hiding:

"A good woman, to whom I had once rendered many services, welcomed me into her home. She hid me in her house for twenty months. When people came, she hid me with blankets under two beds." (1.11.1944)

"Since then, I had been hiding for 20 months in my factory. Anastazja Hawryluk, who had been my maid for many years, helped me in this." (29.12.1945)

"I remembered where a Polish woman lived, my housekeeper; I went to her. She hid me." (1946)

"I fled to Lemberg and hid with my present wife. Back then, my wife's name was Johanna Robak, and she lived in Lemberg, Sakramentek 5." (1954)

"I opened the door, moved slowly, got out of the truck very quietly, and ran away to [my] acquaintances." (1956)

"I fled to my present wife. Although the Gestapo had its own office in the house where my present wife lived back then, I was able to hide there until the Russian reoccupation of Lwów. My wife worked for the Gestapo as a cleaning lady, so in the aforementioned house there was a two-bedroom apartment with a kitchen and a bathroom, and she hid me in turn once in the attic, once in the basement." (8.8.1960)

Therefore, Reder was welcomed at the same time by a woman to whom he had rendered services, by his former maid Anastazja Hawryluk, by his subsequent wife, and by some unnamed acquaintances. Furthermore, he was hiding at once in the woman's house, under two beds if necessary, in his soap factory, and in his later wife's house, from time to time in the attic and in the basement.

Even apart from these contradictions, Reder's story is characterized by a continuum of miracles, which begins with his initial "selection" at the camp. He states that the transport he arrived in contained 5,000 people, including 1,000 intellectuals and many young people (1946), that in it "there were many men, even workers with various kinds of work certificates [who were] supposedly 'safe'" (1946), meaning skilled workers, but in spite of this, only eight men were allegedly selected from the entire transport, including Reder, who at the time was already 61 years of age and a soap-factory owner to boot, hence not exactly a man fit for hard manual labor.

Another miracle concerns his survival. He himself states that every day the SS killed 30 to 40 men of the inmate staff (1945, 1946), which consisted of 500 men. Those killed were replaced by new arrivals, so that the number was always kept at 500 (1946). This means that during the 105 days of his stay at the camp, Reder escaped in fact 105 such "selections." During this period, some 3,150 to 4,200 inmates were killed, yet the 61-year-old Reder miraculously always escaped death.

Only in his 1954 statement did he attempt to explain this ongoing miracle:

"I was spared because I worked a lot and was considered diligent, which I often heard."

Earlier, however, he had implicitly attributed his survival to the fact that he was called “der Ofenkünstler,” the furnace artificer (1946), or rather the “stove fitter” (1956; 8.8.1960), but for a rather childish reason: why would the camp SS have employed him as a “furnace artificer/stove fitter” in August 1942? It is very true that he claimed having presented himself as a “mechanic,” and in this capacity he was allegedly “assigned to the machine that extracted the sand from the pits destined to [become] graves” (1945). He further stated:

“I worked in this capacity for 2 months. The following month, that is, at the end of November, I worked as a bricklayer at the extension of the camp kitchen.” (29.12.1945)

These are transparent literary fictions, however, because, despite the two months spent doing this work, he says absolutely nothing about this assignment (nor about his work as a bricklayer at the camp kitchen), so that from his story it is not even clear what exactly this machine was doing. I will return to this matter later.

Regarding the criterion of the aforementioned “selections,” the witness stated:

“The squad-leader Jews, the criminal element, wrote down how everyone worked. The worst workers, the weakest, were selected, at noon they were called, taken to a pit and shot.” (1945)

And even more clearly:

“Furthermore, 30-40 workers were shot every day. Usually the doctor handed over the list of exhausted men – or the list of ‘criminals’ – to the so-called ‘Oberzugführer,’ the head guard of the inmates, so that every day 30-40 inmates died. At lunchtime they were taken to a pit and shot.” (1946)

From this we can deduce that those unable to work hard enough were “selected” and killed. But Reder himself describes his condition this way when, at the end of November 1942, he was allegedly taken to Lwów to pick up sheet metal:

“At that point, I was swollen and bruised, pus came out of the sores. [...] Over twenty months the sores all over my body healed.” (1946)

His wife, in the declaration in support of him dated December 7, 1954, confirmed his condition:

“He was ragged, had broken teeth, swollen legs, and a body full of wounds. At night he had a fever of about 40 degrees. [...] He was all bloated from starvation and looked terrible.”

Hence, here we have the latest miracle: instead of being led to the edge of a pit and receiving a blow to the back of the head like a useless person unable to work, the 61-year-old ragged, emaciated Reder was taken to Lwów and was able to escape without difficulty!

2.18. The Tales of Bełżec Inhabitants

In the second half of 1944, Reder felt the urge to return to Bełżec, and he claims to have talked to the locals. The related story would therefore represent second-hand testimony, but it is actually another literary fiction by Reder. What he reports is in fact historically false, so that the inhabitants of Bełżec, if he actually reported their statements, would have lied to him intentionally, which is hard to believe. I quote Reder's related claims:

"In 1944, according to statements by a mechanic who reported it to the witness, the pits were reopened, doused with gasoline, burned, the bones ground to [make] fertilizer." (1945)

"From the stories of the surrounding population, I know that in 1944, as the Russian front approached, the Germans reopened the pits in Bełżec, sprinkled them with gasoline, and burned [them], extracted the unburned remains from the pits with machines, ground the bones [to make] artificial fertilizer, and covered the pits, thus erasing the traces of the crimes. An acquaintance of mine, the fitter Scharf-Szpilka, who had assembled the bone-grinding machine, told me about the bone grinding." (29.12.1945)

"I talked to the inhabitants in the vicinity. They told me that in 1943 there had been less and less transports, that the Jewish killing center had moved to the Oświęcim [Auschwitz] gas chamber. In 1944, the pits were reopened, the corpses were doused with petrol, and burned. A thick black smoke hovered for tens of kilometers around the gigantic furnaces [palenisk]. The stench and bad air spread widely with the wind over a large area. For long days and nights, for long weeks.

And then – said the inhabitants of the vicinity – the bones were ground up, and the wind dispersed the dust over the fields and into the woods.

The bone-grinding machine was installed by an inmate from the Janowska Camp, Szpilke, who was brought to Bełżec for this purpose. He told me that he found only piles of bones, all [p. 65] the buildings were gone. Then he managed to escape and save himself. He currently resides in Hungary. He reported this to me already after the liberation of Lwów by the Red Army.

When the production of 'artificial fertilizer' with millions of human bones ended and the torn pits [sic] were filled, the surface of the blood-soaked soil was leveled in an orderly and accurate way." (1946)

But not one single transport is recorded as having gone directly to Bełżec in 1943 – the last one arrived on December 11, 1942 (Kuwalek, p. 251), while the exhumation and cremation of the corpses is not said to have taken place in the first half of 1944, but from the beginning of January to the end of March 1943 (ibid., pp. 161f.). Many inhabitants of the district who were questioned between late 1945 and early 1946 by the Zamość district judge Czesław

Godziszewski agreed on this point,³⁸ which confirms that Reder's story is completely false.

The incineration technique indicated by Reder is also contrary to the one bandied about by the Holocaust orthodoxy, because Reder spoke of the burning of corpses inside the mass graves in which they were found, while the orthodox narrative has it that these corpses were exhumed from the pits and burned outside the mass graves on special grates built using railway rails.

Scharf-Szpilka or Szpilke is just as fictional a character, mentioned by neither Arad nor Kuwałek. After July 1944, he allegedly “reported” his experiences only to Reder, without bothering in the least to communicate his precious information to the Soviet prosecutor of the Lwów District who interrogated Reder on September 22, 1944 – after which Szpilke conveniently made himself untraceable by going to Hungary, where, of course, he did not tell anyone about his terrible experiences either.

Since the exhumation-cum-cremation of the corpses allegedly took place in the first quarter of 1943, as mentioned earlier, Szpilke would have been lying to Reder when allegedly telling him that he had installed the “bone grinding machine” at Bełżec in 1944. This character is said to have been “an inmate from the Janowska Camp,” but three self-declared survivors of this camp who had to handle the alleged bone-grinding machine in that camp knew nothing of any Scharf-Szpilka or Szpilke. They were questioned by a Soviet prosecutor: Heinrich Chamaides on September 21, 1944, and David Manuszewitz as well as Moische Korn on September 13, 1944. They claimed to have worked in what they called the Janowska Camp’s “death brigade” until October 19 or November 19, 1943, when there was a riot and a mass escape, after which all but twelve inmates were allegedly exterminated. A machine claimed to have been used to crush bones (which in fact was a ball mill used to crush stones for road construction) was found by the Soviets in Lwów and accurately described in September 1944.³⁹ Reder was not yet aware of it in late 1944, so in his 1944 statements he did not mention it at all. According to his statements made presumably after he had learned of its existence, this machine must have been transferred from Lwów to Bełżec after October or November 1943, where it would have been utterly useless, because the exhumation with subsequent incineration of the corpses is said to have been wrapped up by the end of March 1943 – and then the machine must have been brought back to Lwów!

It is therefore all-too-evident that Scharf-Szpilka or Szpilke and his tale are Reder’s disconnected inventions.

³⁹ See in this regard Mattogno 2018, Part 2, Chapter 3.6f., pp. 476-484; Klee/Dreßen, pp. 225-228 (with a photograph of the three witnesses next to the machine).

He finds a way to contradict himself even with regard to the results of this claimed bone-grinding, because on the one hand he claims that the ground-up bones were used to produce fertilizer, yet on the other hand that “the bones were ground up, and the wind dispersed the dust over the fields and into the woods.”

This kind of made-up second-hand “information” also includes his claims relating to the start of the camp’s activities:

“Among these 500 that the witness met at the camp were Polish and Czechoslovakian Jews. They began building the camp and the chamber in early 1942; it began operating in April-May 1942.” (1945)

“For example, we knew that Jews had built this camp and had installed the death machine. No one from this group was there anymore. It was a miracle if any of the Belżec service personnel survived for 5 or 6 months.” (1946)

It is a well-known fact, however, that the camp started operating on March 17, 1942, with “the chamber” already operational, if we follow the orthodox narrative. Furthermore, if the previous group of inmates had been killed, where did Reder get this (false) information from?

2.19. Time Required for Exterminating a Transport

The fact that Reder’s story is a pure literary fiction also may be seen from the impossible daily timeline he gives: after inventing the huge transports (and the alleged huge killings) discussed earlier, Reder did not bother at all to devise a timeline consistent with them.

He states that “the work” took place only during daylight, from 6 in the morning until sunset, but he even contradicts himself regarding the wake-up time, which took place at both 3:30 and at 4:30 in the morning:

“The work lasted from 6 to dusk. [...] At 4 in the morning, the workers left the hut, received tea and 200 grams of bread at the kitchen window. [...] Work [lasted] until 12, then lunch: barley broth, in the evening coffee or tea without bread.” (1945)

“We had to work this way from early morning to dusk. [p. 53] Twilight ended the working day, because this ‘work’ was carried out only during daylight. Already at half past four in the morning, the askari on guard who went around the hut at night knocked on the door and shouted: ‘Auf! Heraus!’ [‘Get up! Get out!’].” (1946)

“At 12 we received lunch – we passed in front of two windows, in one we received a mess tin, in the other half a liter of pearl-barley soup, that is with water, sometimes with a potato.” (1946)

“At 3:30 am we were woken up by S c h m i d t, who was always drunk.” (1954)

“We had to leave the huts at 4 am and worked until night.” (1956)

In his narration, Reder does not take into account the fact that the time of sunrise and sunset varies significantly between August 17 and November 31; for example, in Tomaszów Lubelski, located 8 km north of Bełżec, the sunlit day is shortened from almost 14 and a half hours (5:17-19:42 on August 17) to about 9 hours (6:39-15:41 on November 15), as can be seen from any meteorological site for the latitude in question. From August 17 to November 30, the average duration of sunlit day is about 11 hours; taking away at least one hour for lunch (500 inmates had to queue in front of two windows), on average some 10 hours of actual work remained.

Reder provides the following timing information:

“The shearing of the women lasted no more than 2 hours, and so did the preparation for the killing and the killing itself. [...]

Even before all six chambers were completely filled, the people in the first chamber had already been suffering for two hours.” (1946)

We can deduce from this that the “preparation” – unloading of the railway cars, assembling the deportees, giving the deceptive speech – lasted two hours, while shearing the women took another two hours, and so did the process of driving the victims into the chambers. (The 20 minutes of activity of the death-inducing “machine” are included in these two hours, if we follow the first quote, but not included, if we follow the second.) After that, 5,000 corpses had to be removed from the chambers and piled up on a pile two meters high, from where they were taken to mass graves, for a minimum distance of 150 meters and a maximum of 500 meters. The inmate staff assigned to these activities consisted of 450 inmates (“we were 500 in total. There were only 250 ‘specialists,’ and 200 of them worked at a task that did not require special skills”; 1946), who worked in pairs and dragged the corpses of adults through the sand using two straps attached to their wrists, but:

“They ordered us to load onto our backs the corpses of small children two at a time, and to carry them like that.” (1946)

In the best of cases, the filling of the chambers lasted the aforementioned two hours minus the 20 minutes for the actual killing, therefore one hour and forty minutes, while the removal of the corpses from the chambers had to take considerably longer. By adopting a very charitable interpretation, one can take another two hours. The average distance of the pits was $([150-500] \div 2 =) 325$ meters, to be covered once on the way out while dragging a corpse (or carrying two of children on one’s back), and once on the way back without a load. Along the way, eight or ten dentists had to check the mouth of each adult corpse and extract any gold teeth.

The number of children deported to Bełżec is not known, but a percentage of 21% is attributed to Auschwitz (see Mattogno 2020, pp. 97f.), so that, in round figures, a percentage of 25% can be generously assumed. A transport of 5,000 people therefore contained 1,250 children and 3,750 adults. With a rational division of labor, it can be assumed that 35 prisoners were responsible for transporting children, the remaining 415 for dragging adults. Each prisoner of the first group carried two children at a time, so he had to make $([1,250 \div 2] \div 35 =)$ about 18 trips. Each couple of the second group had to drag only one corpse and also made $(3,750 \div [415 \div 2] =)$ about 18 trips. The total distance for each corpse-transporting inmate would have been $(325\text{m} \times 2 \times 18 =)$ 11,700 meters, which in those conditions would have been difficult to cover even in two hours. Add to this the dental inspection of the bodies of the 3,750 adults, which would have lasted some time as well. With eight dentists, each dentist had to check 468 corpses, which in total took itself some two hours, if each check plus eventual extraction took just 15 seconds.

All in all, according to Reder's account, the extermination of one transport of 5,000 people would have required no less than 12 hours (2 hours for unloading; 2 hours for hair cutting; 2 hours for entering the rooms and killing; 2 hours for the removal of the corpses from the chambers; 2 hours for transporting the corpses to the pits; 2 hours for the dental inspection/extraction of gold teeth), but on average the inmates worked only 10 hours a day...

How would it have been possible to exterminate three or even four transports of 5,000 people each per day?

2.20. The Killing of Children

In his 1946 booklet, Reder presents two contradictory versions of the children's fate:

"The sick, the elderly and the young children, that is, those who could not walk on their own, were carried on stretchers, and unloaded at the edges of huge pits that had been excavated. There the Gestapo man Irrmann shot them, after which he threw them into the pit with the butt of his rifle."

"On the very edge of the graves, children, old people, sick people waited and gloomily looked down with dazed eyes. They were waiting for death." (1946)

However, they were at the same time present in the death chambers:

"They ordered us to load onto our backs the corpses of small children two at a time, and to carry them like that." (1946)

"Irrman and the others led the guests to the chambers, from where the corpses fell [sic] and from where they were thrown into the place where a horrible pile of young and very-young children's bodies grew." (1946)

2.21. The Killing Facility

First of all, I quote Reder's various statements about the killing facility: it measured 100 m × 100 m and was windowless (or rather had false windows; 1.11.1944) and was 3 to 3.5 meters high (1945).

"The building was made of concrete, without windows; the roof was covered with roofing felt." (1945)

"The building of the chambers was made of concrete and covered with a flat roof with roofing felt. It was built on a platform, so that it was accessed via steps from the side of the small courtyard, and along the two longer walls there was a kind of raised unloading ramp." (29.12.1945)

One entered the building "up three steps," "one meter wide" and the "chambers were one-and-a-half meters above ground" (1946). Therefore, each step was 50 centimeters high!

The central corridor was 1.5 meters wide, the interior doors to the rooms were 1 meter wide.

"The chambers were completely dark, windowless and absolutely bare. In each chamber, a round opening the size of an electrical switch was visible." (1946)

If the chambers were completely dark, how could the round opening be visible?

The chambers were "no more than 2 meters high," the external doors were sliding doors 2 meters wide (1946). They ran "sideways on rails consisting of 2 leaves" (29.12.1945). There were six chambers, each of which could accommodate exactly 750 people (1.11.1944, 1945; 1954; or 750 to 770; 22.9.1944), given that the "askaris counted 750 people for each chamber" (1946).

But what surface area did the building cover? Other than the incredible dimensions of 100 m × 100 m, Reder gives no indication. But the three steps one meter wide, the corridor 1.5 meters wide, the entrance doors to the rooms one meter wide, the height of the rooms of two meters maximum, refer to a relatively small building. I will return to the question of the floor-plan area in Chapter 4.2.

Given that the inmates were crowded into these chambers and could only stand up straight, and would remain that way even after death:

"The people were pushed into the chambers standing so tightly that the doors could hardly be closed." (1945)

"the corpses were standing upright" (1946)

a packing density of at least ten people per square meter must be assumed; this results in a chamber size of not more than $(750 \div 10 =)$ 75 square meters, which would amount to a chamber size of, for example, some 7 m wide and 11 m long, which would mean that the building was (7m×3) some 21 m long and (11m×2+1.5m) 23.5 m wide, ignoring the thickness of the walls and the annex housing the “machine.” Although all this is pure conjecture, it shows that Reder’s claim of a building measuring 100 m × 100 m is totally unrealistic.

Here I note that the structure of the building was very strange: it was 3-3.5 meters high, but the rooms were no more than 2 m high. Since the roof was flat, there had to be a gap of 1-1.5 meters above the rooms. The witness states that “on the front attic wall” (na ścianie czołowej strychu) was written “Bade und Inhalationsräume” (1.11.1944), but of what use would have been an interspace between the chambers’ ceiling and the roof?

Furthermore, the access stairs were narrower than the corridor: one meter against one and a half meters. It must be assumed that the access door was also one meter wide, like the steps; but since the corridor was one and a half meters wide, the staircase and door constituted – as Robert Jan van Pelt would say – a useless “bottleneck” that would only slow down the victims’ entry into the building. In fact, from the point of view of the economy of extermination, pushing a mass of 4,500 people through such a bottleneck would have been obvious folly.

2.22. The Killing System

The most-unheard-of aspect of Reder’s statements is the killing system, both because he expounded it in various contradictory versions, and because he himself admitted that he did not know what it consisted of.

At first, he mentioned a “compressor” and “gas cylinders”:

“On one side of the ‘bath house,’ the part opposite the railway line, there was an annex in which the compressor powered by a gasoline engine was located. Gas cylinders were leading [were connected] to this machine. From the compressor the tubes went to each room. In each room on one wall there was a small grillwork to which the gas pipe led.” (22.9.1944)

From the declaration of November 1, 1944 onward, Reder began to speak of “gassing”:

“From the gassing device located behind the building, gas was conducted through special pipes.”

This term, however, is not only improper, but also deceptive, because Reder candidly says – and several times to boot – that he did not know how the victims were killed and, as I will show below, categorically excluded the “official” system of engine-exhaust gases.

His doubts already appear in the 1945 declaration:

“From this small room, the gas arrived in the chambers through tubes of small diameter. I cannot tell whether the machine produced gas (or condensed air).”

His statement of December 29, 1945, on the other hand, contains shocking and devastating statements, both for the value of Reder's testimony and for the use orthodox Holocaust historians make of it – and precisely for this reason it is never mentioned by them:

“On the opposite side of the building, that is, behind the wall in front of which the corridor ended, there was a small room in which the machines were located. I personally saw that in this small room there was a gasoline-powered engine which seemed very complicated. I remember it had a drive wheel, but I didn't observe any other constructional or technical details. [...]

I am unable to say what the chemical aspect of the mechanism of killing people in the Belzec chambers consisted of. I only know one thing, that from the engine room a pipe of one inch in diameter went into each of the gas chambers. The outlets of these pipes ended in the individual chambers. I don't know whether any gas was released through these pipes into the chambers, whether the air in the chambers was compressed or whether the air was pumped out of the chambers. I was often on the ramp when the doors were opened. However, I never smelled any odors, and entering the rooms immediately after opening the door never had any harmful effects on my health. The corpses found in the chamber did not show an unnatural color at all. They all looked like living people, mostly their eyes were open. Only in a few cases did it happen that the corpses were stained with blood. The air in the rooms, after their opening, was clean, transparent and odorless. In particular, no smoke or combustion gases from the engine could be perceived. These gases were discharged by the engine directly to the outside and not into the chambers.”

Speaking of “gas chambers” under such circumstances is a clear sign of disingenuity.

In his 1946 booklet, Reder returns to the question, adding further inexplicable and incongruous elements:

“Outside the building, there was a rather small annex, measuring perhaps 2 by 2 meters, in which the ‘machine’ was located, a gasoline-powered engine. [...]

The machine was one-and-a-half by one meter in size; there was an engine and wheels. The engine roared for quite long time intervals; it went pretty fast, so fast that the spokes of the wheels could not be distinguished. The machine ran for 20 minutes by the clock. It was turned off after 20 minutes. The external doors of the chambers that opened onto the ramp were opened immediately, and the corpses were thrown onto the ground, rising up to an enormous pile of a few meters high. When opening the doors, the askari did not take any precautions, nor did we notice any smell; I never saw gas cylinders, nor any other admixtures that were poured out – I only saw petrol canisters. About 80-100 liters of gasoline were consumed every day. Two askari were in charge of the machine. But when the machine broke down once, I was called too, because I was called ‘der Ofenkünstler’ [the furnace artificer]; I looked at it and saw glass tubes that were connected to the tubes that went into each chamber. We were of the opinion that the machine either produced high pressure, or caused a vacuum, or the gasoline produced carbon monoxide which killed the people."

First of all, it should be noted that the witness contradicts himself, both with regard to the gas cylinders (which he claimed in his first statement), and with regard to the possibility that the victims were killed by carbon monoxide, because the "gases were discharged by the engine directly to the outside and not into the chambers." But then, why did the pipes leave the machine and terminate in each chamber? And why were "glass tubes" connected to them? What were they for?

Reder's "machine" is at least enigmatic, not to mention extremely imaginative, because it had a compressor, gas cylinders and wheels with spokes: not even with the most fervid imagination could one imagine how it was structured and how it worked.

Regarding the pipes, Reder states that "In each room on one wall there was a small grillwork to which the gas pipe led," which means that these were not exposed pipes ending in a grate, but walled-in pipes with outlets in the walls of the rooms covered by a grate, as the witness clearly says:

"The outlets of these pipes ended in the individual chambers."

However, in his interrogation of August 8, 1960, when he had adopted the killing system favored by the prosecutors and orthodox historians of the time, Reder declared:

"At the end of the hut there was a small room in which the machine was located, whose exhaust gases were fed into the 6 gas chambers through pipes. The pipes through which the gas was fed into the chambers were installed on the ceilings of the gas chambers."

There is no need to emphasize that previously the witness had stated exactly the opposite, namely that the gas was discharged outside the building. In addition, now the pipes were installed on the ceiling rather than ending in a wall.

Regarding the "machine," Reder states that every day it consumed some "80-100 liters of gasoline" (during just three 20-minute periods of activity, hence 60 minutes of daily operation, or one-and-a-half liters per minute!), and states:

"I only know that it consumed 4 cans of gasoline a day, because that was the amount of gasoline brought into the camp every day." (29.12.1945)

According to this, gasoline was brought to the camp for the sole purpose of running the "machine." But then, how did the "gasoline engine of the 'Deič' Company" operate that drove the conveyor belt which "lifted the earth from the pits in which the corpses of those exterminated /asphyxiated/ were buried"? (22.9.1944)

“He ordered me, as a mechanic, to operate the gasoline machine with which huge pits were dug in the immediate vicinity of the camp.” (29.12.1945)

Part 3:

Kurt Gerstein's Statements

3.1. The Documentation

Unlike Rudolf Reder, Kurt Gerstein is an all-too-well-known character in orthodox and revisionist historiography, so there is no need to dwell on the details of his tormented life, which ended on July 25, 1945 by a reported suicide in a cell in the Parisian prison of Cherche-Midi.

In a broad sense, what goes by the name of the “Gerstein Report” is the entire complex of documents that concerns him directly, specifically his written statements and interrogations.

Except for one fundamental one, these documents were published in 1986 in a critical edition by Henri Roques, with the original texts, transcriptions and translations (Chelain 1986; Roques 1989). This documentation had already been used by me the year before, independent of Roques, for the preparation of my 1985 study Il rapporto Gerstein: Anatomia di un falso (The Gerstein Report: Anatomy of a Perjury). The main documents are as follows, in chronological order (I summarize the essential data for each):

1. 12-page unsigned manuscript, dated “Rottweil 26 avril 1945” and written in a rough French [= Roques’s TI]. Referred to below as “M26.4.45.”
2. 6-page typescript dated “Rottweil 26 avril 1945” written in rough French with handwritten signature “Kurt Gerstein” at the end [= Roques’s TII]. It is part of Document PS-1553, to which I will return later.
3. German typescript of 24 pages plus 8 pages of “Ergänzungen” (Additions. Dated “Tübingen/Württemberg, Gartenstrasse 24, z. Zt. Rottweil, den 4. Mai 1945.” This was admitted by the Jerusalem Court (Eichmann Trial), as Document T-1310 [= Roques’s TIII].
4. German typescript of 13 pages headed “Bergassessor a.D. Kurt Gerstein Diplom-Ingenieur Tübingen, Württemberg, den 6. Mai 1945 z. Zt. Rottweil. Hotel Mohren.” It was classified as Nuremberg Document PS-2170 [= Roques’s TVI].
5. 16-page typescript titled “Rapport du Dr. Gerstein de Tubingen du 6 Mai 1945” written in rough French [= Roques’s TV]. Referred to below as “D6.5.45”.
6. 9-page manuscript headed “Tuebingen Wurttemberg Gartenstr. 24 maintenant: Rottweil, Hôtel Mohren 6 Mai 1945” [= Roques’s TIV]. Referred to below as “M6.5.45”.
7. Official document of the 2nd Office of the 1st French Army, known from a media report (through Geo Kelber’s article titled “Un bourreau des camps nazis avoue : ‘J’ai exterminé jusqu’à 11.000 personnes par jour’” (“An Executioner of the Nazi Camps Confesses: ‘I exterminated up to 11,000 people a day’”; France Soir, July 4, 1945, pp. 1f.). Referred to below as “K”.

8. Gerstein's interrogation of June 26, 1945 by Commandant Beckhardt.⁴⁰ Referred to below as "B26.6.45." At the Eichmann Trial in Jerusalem, an English translation of this document with the header "WC-90 Paris. June 26th, 1945. Interrogation of Mr. Kurt Gerstein by Commandant Beckhardt (Interrogating Officer of the O.R.C.G, Paris, 48 rue de Villejust)" was admitted and registered with the reference number T-1313-b.
9. Gerstein's interrogation of July 19, 1945 by Judge Mattei.⁴¹ Referred to below as "M19.7.45."

The two interrogations (the first in the original) and the article by G. Kelber (in the original) were published by Roques (Chelain 1988, pp. 170-185).

3.2. "Killing Facilities in Poland"

Another text is also attributed to Gerstein, of which only a three-and-a-half-page handwritten Dutch translation exists with the German title "Tötungsanstalten in Polen" ("Killing Facilities in Poland"), which I analyzed in Matogno 1985 (Chapter V, pp. 99-107), and which Florent Bayard resurrected 15 years later as if it were an absolute novelty (Brayard 2000). According to orthodox Holocaust historiography, Gerstein got in touch with his Dutch friend Ubbink immediately after returning from his visit to the Bełżec and Treblinka Camps. Ubbink had visited Gerstein in Berlin in February 1943. Louis de Jong reports (1969, p. 8):

"Ubbink was spared no detail. And what was his reaction? 'At that time', he explained some 20 years later, 'I thought Gerstein's description was completely incredible. What he told me was so horrific that I felt I couldn't possibly repeat it to anyone else.'"

However, a couple of weeks later, a member of the Dutch resistance, Cornelis van der Hooft, visited Ubbink, and Ubbink repeated Gerstein's story to him. Louis de Jong quotes Ubbink about van der Hooft's reaction:

"I had the greatest difficulty in convincing the resistance leader of the truth of my report'" (ibid.)

The rest of the story is narrated in greater detail by Brayard (Brayard, p. 74):

"A few days later, on March 25, 1943, Van der Hooft came into contact with resistance members of his network, Jo Satter and his father, in the vicinity of Doesburg. In their presence, Van der Hooft handwrote a four-page report in Dutch titled 'Tötungsanstalten in Polen' – [...]."

⁴⁰ The original document, signed in his own hand by Gerstein, was published by Roques in Chelain 1988, pp. 171-174.

⁴¹ The interrogation text was published by Wellers (1980). This text was also reproduced by Roques: Chelain 1988, pp. 176-182. The reproduction of Kelber's article follows, pp. 183-185.

This untenable thesis is refuted from the outset by the simple fact that the report is written in the first person. If we accept Brayard's claim, this would mean that van der Hooft, the alleged author of the report, personally visited the Belżec Camp (which is called "Belsjek" in the report)! The report "Killing Facilities in Poland" necessarily presupposes a German text written by Gerstein himself, so the story narrated by de Jong and Brayard lacks any credibility. This is already clear from the title of the manuscript, in German, and is undoubtedly demonstrated by the following. The transmitter of the report (Ubbink or van der Hooft) – the full translation of which I reproduce below – explicitly states that "Its veracity is guaranteed by a high German SS officer who made the following statement under oath and asked for it to be published". Further on, this officer [Gerstein] states:

"In talks I had with German officers serving in Poland and Russia, I heard the most-incredible atrocity tales, and when the news of the sudden death of my little mentally ill sister-in-law was received, I decided that I would have no peace until I found out what was true about these atrocity tales and the deaths of the mentally ill."

In 1945, Gerstein narrated the same episode:

"When I heard of the beginning of the killing of the mentally ill in Grafeneck and Hadamar and elsewhere, I definitely decided to make an attempt to look into these furnaces and chambers in order to find out what was happening there. All the more so since a sister-in-law by marriage – Bertha Ebeling – was forcibly killed in Hadamar." (T-1310, pp. 3f.: "Als ich von der beginnenden Umbringung der Geisteskranken in Grafeneck und Hadamar und andernorts hörte, beschloss ich auf jeden Fall den Versuch zu machen, in diese öfen und Kammern hineinzuschauen um zu wissen, was dort geschieht. Dies um so mehr, als eine angeheiratete Schwägerin – Bertha Ebeling – in Hadamar zwangsgetötet wurde.")

It is clear the "mentally ill sister-in-law" was indeed Bertha Ebeling, Gerstein's sister-in-law. Hence, Gerstein was therefore the author of a German text which was later translated into Dutch. The date given – March 25, 1943 – could be either the date of the translation or the writing date of the original text.

In the German text dated May 6, 1945, Gerstein wrote:

"In 1943, the Dutch resistance movement told me through graduate engineer Ubbink from Doesburg that I should not present them with atrocities, but rather serve them with the strictest truthfulness." (PS-2170, p. 7: "Die holländische Widerstandsbewegung ließ mir im Jahre 1943 durch Diplomingenieur Ubbink aus Doesburg bestellen, ich möchte ihr nicht mit Greueln aufwarten, sondern sie mit der strengsten Wahrhaftigkeit bedienen.")

This is further confirmation that the author of this text was indeed Gerstein, whom, by his own admission, the Dutch resistance movement did not trust.

Having clarified this, we can move on to the actual text.⁴²

“[p. 1] Killing Facilities in Poland

The story that follows below in all its horror, its incredible brutality and atrocity, came to us from Poland with the urgent request of wanting to inform humanity about it. Its veracity is guaranteed by a high German SS officer who made the following statement under oath and asked for it to be published:

In talks I had with German officers serving in Poland and Russia, I heard the most-incredible atrocity tales, and when the news of the sudden death of my little mentally ill sister-in-law was received, I decided that I would have no peace until I found out what was true about these atrocity tales and the deaths of the mentally ill.

All my effort was then focused on making contact with prominent SS men in Poland and gaining their complete trust. After months, I managed to obtain permission to visit two so-called killing facilities. The first one I visited is located in Belsjek [sic], on the Lemberg-Lublin road, the second in Treblinka, about 80 kilometers north of Warsaw, the other two are still in Poland, but I have not yet managed to get access to them. The two aforementioned establishments are located in secluded wooded areas. They do not differ, seen from the outside, from normal concentration camps. A wooden door with some inscriptions ending in ‘Heim’ [institute] discourages the passer-by from suspecting any murder lair [moordhol].

Trains arrive from all the occupied countries of Europe with [p. 2] the victims inside. They are made up of cattle cars whose windows are barred with barbed wire; in each car there are 120 people. In normal weather conditions, about 90% of them arrive alive, although once, last summer, it happened that, due to a lack of water, 50% died.

When the cars have arrived at the camp, people are whipped out and whipped into the surrounding huts and locked up there. The following day or a few days later, depending on the influx that has taken place, 700-800 people are gathered in a courtyard. Then they are ordered to undress completely, the clothes are to be placed neatly in a pile, while the shoes are to be put aside together.

Completely naked, men, women and children are now led into a long corridor (passage) surrounded by barbed wire. Ukrainian criminals are now starting to cut and shave the hair of men and women; the hair is carefully collected and then used for ‘gaskets’ of submarines. The unfortunates have to stand in this way for many hours in the most-severe cold or in the blazing sun. When someone, exhausted by the bitter cold or burning heat, falls unconscious, the executioners strike the naked bodies of the unfortunates with their whips. The suffering and misery that occur in these corridors defies all description. There is no talk at all, only the eyes of the unfortunates express an unspeakable pain and a dark resignation. The corridor ends at an iron door of a stone building. The door is opened, and the 700-800 [people] sentenced to death [p. 3] are whipped into it until, crammed like herring in a barrel, they can no longer move. A three-year-old boy who had escaped outside is whipped and brought back. Then the doors are closed hermetically. Outside the building, a large tractor is now being put into operation, whose exhaust [gas] spreads throughout the building. Through a small glass pane, I was able to observe from the outside the effect on the victims inside. The unfortunates were huddled there and awaited their last hour. There was no panic, there were no screams, but a faint murmur resounded outside, as if a common prayer rose to heaven.

Within an hour they were all dead. Sliding windows were opened so that the carbon monoxide could vanish. After half an hour, a multitude of Jews arrived – they owe their lives to the dismal work that begins now – they open a back door and must now carry out the bodies of those gassed, but before taking them to the prepared lime pits, they must take off finger rings and open mouths and, if there are gold teeth, tear them out.

In each facility, the number of killings [batches] is recorded statistically. Three to four killings are carried out per day, i.e. within 24 hours. Hence, this results for the 4 facilities in a total of 8,000-9,000 deaths per day. In total, 6 and a half million men have already perished in this way, including 4 million Jews and 2-and-a-half-million mentally ill and so-called enemies of the Germans. The program includes 16 million people, that is, all Jews from the occupied countries and all Polish and Czech intellectuals.

By higher order, [p. 4] the emphasis is currently on speed, and the possibility of finding a more-effective way to kill is being considered. Cyanide gas [cyanogas] has been proposed, but it seems that it has not been used so far, so that one still kills in the cynical way already described. March 25, 1943.”

This report, as I will document below, contains insurmountable contradictions with subsequent reports, which are themselves contradictory in many points. Therefore, if the aim were to present a summary of the “Gerstein Report” by taking into consideration all the documents listed above, the result would be an absolutely insane tale.

3.3. Gerstein’s Account

Gerstein’s personal events are of only marginal interest here. I therefore omit the autobiographical details of strictly private nature, observing however that Gerstein did not seem to have clear ideas even in this regard. He was married either on August 31, 1937 (PS-2170, p. 1) or on May 2, 1937 (PS-1553, p. 4⁴³).

Gerstein took the “Bergassessor” exam (mining engineering) on October 27 (T-1310, p. 4) and on November 27, 1935 (PS-1553, p. 4).

His home, in which he received a circle of anti-Nazi activists, was located in the Buelowstrasse (PS-1553, Supplements) and in the Lützowstrasse (PS-2170, p. 12).

On the other hand, Gerstein’s public life, especially regarding his attitude towards National Socialism and the reasons for his enlistment in the Waffen SS, is somewhat ambiguous and contradictory.

On May 2, 1933, Gerstein joined the NSDAP. In June of that year, he began to be investigated by the Gestapo for activities against the National Socialist state (T-1310, p. 2), but in a speech given on February 1934, Gerstein expressed his dedication to Adolf Hitler, “the Führer to whom we look up with passionate gratitude and whose order we accept unreservedly” (Friedländer 1969, p. 31).

On January 30, 1935, he was beaten and injured for disturbing the performance of the anti-Christian drama “Wittekind” in the Hagen Theater (PS-2170, p. 1).

On September 27, 1936, he was arrested by the Gestapo for sending 8,500 anti-Nazi pamphlets to all state officials (PS-2170, p. 1). On 2 October of that year, he was expelled from the NSDAP for religious anti-state activities (T-1310, p. 2); he was arrested and remained in prison until the end of October 1936 (PS-1553, p. 4). On November 29, 1936, he sent a letter to the Party Tribunal in which he asked that he be spared the penalty of expulsion, stressing that he had fought “for years against the Judaeo-Bolshevik attacks upon the substance of the German people” (Friedländer 1969, p. 47). On January 25, 1937, in a letter to the Supreme Court of the Party, Gerstein reaffirmed his loyalty to the Führer, writing among other things: “I cannot admit that I have broken faith with the National Socialist movement” (ibid., p. 49).

These attempts at rehabilitation, as the ruling of the Tübingen Denazification Chamber noted, “make it appear doubtful that Gerstein was ever that total and irreducible opponent of the National Socialist ideology that many witnesses claim” (Poliakov 1964b, p. 10).

On July 14, 1938,⁴⁴ he was again arrested by the Gestapo for anti-state activity and sent to prison, then to the Welzheim Concentration Camp (PS-2170, p. 1).

⁴⁴ On July 23 according to the Gestapo internment order: “Geheimes Staatspolizeiamt, Berlin SW 11, Prinz-Albrecht Strasse 8, den 23. Juli 1938” (Donath, p. 569).

But on October 9, 1938, Gerstein reaffirmed his loyalty to Adolf Hitler in a letter to his father (Friedländer 1969, pp. 66f.), and on June 22, 1939, the Supreme Court of the Party converted his “exclusion” into a “dismissal” (ibid., p. 69).

In 1940, Gerstein tried to be readmitted to the NSDAP, declaring that he again felt an integral partisan of the Führer and that he had become a determined opponent of the anti-Hitler Protestant Confessing Church (Poliakov 1964b, pp. 10f.).

On March 10, 1941, Gerstein joined the Waffen SS to gain insight into the killing of the mentally ill as part of the euthanasia program. He was led to this act by the fact that his sister-in-law, Berta Ebeling, had been euthanized in Hadamar (T-1310, pp. 3f.). However, he declared that he had submitted the application for enlistment “in December 1940” (“en décembre 1940,” M19.7.45, p. 27), while the urn containing Bertha Ebeling’s ashes was interred on February 22, 1941 (Joffroy, p. 78). He also stated that he had simply accepted the recruitment proposals made by Gestapo agents at the time of his second arrest (B26.6.45, p. 2; Chelain 1986, p. 172). However, according to Pastor Heinz Schmidt, he and Gerstein had the idea of joining the Waffen SS as early as the end of 1939 (Friedländer 1969, p. 81), while Horst Dickten reported that Gerstein wanted to enlist as a paratrooper in the Luftwaffe, the German Air Force (Joffroy, p. 78).

In conclusion, the reason for Gerstein’s decision to enlist in the Waffen SS is unclear, as Saul Friedländer explicitly stated:

“In other words, both the motives for Gerstein’s decision and even the date of that decision are not altogether clear.” (Friedländer 1969, p. 84)

The Tübingen denazification chamber had reached the same conclusion already several years earlier (Poliakov 1964b, p. 11):

“Given these statements by Gerstein and the measures he took in view of his political rehabilitation, it seems very doubtful that the reasons which, according to him, would have led him to join the Waffen SS correspond to the truth. In any case, it is impossible to prove that he had the intention right from the start to engage in espionage or sabotage in the SS.”

Gerstein was assigned to the SS Führungshauptamt (SS Main Headquarters), Amtsgruppe D (Office Group D), Sanitätswesen der Waffen-SS, Abteilung Hygiene (PS-2170, p. 2), that is, to the Hygiene Department of the Waffen SS’s Health Services. By virtue of his qualifications in the field of disinfection, he was soon appointed Leutnant (second lieutenant) and Oberleutnant (first lieutenant; T-1310, p. 5; PS-2170, p. 2), although these ranks were used by the Wehrmacht, not the SS; the corresponding Waffen-SS ranks were SS Unter- sturmführer and SS Obersturmführer, respectively.⁴⁵ He was also appointed head of the Technical Disinfection Services of the Waffen SS in January (PS-1553, p. 4; D6.5.45, p. 5) or rather in February 1942 (PS-2170, p. 2; D6.5.45, p. 3).

In this capacity, SS Sturmbannführer Günther of the Reichssicherheitshauptamt (RSHA) visited him in his office on June 8, 1942. Günther gave him the task of “immediately” (“sofort”) procuring “100 kg of hydrogen cyanide” (“100 kg Blausäure”) “for an extremely secret Reich mission” (“für einen äusserst geheimen Reichsauftrag”; T-1310, p. 5; PS-1553, p. 5: “100 kg d’acide prussique”), or maybe it was 260 kg (“ein Quantum Blausäure (- 260 kg -)”; PS-2170, p. 2; D6.5.45, p. 3: “260 kgs”; M19.7.45, p. 28: “deux cent soixante kilogrammes”) and to take it with a car (T-1310, p. 5: “mit einem Auto”) or rather a truck (PS-1553, p. 5: “camion”) or a generic motor vehicle (PS-2170, p. 2: “mittels eines Kraftwagens”) to an unknown place, known only to the driver. This substance was either hydrogen cyanide (HCN) or potassium cyanide (KCN; M19.7.45, p. 28; M26.4.45, p. 3: “cyanure de potassium”⁴⁶).

On that occasion, Gerstein received a verbal mission order which was confirmed in writing 48 hours later (M19.7.45, p. 29), i.e. on July 10, 1942.

A few weeks later, Gerstein and the driver left for Kolin⁴⁷ – whose name was misspelled as “Collin” (PS-1553, p. 5) and “Kollin” (PS-2170, p. 2) – to pick up the substance. Gerstein took along Professor (Wilhelm) Pfannenstiel, to whom he attributed the rank of SS Sturmbannführer (major) and SS Obersturmbannführer (lieutenant colonel) in the very same document (PS-1553, p. 6 and 7), but “more by accident” (T-1310, p. 6: “mehr zufällig”; M6.5.45, p. 7: “par hasard”), that is, Prof. Pfannenstiel had no particular business riding along on this “extremely secret” mission. At this point, things get complicated, because Gerstein had to both pick up (PS-1553, p. 5; PS-2170, p. 2; T-1310, p. 5; D6.5.1945, p. 3) and transport (B26.6.45, p. 2; Chelain 1986, p. 172: “l’ordre de transporter”) the hydrogen cyanide/potassium cyanide in Kolin, and the location of the collection had been both imposed on Gerstein and chosen by Gerstein himself according to the same document:

“I had been instructed to take delivery at Kollin near Prague of this poison and to transport it to the above-mentioned camp.” (M19.7.45, p. 28: “J’avais reçu comme consigne de prendre livraison à Kollin près de Prague de ce poison et de le transporter au camp sus-indiqué.”)

⁴⁶ This cannot be a translation error of what Gerstein stated, because in PS-1553 and other documents in French, he consistently mentions “acide prussique” (prussic acid/hydrogen cyanide).

“I chose Kollin myself, because I knew that cyanide was made there, as it was also made in Dessau.” (M19.7.45, p. 29: “C’est moi-même qui ai choisi Kollin car je savais que l’on y fabriquait du cyanure, comme l’on fabriquait également à Dessau.”)

Furthermore, the quantity of hydrogen cyanide/potassium cyanide of 100 or 260 kg was set by those who gave Gerstein the order, but also determined by Gerstein himself. This contradiction is also found in the same document:

“I received a verbal mission order, confirmed forty-eight hours later in writing. This writing said roughly this: I am ordering you to procure two hundred kilograms of potassium cyanide and to transport them to a location designated to you by the driver of vehicle No. X ... assigned to the mission.” (M19.7.45, p. 29: “Je reçus un ordre de mission verbal, confirmé quarante-huit heures après par écrit. Cet écrit disait approximativement ceci: je vous donne l’ordre de vous procurer deux cents soixante kilogrammes de cyanure de potassium et de les transporter à un lieu qui vous sera désigné par le conducteur du véhicule N° X... affecté à la mission.”)

“[Mattei] Who had set the amount of cyanide to take away? [Gerstein] – I fixed it myself, and that takes into account the car’s carrying capacity.” (M19.7.45, p. 30: “[Mattei] Qui avait fixé la quantité de cyanure à emporter? [Gerstein] – C’est moi-même qui l’avait fixé et cela compte tenu de la capacité de transport de la voiture.”)

On August 17, 1942, Gerstein arrived in Lublin, which is about 1,010 km from Berlin via Kolin (280 to Kolin, 730 from Kolin to Lublin), hence he probably had left the day before. From this it must be deduced that the RSHA had rather unusual operating methods when dealing with the claimed extermination of Jews. In fact, if we follow Gerstein’s narrative, SS Sturmabführer Günther gave Gerstein the order to “immediately” procure the toxic substance “for an extremely secret Reich mission” on June 8, 1942, and on June 10, Gerstein received written confirmation of the order. Despite this need for “immediacy,” Gerstein left over two months later, without anyone having urged him.

Furthermore, the RSHA clearly had more confidence in its drivers than in its SS officers, because the journey’s destination was unknown both to Major Günther, who conveyed the order,⁴⁸ and to Second Lieutenant Gerstein, who had to carry it out, but it was known to the driver:

“While on the way, I had received instructions through the driver to go to LUBLIN, to Major General Gruppen Führer SS [sic] GLOBOCNEC [sic] who was in command of the four extermination camps.” (M19.7.45, p. 32: “J’avais reçu en cours de route, par l’intermédiaire du chauffeur, des instructions

⁴⁸ This is evident from the context of the story: if Günther had known the destination, he would have communicated it to Gerstein immediately.

d'avour à me render à LUBLIN, auprès du général major Gruppen Führer SS [sic] GLOBOCNEC [sic] qui commandait les quatre camps d'extermination.")

One may also wonder how Pfannenstiel got to know Gerstein's destination, since it was a state secret. How could Gerstein have offered Pfannenstiel a ride, if he did not yet know the destination of the journey before his departure? And finally, how did the RSHA reconcile the secrecy of Gerstein's mission with the presence of an uninvolved civilian?

It should be added that the choice of Gerstein by the RSHA for this top-secret mission was unfortunate to say the least. In fact, as seen earlier, Gerstein had been arrested twice by the Gestapo "for anti-state activity" ("wegen staatsfeindlicher Betätigung"), and after the second time, he had even been interned in the "Welzheim Concentration Camp," after having previously been interrogated and admonished "two dozen times" ("zwei Dutzend mal") by the Gestapo and the SD (PS-2170, p. 1). Furthermore, he had been banned from giving speeches (Redeverbot) throughout the Reich territory, a provision that remained in force until the end of the National-Socialist system (PS-2170, p. 1: "bis zum Ende des Systems," "until the end of the system"; D6.5.45, p. 2: "jusqu'à la fin du système nazi," "until the end of the Nazi system"). Hence, this prohibition to speak publicly was well in force on June 8, 1942.

In December 1941, the Party Court (Parteigericht) which had decreed the expulsion of Gerstein from the NSDAP learned of his entry into an important office of the SS Führungshauptamt and tried to have him expelled, although without success, because Gerstein, by virtue of his successes in the field of disinfection, was protected by his superiors, even though they had "extensive" knowledge of his past on that occasion (D6.5.45, p. 3). Therefore, Gerstein's credentials were not exactly such as to invite entrusting him light-heartedly with a state secret which by its very nature (the extermination of Jews) moreover must have been deeply repugnant to a fervent Christian like himself. Gerstein's anti-state activities had in fact been of a purely religious nature. All of this could not be ignored by the RSHA. SS Sturmbannführer Rolf Günther was Adolf Eichmann's deputy at Subsection IV B 4 of the RSHA, headed by Eichmann. Office (Amt) IV was the Gestapo, and Department IV B dealt with the political activities of the Catholic and Protestant Church, religious sects, Jews and Freemasons.

Therefore, precisely those who had prosecuted Gerstein for anti-state activities of a religious nature (who, after the establishment of the RSHA on September 27, 1939, belonged precisely to Office IV B) now entrusted him with all serenity a mission so secret that not even Adolf Eichmann knew anything about it,⁴⁹ even though he (Eichmann) was the one who should have given the order to his subordinate Günther, hierarchically speaking.

⁴⁹ State of Israel, Vol. VIII, pp. 2255-2261.

Once in Lublin, Gerstein and Pfannenstiel were received by “SS-Gruppenführer General Globocnik” (PS-2170, 3), but back then, Globocnik was merely “SS-Brigadeführer und Generalmajor der Polizei”; he was promoted to “SS-Gruppenführer und Generalleutnant der Polizei” only on November 9, 1942 (Rückerl, p. 37).

Globocnik explained to the two visitors:

“This secret Reich matter is currently one of the most-secret, one can say the most-secret of all that exist. Anyone who gossips about it is shot immediately. Just yesterday we silenced two gossipers.” (PS-2170, p. 3: “Diese geheime Reichssache ist z.Zt. eine der geheimsten, man kann sagen, die geheimste überhaupt, die es gibt. Jeder der davon schwätzt, wird sofort erschossen. Gerade gestern haben wir zwei Schwätzer still gemacht.”)

With a unique sense of coherence, Globocnik hastened to reveal this mother of all secrets to Pfannenstiel, who had nothing to do with it.

“At the moment, that was on August 17th – we have three facilities:

1. Belcec, on the Lublin-Lemberg highway in the northern corner at the exact point where the demarcation line with the Russians intersects the highway. Daily capacity about 15,000 killings. Average utilization since April 11,000 per day.” (“Im Augenblick, das war am 17. August – haben wir drei Anlagen: 1. Belcec, an der Chaussee Lublin-Lemberg im nördlichen Winkel genau an der Stelle, wo die Demarkationslinie mit den Russen die Chaussee schneidet. Tagesleitungen etwa 15 000 Tötungen. Durchschnittliche Ausnutzung bisher seit April 11 000 pro Tag.”)

Gerstein never uses the proper spelling of the place (Bełżec), not even without diacritics (Belzec), but always misspells it as “Belcec” or “Belcek.” That said, Globocnik could not have been unaware that this camp had entered into operation on March 17, 1942, not in April, a mistake Gerstein repeated and even more-explicitly so four pages later in the same report:

“This facility had been in operation since April 1942, and handles on average some 1000 [sic⁵⁰] killings per day.” (PS-2170, p. 7: “Diese Anlage war seit April 1942 im Gange und schafft im Durchschnitt pro Tag rund 1000 [sic] Tötungen.”)

It ensues that, by August 17, within 139 days, the camp would have “processed” ($139 \times 11,000 =$) 1,529,000 victims! The text continues as follows (ibid.):

“2. Sobibor, near Lublin in Poland, I don’t know exactly where. 20 000 killings per day.” (“2. Sobibor, bei Lublin in Polen, ich weiss nicht genau wo. 20 000 Tötungen pro Tag.”)

Evidently the Sobibór Extermination Camp was so secret that even Globocnik, who supervised it, did not know exactly where it was, and that three months after it came into operation! However, the particular efficiency of this camp must be emphasized. Sobibór, which at the time is said to have been equipped with just three gas chambers measuring 4×4 meters,⁵¹ in total ($16 \text{ m}^2 \times 3 =$) 48 m^2 , had in fact an extermination capacity (20,000 per day) which was higher than that of Bełżec (15,000 per day), although Bełżec allegedly had twice as many chambers (six) which were moreover a little larger at 4×5 meters,⁵² resulting in a total floor area of 120 m^2 , hence 150% more capacity than Sobibór.

Gerstein points out that the camp carried out these 20,000 executions a day “roughly since June 1942” (D6.5.45, p. 4), so as of August 17, the death toll must have been somewhere between ($20,000 \times [48 \text{ to } 78 \text{ days}] =$) 960,000 and 1,540,000 victims, but the current orthodox number for the entire existence of the camp is about 300,000 (Bem, pp. 40, 222, 372).

“3. Tréblinka, 120 km NNE from Warsaw in Poland, 25,000 killings per day. Average utilization about 13,500 killings per day since June 1942.” (“3. Tréblinka, 120 km NNO von Warschau in Polen, 25 000 Tötungen pro Tag. Durchschnittliche Ausnutzung etwa 13 500 Tötungen pro Tag seit Juni 1942.”)

Again, Globocnik must have known that Treblinka started operating only on July 23, 1942, not in June. On the day it opened, it had already gassed over 600,000 Jews, if we were to follow Gerstein! Treblinka was no less extraordinary than Sobibór, because, despite having only three gas chambers of $4 \text{ m} \times 4 \text{ m}$, hence the same floor area as Sobibór,⁵³ it inexplicably had a greater daily killing capacity than all the other camps: 25,000 people, compared to Sobibór’s 20,000.

Gerstein lets Globocnik wrap up his summary of the existing killing facilities as follows (ibid.):

“4. Maidaneck [sic] near Lublin. Still under construction back then.” (“Maidaneck [sic] bei Lublin. War damals noch im Aufbau.”)

Here as well, Gerstein confirms that he was quite confused, because he asserted:

⁵³ Ibid., p. 203 (Verdict of the Düsseldorf Jury Court of Sept. 3, 1965).

“In the three camps I visited, on the day of my visit approximately thirty-five thousand Jews died.” (M19.7.45, p. 34: “Dans les trois camps que j’ai visité, il est mort le jour de ma visite environ trente cinq mille Juifs.”)

The camps were “Belcec, Treblinka and Maidanek” (M19.7.45, p. 28). But since Majdanek was still under construction, no extermination could have taken place there. Furthermore, the figure of 35,000 is completely nonsensical, because, even considering the average number of killings of the three active camps, the result would be $(11,000 + 20,000 + 13,500 =) 44,500$. His figure is also irreconcilable with the maximum quantity of the two camps that Gerstein explicitly stated he had visited (although not on the same day), namely Belżec and Treblinka: $(15,000 + 25,000 =) 40,000$. On the other hand, on the day of his visit to Belżec, “only 2 transports with together some 12 500 people arrived in Belcec” (PS-2170, p. 6: “An dem Tage meines Besuches trafen in Belcec nur 2 Transporte mit zusammen ungefähr 12,500 Personen ein”), which further complicates the matter.

As though not satisfied with these contradictions, Gerstein adds more: In D6.5.45, after reporting Globocnik’s speech about the camps “Belcec,” “Sobibor,” “Treblinka” and “Maidanek,” he explains:

In PS-2170, p. 3, he writes, however:

“In the company of the head of all these killing plants, Police Captain Wirth, I thoroughly visited Belcec, Treblinka and Maidanek in operation.” – although the latter was “still under construction” (“Ich habe Belcec, Treblinka und Maidanek in Begleitung des Chefs dieser ganzen Tötungsanlagen, dem Polizeihauptmann Wirth zusammen ausführlich in Betrieb besichtigt.”)

Globocnik then went on to explain his mission to Gerstein:

“Globocnek turned exclusively to me and said: It is your task in particular to carry out the disinfection of the extensive amount of textile goods. The whole collection of textiles was made only to explain the origin of the clothing material for the eastern workers, etc., and to present it as a part of the sacrifice of the German people. In reality, the amount from our installations is 10-20 times the entire collection of textiles.” (T-1310, p. 7: “Globocnek wendete sich ausschliesslich an mich und sagte: Es ist Ihre Aufgabe, insbesondere die Desinfektion des sehr umfangreichen Textilgutes durchzuführen. Die ganze Spinnstoffsammlung ist doch nur durchgeführt worden, um die Herkunft des Bekleidungsmaterials für die Ostarbeiter usw. zu erklären und als ein Teil des Opfers des Deutschen Volkes darzustellen. In Wirklichkeit ist das Aufkommen unserer Anstalten das 10-20 fache der ganzen Spinnstoffsammlung.”)

Gerstein specifies that this collection of textiles amounted to “about 40 million kg = 60 completely full trains” “etwa 40 Millionen kg = 60 komplette Güterzüge voll” (T-1310, p. 8⁵⁴).

From Nuremberg Document NO-1257⁵⁵ we learn that 2,700 tons of collected textiles required 400 railway freight cars. Extrapolating from this, the 40,000 tons mentioned by Gerstein would have required approximately 5,925 freight cars, and since the freight cars were grouped into 60 trains, each train would have had on average 98 freight cars!

Furthermore, since Globocnik’s installations yielded 10 or 20 times more than the entire collection of fabrics with its 40,000 tons, this would have amounted to 400,000-800,000 tons of textiles, or between 59,260 and 118,520 freight cars full. However, on December 15, 1943, Globocnik actually had collected only 1,901 freight cars of “clothing, linen, pillow feathers and rags” (“Bekleidung, Wäsche, Bettfedern und Lumpen”) worth 26 million Reichsmark, which already had been sent to the Reich, and he had a warehouse stock worth another 20 million Reichsmark,⁵⁶ equivalent to about 1,400 freight cars, so that the total amount of collected textiles was about 3,300 freight cars.

It is neither very clear why Globocnik had ordered Gerstein to disinfect these 40,000 tons of clothing, given that Lublin had “laundries and disinfection plants” (T-1310, p. 8: “Wäschereien und Desinfektionsanstalten”), nor how he reconciled this task with the top-secret mission that Gerstein had to carry out and which logically should have had absolute priority. However, as it was “completely impossible” to perform this task, it was ultimately considered sufficient to merely spray the clothing mass with some Detmolin “so that it at least smelled like disinfection” (T-1310, p. 8), but for this there was certainly no need to waste Gerstein’s time. In fact, Detmolin, which exists to this day, is not even a disinfectant but an insecticide developed by the Reich Institute of Biology used for fumigating premises (“Detmolin-Raumverneblung,” Frickhinger, p. 207).

Then Globocnik, always in the presence of Pfannenstiel, revealed his most-important and most-secret mission to Gerstein:

“— Your other, even-more-important task is the conversion of our gas chambers, which now work with Diesel exhaust gases, to a better and faster substance. Here I am thinking above all of hydrogen cyanide.” (T-1310, p. 9: “Ihre andere – noch weit wichtigere Aufgabe ist die Umstellung unserer Gas-

kammern, die jetzt mit Dieselauspuffgasen arbeiten, auf eine bessere und schnellere Sache. Ich denke da vor allem an Blausäure.”)

The whole matter is inconclusive, and so it appeared even to Investigating Judge Mattei, who pressed Gerstein in this regard:

“Q. [Mattei] – If you were to be believed, why were you, while in Berlin, personally chosen to transport cyanide from one point to another on Polish territory?”

A. [Gerstein] – In my opinion, this is due to a happenstance assignment by some leader. My name was put forward by one of the officers of the chemical department which the authority, meaning GUNTHER, had initially approached.

Q. [Mattei] – Why did the authority feel the need to send an officer from Berlin to KOLLIN (Czechoslovakia) to simply take delivery of cyanide and transport it to BELCEC in Poland when it must have seemed easier to him to assign this transport job to an officer already either in Czechoslovakia or in Poland?

A. [Gerstein] – Because I was considered an expert in the use of cyanide for disinfection.” (M19.7.45, pp. 28f.: D. [Mattei] – Pourquoi avez-vous été, si l’on vous croit, personnellement choisi pour, alors que vous vous trouviez à Berlin, effectuer le transport de cyanure d’un point à un autre du territoire polonais ?

R. [Gerstein] - Ceci est, à mon sens, dû au hasard d’une désignation provenant d’un chef quelconque. Mon nom a été mis en avant par un des officiers du service de chimie auquel l’autorité, c’est-à-dire GUNTHER, s’était au début adressée.

D. [Mattei] - Pourquoi l’autorité a-t-elle éprouvé le besoin d’envoyer de Berlin à KOLLIN (Tchécoslovaquie) un officier pour simplement y prendre livraison de cyanure et transporter celui-ci à BELCEC en Pologne alors qu’il aurait dû lui apparaître plus simple de détacher à ce travail de transport un officier se trouvant déjà soit en Tchécoslovaquie, soit en Pologne ?

R. [Gerstein] – Parce qu’on me considérerait comme un spécialiste de l’utilisation du cyanure pour la désinfection.”)

If we consider that the route Berlin-Kolin-Lublin is just over 1,000 km long, as mentioned earlier, Judge Mattei’s questions appear to be completely reasonable, yet Gerstein’s answers were quite foolish: a “specialist in the use of cyanide for disinfection” could be indispensable for the eventual application of the cargo, yet certainly not for its mere transport.

But there is much more to consider. Gerstein in fact stated that in Kolin he had picked up liquid hydrogen cyanide in “forty-five steel bottles” (M19.7.45, p. 28: “quarante cinq bouteilles d’acier”) “upon presentation of my mission order and requisition voucher issued by the central Security Service in Berlin” (M19.7.45, p. 29: “au vu de mon ordre de mission et d’un bon de réquisition délivré par le service central de sécurité à Berlin (Reichssicherheitshaupt- amt).”), therefore by order of the RSHA, and with this cargo he had to travel in August 1942 the approximately 730 km that separate Kolin from Lublin.

This colossal nonsense alone is enough to undermine the entire “Gerstein Report.”

Since the early 1920s, liquid hydrogen cyanide for disinfestation purposes was no longer in use in Germany due to the introduction of the “vat procedure” (“Bottich-Verfahren”) and later the invention of Zyklon B (Lenz/Gassner, pp. 8-10), which is well-known to consist of liquid hydrogen cyanide infused in an inert carrier material, in Europe initially consisting of diatomaceous earth (Diagrieß), which was replaced by gypsum granules during the 1930s (Erco-Würfel; NI-9912).

Due to its low boiling point and the possibility of potentially explosive decomposition (polymerization), liquid hydrogen cyanide could only be transported refrigerated (“unter Kühlung”), at night and with a special vehicle (“mit besonderem Fuhrwerk”; Rüter et al., p. 137). Zyklon B, on the other hand, while maintaining the toxicity of liquid hydrogen cyanide unaltered, reduced the risks of transport and use considerably (ibid.).

Before the invention of Zyklon B, liquid hydrogen cyanide for disinfestation purposes was packaged in steel cylinders. During application, it was nebulized using compressed air or evaporated by heating the cylinders, then ducted through special pipes or hoses. Both procedures were dangerous (Lenz/Gassner, pp. 8f.). Hydrogen cyanide in glass bottles (Blausäureflaschen), used mainly in France and its colonies and also in England, followed the so-called “Galardi procedure,” which consisted in the pouring of liquid hydrogen cyanide from a glass bottle into a bowl or directly onto the floor (Peters, pp. 54f.), which was evidently totally unfeasible for gassing people.

Another surprising fact is that Gerstein was indeed a pest-control specialist. SS Hauptsturmführer of the reserve Walter Dötzer wrote in the preface to an important book on this subject published in 1943 by the Hygiene Institute of the Waffen SS (Dötzer, p. II):

“At this point I would like to express my gratitude to SS-Obersturmführer (F) Dipl. Ing. Gerstein for his advice on all technical questions.”

Precisely for this reason, Gerstein acted as an intermediary between the company that supplied Zyklon B and the concentration camps to which it was delivered. The group of documents classified PS-1553 includes 12 invoices for Zyklon B by the “Deutsche Gesellschaft für Schädlingsbekämpfung” (DE-GESCH; German Agency for Pest Control) addressed to SS Obersturmführer Kurt Gerstein, Berlin, Leipzigerstrasse 31/32; these invoices run from April 30 to May 31, 1944 and concern supplies of 1,185 kg of Zyklon B to the Oranienburg Camp and the same amount to the Auschwitz Camp.⁵⁷ On May 5,

1945, Gerstein had handed over these invoices at a hotel in Rottweil, together with his typed report of April 26, 1945, to two members of the Allied secret services, Major D.C. Evans and Mr. J.W. Haught. Yet Gerstein never even mentioned Zyklon B as part of his claimed ultra-secret mission!

The whole story appears even more surreal from the fact that no later than August 6, 1942, the company Tesch & Stabenow had delivered 360 cans of Zyklon B of 1.5 kg each, hence a total of 540 kg of hydrogen cyanide, to the administration of the Lublin-Majdanek Camp.⁵⁸ Since Gerstein had to go to Lublin, he easily could have taken along these Zyklon-B cans, and then continued on to Bełżec. One cannot seriously believe that the RSHA's procedures were so foolish.

In the official document of the 2nd Office of the French 1st Army, pp. 1f., Gerstein, who never ceases to amaze with his contradictions, set out another version of his mission:

"I understood my mission, adds Gerstein. I was asked to find a faster and more effective means of annihilation than this primitive extermination. I proposed the use of toxic gases, and in particular those releasing hydrogen cyanide." (K.: "Je comprenais ma mission, ajoute Gerstein. On me demandait de découvrir un moyen de suppression plus rapide et plus efficace que cette extermination d'un genre primitif. Je proposai l'utilisation de gaz toxiques, et notamment de ceux que dégage l'acide prussique.")

Therefore, he claims to have been asked to look for, and that he then eventually found, the very lethal substance that Globocnik had suggested to him during his initial meeting, and which by then had already been ordered by the RSHA.

Globocnik's speech continued like this, or so Gerstein want us to believe:

"The day before yesterday the Fuehrer and Himmler were here. On their instruction, I have to take you there personally; I am not supposed to issue any written certificates or admission passes. – Pfannenstiel then asked: What did the Fuehrer say? – Glob.: Faster, carry out the whole action faster. His companion, Ministerialrat Dr. Herbert Lindner then asked: Mr. Globocnek, do you consider it good and proper to bury all the corpses instead of burning them? A generation could come after us that doesn't understand the whole thing! – To this Glb.: Gentlemen, if ever a generation should come after us that is so nerveless and so spineless that it does not understand our great task, then all of National Socialism has been in vain. On the contrary, I am of the opinion that bronze plaques should be sunk [buried] on which it is recorded that we, we had the courage to carry out this great and so-necessary work!– To this the Führer: Good, Globocnek, that is certainly my opinion too!" (T-1309, p. 9: "Vorgestern waren der Fuehrer und Himmler hier. Auf ihre Anweisung muss ich Sie persönlich dorthin bringen, ich soll niemand schriftliche Bescheinigungen und Einlasskarten ausstellen. – Darauf fragte Pfannenstiel: Was hat denn der Führer gesagt? – Glob.: Schneller, schneller die ganze Aktion durchführen. Sein Begleiter, der Ministerialrat Dr. Herbert Lindner hat dann gefragt: Herr Globocnek, halten Sie es für gut und richtig, die ganzen Leichen zu vergraben, anstatt sie zu verbrennen? Nach uns könnte eine Generation kommen, die das ganze nicht versteht! – Darauf Glb.: Meine Herren, wenn je nach uns eine Generation kommen sollte, die so schlapp und so knochenweich ist, dass sie unsere grosse Aufgabe nicht versteht, dann allerdings ist der ganze Nationalsozialismus umsonst gewesen. Ich bin im Gegenteil der Ansicht, dass man Bronzetafeln versenken sollte, auf denen festgehalten ist, dass wir, wir den Mut gehabt haben, dieses grosse und so notwendige Werk durchzuführen. – Darauf der Führer: Gut, Globocnek, das ist allerdings auch meine Ansicht!”)

⁵⁸ Letter by Tesch & Stabenow to KGL Lublin of July 29, 1942, and letter of the KGL Lublin to Tesch & Stabenow of August 22, 1942. It states there that the 360 cans of Zyklon B were delivered with Invoice No. 1738, and paid on August 6. APM, sygn. I, d. 2, Vol. 1, pp. 99, 107.

In an unpublished paper on the Bełżec Camp, Michael Tregenza reports an informed opinion of Gerald Fleming, who had studied the matter thoroughly. He concluded:⁵⁹

“The claims made in Lublin on 17 August 1942 by the SS and Police Leader, Lublin, SS-Brigadier Odilo Globocnik, to his subaltern, SS-Lieutenant Kurt Gerstein, about Hitler’s visit to Lublin and relating to the ‘Final Solution’, made by him, Globocnik, to Adolf Hitler on that occasion, are proved to have been a sheer invention and mendacious boasting by Globocnik to Gerstein.”

The final explanation is actually a simple paralogism, because there is actually no documentary evidence that Gerstein had ever actually met Globocnik (Pfannenstiel’s very-late “confirmation” is as valid as Gerstein’s statement, i.e. not at all). Furthermore, assuming for the moment without conceding that the meeting actually took place, nothing proves that Gerstein reported Globocnik’s exact words, and that Gerstein himself did not invent the whole speech.

It can be added that this explanation is also ridiculous, because no person in their right mind can believe that an SS Brigadeführer, that is, a brigadier general is said to have been engaged in false and foolish boasting in front of an SS Obersturmführer, a lieutenant (in charge of the top-secret mission).

From these considerations, it is apparent that Gerstein constantly makes Globocnik look like a fool capable of uttering only nonsense. Hence, it can be considered certain that the entire story of this meeting in Lublin was invented by Gerstein.

This is also evidenced by what he stated about this to the French military investigators:

“In Lublin I was received by SS General Globocnek and his deputy, SS Colonel Wirth, who informed me that Hitler and Himmler had recently visited the three experimental asphyxiation stations of Belcic, Sobidor and Treblinca [sic].” (K, p. 1: “A Lublin je fus reçu par le Général S.S. Globocnec et son adjoint, le colonel S.S. Wirth, qui m’apprirent qu’Hitler et Himmler avaient visité la vieille les trois stations expérimentales d’asphixie de Belcic, de Sobidor et de Treblinca [sic].”)

Needless to say, there is no evidence of such visits by Himmler and Hitler, and no historian has ever claimed otherwise.

Next, Gerstein introduces another contradiction, because the proposal to bury the “bronze plaques” was no longer made by Globocnik, but by Hitler himself:

“Hitler himself, when visiting Belcic, had said: ‘We will bury bronze plaques here so that our descendants know about our work of biologically cleansing the planet.’” (K, p. 2: “Hitler lui-même, visitant Belcic, avait dit: ‘Nous enterrons ici des plaques de bronze afin que nos descendants connaissent notre oeuvre d’assainissement biologique de la planète.’”)

And here is Gerstein’s final comment on the matter:

“The other view later prevailed. The corpses were then burned on large grates improvised from railroad tracks with the help of gasoline and Diesel oil.” (T-1310, pp. 9f.: “Später hat sich die andere Ansicht durchgesetzt. Die Leichen sind dann auf grossen Rosten, die aus Eisenbahnschienen improvisiert wurden, verbrannt worden unter Zuhilfenahme von Benzin und Dieselöl.”)

Since Gerstein never returned to Belżec (nor to any of the other camps; M19.7.45, p. 32), and because the alleged extermination of the Jews was a state secret, so secret that “no more than 4-5 others have seen” these things (PS-1553, p. 13⁶⁰), one must ask from whom he received the information of what happened in those camps later.

The next day, Gerstein traveled to Belżec, accompanied by Globocnik and inexplicably together with Pfannenstiel (who, it needs repeating, had absolutely nothing to do with this top-secret mission). Globocnik introduced him to SS Hauptsturmführer (captain) Obermeyer – a non-existent character; the real one should have been SS Hauptscharführer (master sergeant) Oberhauser – who showed him the gassing installation, to whose claimed structure I will return in detail in Chapter 4.2.

What can be said here already is that the building consisted of six gas chambers, arranged on both sides of a central corridor. This figure appears in all the various versions of the report, except in that of the French military justice:

⁶⁰ PS-1553 contains a handwritten note by Gerstein in English on pages 13f., also dated April 26, 1945.

These rooms measured at the same time 5 m × 5 m (PS-2170, p. 4; T-1310, p. 11) and 5 m × 4 m (PS-1553, p. 5). In this version, these 4×5-meter chambers are 1.90 meters high, but inexplicably have a surface area of 25 square meters and a volume of 45 cubic meters (PS-1553, p. 5 and 6), which doesn't match either of these sizes: (4 m × 5 m × 1.90 m =) 38 m³; (5 m × 5 m × 1.90 m =) 47.5 m³. I will return to the question of the Diesel engine later as well.

Continuing his narration, Gerstein writes:

"The other morning just before seven it is announced: The first transport arrives in ten minutes!" (T-1310, p. 11: "Am anderen Morgen um kurz vor sieben Uhr kündigte man an: In zehn Minuten kommt der erste Transport!")

This is the day of the famous gassing, but what day is it? It is impossible to say, because Gerstein's chronology is totally screwed up.

He provides two precise dates, which can be taken as reference points: August 17, the day of his arrival in Lublin, and August 19, the day of his arrival in Treblinka (see below).

And here are his two conflicting chronologies:

- PS-2170: on August 17, 1942, Gerstein is in Lublin (p. 3); "the next day" ("am nächsten Tage") he travels to Bełżec (p. 4): August 18. "The other morning" ("am anderen Morgen") the gassing takes place (p. 4): presumably August 19. "On the next day, August 19" ("am nächsten Tage, den 19. August") he goes to Treblinka (p. 7). That would have been August 20, however. This chronology can also be found in T-1310.
- PS-1553: On August 17, he is in Lublin (p. 5); "the other day" ("l'autre jour") at Bełżec (p. 5): August 18. "The other morning" ("autre matin") the gassing takes place (p. 5): August 19. "The other day" ("autre jour") the pits are covered with sand (p. 7): August 20. "The other day" ("autre jour") Gerstein goes to Treblinka (p. 7): August 21.

Hence, Gerstein went to Treblinka either on August 19, 20 or 21, and one of the consequences of his contradictions, the most paradoxical one, is that the gassing day fits in nowhere, because he went to Bełżec on August 18, the day when he did not see any dead (= gassed) people ("I saw no dead that day," T-1310, p. 10: "Ich sah an diesem Tag keine Toten,"), and on August 19, which is supposedly the day after the gassing, he went to Treblinka.

Another surprising fact is that the gassing took place at the same time in Bełżec and in Lublin, as shown by the interrogation by Commandant Beckhardt:⁶¹

"D. How long did you stay in these camps and then did you visit others?"

A. Only three days, then I was taken to Lublin, where SS Hauptsturmführer Obermeyer (originally from Pirmasens) showed me around the facility."

⁶¹ A brief description of the killing of the victims follows.

(B26.6.45, p. 3; Chelain 1986, p. 173: “D. Combien de temps êtes-vous resté dans ces camps et en avez vous visité d’autres?”

R. Seulement trois jours, puis l’on me conduisit à Lublin, où le SS Hauptsturmführer Obermeyer (originaire de Pirmasens) me fit visiter l’installation.”)

Therefore, Gerstein spent three days at the Globocnik camps, but at the same time two days:

“I specify that my visits took place on August 17 and 18, 1942.” (M19.7.45, p. 34: “Je précise que mes visites ont eu lieu les 17 et 18 août 1942.”)

This further complicates Gerstein’s already-contradictory chronology. But that’s not enough yet, because elsewhere Gerstein stated that his trip had lasted a total of “about two weeks” (M19.7.45, p. 29: “environ deux semaines”), from which it must be deduced that – if the visit to Globocnik’s camps lasted only three days – that it took Gerstein eleven days to travel from Berlin to Kolin, then to Lublin, to Bełżec, to Treblinka, and then to return to Berlin via Warsaw by train (see below).

Back to Gerstein’s narrative. A few minutes after the announcement of the first transport, according to Gerstein’s account, the first train arrived from Lemberg:

“45 cars with 6,700 people, 1,450 of whom were already dead upon their arrival.” (T-1310, p. 11: “45 Waggonen mit 6.700 Menschen, von denen 1450 schon tot waren bei ihrer Ankunft.”; also PS-1553, p. 6; PS-2170, p. 4)

As noted earlier, this is impossible, because the spur inside the camp (about 260 meters long) was too short to accommodate a train of 45 railway cars ($11.08 \text{ m} \times 45 = \text{about } 498 \text{ meters}$ without the locomotive).

Holocaust historiography knows absolutely nothing about this transport. Kuwałek mentions it under the date of 18 August with reference to a book by Alexander Kruglow (Kuwałek, p. 242). In his Chronicle of the Holocaust in Ukraine 1941-1945 we read under the date of August 18, 1942 that a train of 45 wagons with 6,700 Jews arrived in Bełżec on that day, of which 1,450 had already died on arrival (Kruglow 2004, p. 118):

The author does not indicate any source, but it is all too evident that this is based on Gerstein. None of these talented historians noticed, however, that Gerstein mentioned two transports for this with 12,500 deportees altogether, therefore one of 6,700 deportees, the other of 5,800.

After the train arrived, 200 Ukrainians threw open the doors of the cars and whipped the deportees out of them. A large loudspeaker ordered the Jews to undress completely and to hand over their valuables at the appropriate counter. Gerstein continues:

“A little Jewish boy gets a handful of strings pressed under his arm, which the three-year-old child pensively hands out to the people: To tie the shoes! – Because in the heap of a height of 35 or 40 meters, nobody would have been able to find the matching shoes later.” (PS-2170, p. 4: “Ein kleines Judenbübchen kriegt eine Hand voll Bindfäden unter den Arm gedrückt, die das dreijährige Kind versonnen an die Leute austeilte: Zum Zusammenbinden der Schuhe! – Denn in dem Haufen von 35 oder 40 Metern Höhe hätte keiner nachher die passenden Schuhe wieder zusammenfinden können.”)

There is no need to comment on this nonsense: a 3-year-old child who distributes strings to $(6,700 - 1,450 =) 5,250$ people, and mountains of shoes 35-40 meters high! Not even in this regard does Gerstein abstain from his habitual contradictions, because elsewhere he claimed that the pile of shoes was 25 meters high:

Gerstein does not explain whether these 25-, 35- or 40-meter-high shoe piles were created with a crane or with special shoe catapults.

Once the preliminary operations – handing over any valuables, undressing, hair cutting of the women – were completed, the gassing began. Gerstein joined Polizeihauptmann (police captain) Wirth, who was also a colonel (K, p. 1), “up on the ramp between the death chambers” (PS-2170, p. 4: “oben auf der Rampe zwischen den Todeskammern”).

The Jews began to march by them, making senseless statements:

“Some turn to me, O Sir, do help us, do help us.” (PS-2170, p. 5: “Manche wenden sich an mich O Herr, helfen Sie uns doch, helfen Sie uns doch.”)

Since Gerstein was an “SS officer in uniform” (PS-2170, p. 5: “uniformierten SS-Offizier”), we must assume that these Jews had noticed the benevolent face of this “good Nazi”!

Many Jews prayed, while others called out:

Joffroy commented (Joffroy, Note 1, p. 153):

“There is no Jewish rite of water – but the deceased must be washed thoroughly before being placed in the burial garment.”

However, these Jews did not ask for water for ablution, but explicitly for death.

The killing procedure continued like this in Gerstein’s account:

“The chambers fill up. Squeeze together well, that’s what Captain Wirth ordered. People stand on each other’s feet, 700-800 people on 25 square meters in 45 cubic meters.” (PS-2170, p. 5: “Die Kammern füllen sich. Gut vollpacken, so hat es der Hauptmann Wirth befohlen. Die Menschen stehen einander auf den Füßen, 700-800 Menschen auf 25 Quadratmetern in 45 Kubikmetern.”)

This is one of the best-known absurdities of the Gerstein Report: the claimed packing density of 28-32 people per square meter. No Holocaust historian ever took this enormity seriously; some falsified the floor area of the chambers,⁶² others the number of people.⁶³

Adalbert Rückerl presented Gerstein’s passage unaltered without comment (Rückerl, p. 64), although the verdict of the Oberhauser Trial dated January 21, 1965, on which he relied otherwise, stated that the gassing building could hold a total of 1,500 people (ibid., p. 133), hence only 250 people in each chamber.

But even those who recognize the absurdity of Gerstein’s statements cannot escape its insanity. An example is Uwe Dietrich Adam, who commented (Adam, Note 85, p. 260):

“Gerstein’s indications as to the number of victims killed at Belzec are so implausible that a layman can immediately recognize it: he speaks of 700 to 800 people gassed in a room of 25 m². Faurisson, op. cit., uses this absurd error to cast doubt on Gerstein’s testimony as a whole. But an error of this type on the contrary reinforces the credibility and good faith of the story.”

That an absurdity can strengthen the credibility of a statement is blatant nonsense, and in this specific case it was moreover uttered in bad faith, because in Gerstein’s narrative this is not at all an “error,” but an observation corroborated by his calculation – which are meant to support his claims, but are just as absurd and contradictory. Here are the related texts:

1. “I calculate roughly: average weight at most 35 kg, more than half are children, specific weight 1, i.e. 25,250 kg. People per chamber, Wirth is right, if the SS helps out a little, 750 people can be accommodated in 45 cubic meters!” (PS-2170, p. 5: “Ich überschlage: Durchschnittsgewicht höchstens 35 kg, mehr als die Hälfte sind Kinder, spez. Gewicht 1, also 25 250 kg. Menschen pro Kammer, Wirth hat recht, wenn die SS etwas nachhilft, kann man 750 Menschen in 45 Kubikmetern unterbringen!”).
2. “I recapitulate, more than half are children, average weight at most 30 kgs. Specific weight 1, so 25,250 kgs of men per room.” (D6.5.45, p. 7: “Je récapitule” tule, plus de la moitié sont des enfants, poids moyen au maximum 30 kgs. Poids spécifique 1, donc 25.250 kgs d'homme par chambre.”)

3. “The weight of each man being 65 kgs, our rooms can accommodate 25,250 kgs of human beings each. With a little goodwill, we obtained an honest average of 750 people per ‘operation’.” (K, p. 1: “Le poids de chaque homme étant de 65 kgs, nos chambres peuvent recevoir 25.250 kgs d’êtres humains chacune. Avec un peu de bonne volonté, nous obtenions une honnête moyenne de 750 personnes par ‘opération’.”).

Thus, the average weight of the victims was at the same time 35, 30 and 65 kg, but the total weight of 750 people was always 25,250 kg, a figure that does not even correspond to the first case, because (35 kg × 750 =) 26,250 kg.

The story told by Gerstein contains further inconsistencies and absurdities. First of all, incomprehensibly, only 4 chambers were filled:

“Up to this moment, the people in these 4 chambers are alive, 4 times 750 people in 4 times 45 cubic meters!” (T-1310, pp. 14f.: “Bis zu diesem Augenblick leben die Menschen in diesen 4 Kammern, 4 mal 750 Menschen in 4 mal 45 Kubikmetern!”, similar PS-2170, p. 6)

Which implies that the remaining two chambers were left empty. Next, due to the malfunctioning Diesel engine (I will return to this in Part 4), the actual gassing began only two hours and 49 minutes after the gas chambers had been closed, and it took another 32 minutes of gassing before the victims actually died (PS-2170, p. 6; PS-1553, p. 7; T-1310, p. 15). After accurately noting the time when the engine started, Gerstein began recording the gassing time with the same diligence:

Hence, all the victims were still alive while waiting for the engine to start; on the other hand, Gerstein also writes the exact opposite elsewhere:

“In Belcec I had the impression that on the day of the inspection, after waiting so long in the chambers, everyone was really dead.” (PS-2170, p. 9: “Ich hatte in Belcec den Eindruck, daß am Besichtigungstage nach so langem Warten in den Kammern wirklich alle Menschen tot waren.”)

This event also has its contradictory version:

“Inside the huts, the men were still alive! I timed the duration of the torture: fifty, sixty minutes! The first dead fell. Ten more minutes passed. Finally, it was over!” (K, p. 1: “A l’intérieur des baraques, les hommes étaient toujours vivants! Je chronométrais la durée du supplice: cinquante, soixante minutes!

Les premiers morts tombèrent. Dix minutes passèrent encore. Enfin, ce fut fini!”)

In Gerstein’s crazy reality, 750 people occupying a volume of 25,250 liters remained alive for 2 hours and 49 minutes in a hermetically sealed gas chamber of 45 cubic meters. This means that the total air availability was $(45,000 - 25,250 =) 19,750$ liters and $(19,750 \div 750 =)$ about 26 liters per person, which, at 21% oxygen in the air, amounts to only 5.5 liters of oxygen per person. At a normal breathing rate, this is enough oxygen for only a few minutes. Hence, if we believed Gerstein’s insane numbers, 750 people locked up in an airtight room of just 45 m³ most certainly would have died from asphyxiation long before being gassed.

Even if we reduce the number of victims in each chamber to 250, as claimed by the verdict of the Oberhauser Trial, and assume an average mass of the victims of just 35 kg (and thus just as many liters in volume), this still results in an air volume of only $[45,000 - (35 \text{ L} \times 250) =]$ 36,250 liters, or 145 liters per person, which doesn’t get the locked-up victims much longer to breathe than 10 minutes either.

While the gassing was taking place, those who had not entered the chambers, 2,250 people according to Gerstein,⁶⁴ awaited their fate in the open. Here, Gerstein provides another proof of his profound sagacity:

“Meanwhile the others wait outside naked. In the meantime, the second transport has arrived as well. I was told: of course naked also in winter, or in cold weather! Well, but they can catch their death! – I say, although I am otherwise careful, do not ask any questions at all, pretend to be disinterested, but these words slip out of my mouth – ‘Yes, that is what they are actually here for! – an SS man tells me in his dialect.’” (PS-2170, p. 5: “Währenddessen warten die anderen draussen im Freien nackt. Inzwischen ist auch der zweite Transport eingetroffen. Man sagte mir selbstverständlich auch im Winter, oder bei kaltem Wetter nackt! Ja, aber sie können sich ja den Tod holen! – sage ich, der ich sonst vorsichtig bin, überhaupt nichts frage, uninteressiert tue, dies Wort rutscht mir raus – ‘Ja grad für das sind se ja doh! – sagt mir ein SS-Mann darauf in seinem Platt.’”)

Hence, while 3,000 people were about to be gassed, and all the others were waiting to follow their fate, Gerstein wants us to believe that he worried about their health while standing in the cold!

On the other hand, given that the camp had been opened practically at the beginning of spring and it was August, how could the victims ever have been found waiting outdoors “in winter”?

Returning to the gassing, Gerstein observed: “The first dead fell” (K, p. 1), but at the same time they remained standing:

⁶⁴ 6,700 deportees – 1,450 dead deportees on arrival – $[750 \times 4] = 2,250$ people.

“Like columns of basalt the dead are still standing, since there was not the slightest room to fall or bend over.” (PS-1553, p. 7: “Comme des colonnes de Basalte les morts sont encore debout, étant pas la moindre place de tomber ou de s’incliner.” PS-2170, p. 6: “Wie Basaltsäulen stehen die Toten aneinandengepreßt in den Kammern. Es wäre auch kein Platz hinzufallen oder auch nur sich vorüberzuneigen.”)

After the gassing was over, the men of the “labor commando,” Jews forced into this service, began to empty the gas chambers. Two dozen dentists examined the mouths of the corpses for gold teeth, which they extracted with pincers and hammers.

“Some of the workers check genitals for gold, spectacles and valuables.” (PS-2170, p. 6: “Einige der Arbeiter kontrollieren Genitalien nach Gold, Brillen und Wertsachen.”)

Instead of “Brillen” (“spectacles”), Gerstein evidently meant “Brillanten” here (brilliant, i.e. cut diamonds), a term he used correctly three lines later, but there is not just a considerable spelling difference between the two words, but above all a drastically different meaning. Such a mistake could not escape a mentally lucid person.

The corpses were then loaded onto wooden stretchers (Holztragen; T-1310, p. 16) and at the same time onto wooden carts (Holzwagen; PS-2170, p. 6) and thrown into pits measuring 100 m × 20 m × 12 m (ibid.).

Gerstein saw Jewish workers working in mass graves. This happened in Bełżec, but at the same time in Treblinka:

“In one such place, I saw Jews climbing around on the corpses in the graves and working.” (T-1310, pp. 16f.: “Ich sah an einer solchen Stelle Juden in den Gräbern auf den Leichen herumklettern und arbeiten.”)

“The other day, I saw in Treblinks [sic] a large number of workers who were clambering about on corpses in the graves.” (PS-2170, p. 7: “In Treblinks [sic] sah ich am anderen Tage eine größere Anzahl Arbeiter, die in den Gräbern auf Leichen herumturnten.”)

In Bełżec and Treblinka, Gerstein wrote, the victims had not been counted exactly, but he knew – it is unknown on what basis – that the number was 25,000,000:

“Not only Jews, but mostly Poles and Czechs, biologically worthless in the opinion of the Nazis.” (PS-1553, p. 7: “Pas juifs, seulement, mais en préférence des Polonais et Tchèque biologiquement sans valeurs selon opinion des Nazis.”)

At the same time, the victims were around (or “at least”) 20,000,000 “according to my secure documents,” and concerned the total number of people killed by order of Hitler and Himmler (D6.5.45, pp. 8f.; PS-2170, p. 7).

The conclusion of Gerstein’s mission is even more senseless than its beginning, as is evident from Judge Mattei’s interrogation:

“Q. [Mattei] – To whom did you report on the completion of your mission?”

A. [Gerstein] – When I returned to Berlin from a trip that lasted about two weeks, I did not report to anyone about the completion of my mission. No one asked me about anything.” (M19.7.45, p. 29: “D. [Mattei] – A qui avez-vous rendu compte de l’exécution de votre mission?”

R. [Gerstein] – A mon retour à Berlin d’un voyage qui a duré environ deux semaines, je n’ai rendu compte à quiconque de l’exécution de ma mission. Personne ne m’a demandé quoi que ce soit.”)

This singular way of dealing with state secrets by the RSHA did not convince the judge, who insisted:

“Q. [Mattei] – You had been given a mission. You tell us that you did not fulfill it. You also tell us that the commandant of the camp where you had to fulfill this mission did not want you to fulfill it at all. You said this morning that, when you returned to Berlin, you did not report the outcome of your mission to anyone. We have every reason to believe that such things were not exactly standard practice in the German military. Explain yourself about this.

A. [Gerstein] – The day after my arrival at the BELCEC camp, the real camp commandant returned – the polizei Hauptmann WIRTH, who had a big influence in Berlin, and who settled this matter without my having to intervene.” (M19.7.45, p. 31: “D. [Mattei] – Vous avez été chargé d’une mission. Vous nous dites ne point l’avoir remplie. Vous nous dites également que le commandant du camp où vous devez remplir cette mission ne tenait pas du tout à ce que vous la remplissiez. Vous avez ce matin déclaré qu’à votre retour à Berlin vous n’aviez rendu compte à quiconque du résultat de votre mission. Nous avons tout lieu de penser que des choses pareilles n’étaient pas précisément en usage dans l’armée allemande. Expliquez-vous à ce sujet.

R. [Gerstein] – Le lendemain de mon arrivée au camp de BELCEC est revenu le véritable commandant du camp – le hauptmann polizei WIRTH, qui avait une grosse influence à Berlin et qui a liquidé cette question sans que j’aie à intervenir.”)

Even less convinced, Mattei pressed further:

“Q. [Mattei] – So, by your own admission, you had received an important mission in Berlin in your capacity as a technician; this mission was so important that you had to carry it out as a state secret; you visited three camps, you were received by a general who, given the purpose of your mission, thought it his duty to relate to you the very words of the two great Nazi leaders. How can you persist in making us believe:

- 1) that you did not fulfill the very purpose of your mission;*
- 2) that you did not report to anyone about it;*
- 3) that no one asked you anything about it either?*

A. [Gerstein] – The Hauptmann WIRTH had such a personal position with HITLER and HIMMLER that he was able to tell me not to worry about this matter anymore, and under these circumstances I complied. That’s all I have to say.” (M19.7.45, p. 32: “D. [Mattei] – Vous avez donc, de votre propre aveu, reçu à Berlin une mission importante et ce en votre qualité de technicien; cette mission était si importante que vous deviez l’accomplir comme un secret d’Etat; vous avez visité trois camps, vous avez été reçu en audience par un général qui, étant donné le but de votre mission, a cru devoir vous rapporter les propos mêmes des deux grands chefs nazis. Comment pouvez-vous persister à nous faire croire :

- 1) que vous n’avez pas rempli le but même de votre mission;
- 2) que vous n’avez rendu compte à personne de celle-ci;
- 3) que personne ne vous a non plus rien demandé à ce sujet.

R. [Gerstein] – Le hauptmann WIRTH avait une telle position personnelle auprès de HITLER et de HIMMLER qu’il a pu me dire de ne plus m’occuper de cette affaire et dans cette condition je lui ai obéi. Voilà ce que j’ai à répondre.”)

This defense, however, was refuted by Gerstein himself, who became entangled in further contradictions:

“Wirth asked me not to suggest, in Berlin, any changes to the gas chambers and killing methods generally used so far, since everything had proved itself perfectly and is working out well. Strangely enough, I was never asked about anything in this regard in Berlin.” (PS-2170, p. 7: “Wirth bat mich in Berlin keinerlei Änderung der bisher üblichen Gaskammern und Tötungsmethoden vorzuschlagen, da sich ja alles bestens bewährt und eingespielt habe. Ich bin merkwürdigerweise in Berlin nie nach derartigem gefragt worden.”)

It is not clear how Wirth could have asked Gerstein not to suggest any changes when back in Berlin, and in particular to Wirth’s immediate superior, Globocnik, who, after all, had ordered Gerstein specifically to suggest such changes. That Wirth did not have much leverage with Himmler is shown by the fact that he feared Gerstein as if he were his superior:

“The Hauptmann Wirth arrives. It shows that he is afraid, because I see the disaster.” (PS-1553, p. 6: “Le hauptmann Wirth arrive. On voit, il a peur, parceque moi, je vois le désastre.”)

What Gerstein said about the 100 or 260 kg of hydrogen cyanide or potassium cyanide is even more contradictory:

“I fulfilled my mission in August 1942, that is to say, I transported the cyanide, indeed, but the cyanide did not reach its destination. Initially, the cyanide was placed in forty-five steel bottles. Along the way one of them was emptied by me with all the necessary precautions because it was dangerous. The forty-four bottles that remained were not taken to the BELCEC camp but were hidden by the driver and myself about twelve hundred meters away from the camp.” (M19.7.45, p. 28: “Je remplis ma mission au mois d’août 1942, c’est-à-dire que je transportai bien le cyanure mais le cyanure n’arriva pas à destination. Au départ, le cyanure était placé en quarante cinq bouteilles d’acier.

En cours de route l'une d'elles fut vidée par mes soins avec toutes les précautions voulues car c'était dangereux. Les quarante quatre bouteilles qui restaient n'ont pas été amenées au camp de BELCEC mais furent dissimulées par le chauffeur et moi-même à douze cents mètres environ du camp.").

"I arrived with the cyanide at the camp and told the camp commandant what had happened to me along the way with regard to the bottle, which had not been closed properly. I told the camp commandant about the danger of using cyanide, letting him know that I could not take responsibility for using the cyanide I had brought. This commandant was an uneducated man and contented himself with my explanations, also saying that he was satisfied with the extermination system in use." (M19.7.45, p. 31: "Je suis arrivé avec le cyanure au camp et j'ai raconté au commandant du camp ce qui m'était arrivé en cours de route au sujet de la bouteille dont la fermeture n'avait pas été bien assurée. J'ai indiqué au commandant du camp le danger que présentait l'emploi du cyanure en lui faisant connaître que je ne pouvais prendre sur ma responsabilité l'emploi du cyanure que j'avais apporté. Ce commandant était un homme peu cultivé et s'est contenté de mes explications, disant par ailleurs être satisfait du système d'extermination en usage."))

Hence, Gerstein had brought the cyanide to the camp, and at the same time he hid it 1,200 meters away from the camp. Judge Mattei challenged this contradiction:

"This morning you told us that forty-four cyanide bottles – your entire load, one of the bottles having been emptied – had not arrived at the BELCEC Camp because they had been hidden by the driver and yourself at about twelve hundred meters away from the camp; just now you just told us that you arrived at the camp with your load. When are you telling the truth?

A. [Gerstein] – I arrived at the camp without the cyanide, but the camp commandant knew that I had brought some in the car which had remained twelve hundred meters away from the camp." (M19.7.45, p. 31: "Ce matin vous nous avez déclaré que quarante quatre bouteilles de cyanure – votre entier chargement, une des bouteilles ayant été vidée – n'étaient pas arrivées au camp de BELCEC car elles avaient été dissimulées par le chauffeur et vous-même à douze cents mètres environ du camp ; tout à l'heure, vous venez de nous dire être arrivé au camp avec votre chargement. Quand dites-vous la vérité?

R. [Gerstein] – Je suis arrivé au camp sans le cyanure mais le commandant du camp savait que j'en avais apporté dans la voiture qui était restée à douze cents mètres du camp.").

Consequently, Gerstein arrived with, and without, the cyanide bottles at the camp, and hid them – yet did not hide them – 1,200 meters away from it, or else he parked his car more than a kilometer away from the camp and walked up to the camp rather than driving right up to it. Furthermore, he could not have hidden the "cyanide" bottles, because he entered Belžec, coming from

Lublin, not with a car or truck driven by an anonymous driver who alone knew their destination, but with Wirth's car:

"The next day, we drove to Belcec in Captain Wirth's car." (PS-2170, p. 4: "Am nächsten Tage fuhren wir mit dem Auto des Hauptmann Wirth nach Belcec.")

This issue is somewhat confused, because Gerstein also stated that Wirth wasn't even there when he arrived at Bełżec:

"Since the actual chief of the entire killing facility, Police Captain Wirth, was not there, Globocnik introduced me to SS Hauptsturmführer Obermeyer (from Pirmasens)" (T-1310, p. 10: "Da der eigentliche Chef der gesamten Tötungsanlagen, der Polizeihauptmann Wirth, noch nicht da war, stellte Globocnik mich dem SS-Hauptsturmführer Obermeyer (aus Pirmasens) vor.")

But that's not true either, because Gerstein also claimed that in Lublin he was received "by SS General Globocnik and his deputy SS Colonel Wirth" (K, p. 1: "Je fus reçu par le Général S.S. Globocnik et son adjoint, le colonel S.S. Wirth"), and then he drove to Bełżec in Wirth's car, but evidently and strangely enough without its owner. In this case, it would have transported Gerstein and Pfannenstiel (and maybe the anonymous driver). Globocnik would have traveled in the same car or escorted it in his own. In any case, Gerstein could not have hidden the cyanide from Globocnik and/or Wirth before entering the camp.

The visit to Treblinka further disrupts Gerstein's disconnected narrative. First of all, Globocnik had to personally accompany any visitors to each individual extermination camp, because he could not "issue any written certificates or admission passes," and for this very reason he accompanied Gerstein (and Pfannenstiel) to Bełżec. This means that Gerstein could not have entered Treblinka without Globocnik's personal presence. Hence, there are two possibilities: either Globocnik returned to Lublin after having dropped off Gerstein, and then returned on August 19 to take Gerstein to Treblinka, or he stayed in Bełżec with Gerstein while observing how the latter carried out his order, and then he went with him to Treblinka. But Gerstein gives no indication in this regard, because he makes Globocnik disappear after he had introduced Gerstein to SS Hauptsturmführer "Obermeyer" in Bełżec.

At this point, it is worthwhile to address an objection, however silly, made by Valentina Pisanty that

"according to this reasoning, we should conclude that during his entire stay in Poland, Gerstein did not shave even once, since the text never mentions it." (Pisanty, p. 120)

Whether or not Gerstein shaved himself during that time is absolutely irrelevant for the consistency of his narrative, and he might even have grown a beard. But Globocnik's presence was absolutely essential in order to enter the death camps, so his disappearance invalidates Gerstein's subsequent part of the narrative.

The visit to Treblinka presents another aspect of illogicality: since Globocnik had allowed Gerstein (and for some unknown reason also Pfannenstiel) access to Bełżec exclusively for his mission, which required the use of hydrogen cyanide, and since Gerstein claims to have disposed of the cargo of hydrogen cyanide before entering the camp, for what reason would Globocnik have allowed him to enter Treblinka? By now, Gerstein's mission was compromised for everyone to see, and a visit to Treblinka would have been a mere sightseeing tour, and would only have increased the number of those "gossipers" who were summarily shot, as Globocnik allegedly stated.

It should be noted that Gerstein's mission did not consist in checking the efficiency of the killing system with Diesel-engine exhaust gases: Globocnik took its inefficiency for granted, and for this reason Gerstein had been ordered to introduce the hydrogen-cyanide system. This excludes a visit to Treblinka for mere inspection purposes.

Leaving aside all these inconsistencies, on August 19 (or 20, or 21), Gerstein went from Bełżec "with Captain Wirth's car to Treblinka," again accompanied by Pfannenstiel. In Treblinka, he found "eight gas chambers" (PS-2170, p. 7: "Acht Gaskammern"; T-1310, p. 18: "8 Gaskammern"; PS-1553, p. 7: "8 chambres de gaz"; D6.5.45, p. 9: "8 chambres a gaz"). But according to the verdict of the Düsseldorf Jury Court of September 3, 1965, construction of the new gassing facility started only in "late August/early September" of 1942. It contained six or ten gas chambers (Rückerl, pp. 203f.). On the day of Gerstein's alleged visit, the first gassing building is said to have still existed, but it allegedly contained only three gas chambers (ibid., p. 203).

Gerstein also saw "veritable mountains of clothes and linen about 35-40 meters high" (PS-1553, p. 7: "vrais montagnes de vêtements et de linge 35-40 m environ d'altitude"). This absurd figure is perfectly consistent with the absurd extermination capacity that he attributed to this camp, which he claims had already gassed over 600,000 Jews by the time of his alleged visit, as noted earlier.

From Treblinka Gerstein went to Warsaw, and from there left for Berlin by train. In Berlin, he claims to have met the Swedish Baron von Otter, to whom I will return later, and he told him of his terrible experience.

Back in Berlin, Gerstein, who up to this point had kept the task entrusted to him by Günther absolutely secret for fear of being put to death after terrible tortures –

"if in my situation I indulge in an indiscretion, I am killed after appalling tortures and my family will be executed along with me." (D6.5.45, p. 3: "si dans ma situation je me livre à une indiscretion, je suis tué après des tortures effroyables et ma famille sera exécuté en même temps que moi.")

– began to spout the terrible state secret “to hundreds of influential personages,” including the Niemöller family, the press officer of the Swiss embassy in Berlin, Dr. Hochstrasser, the counsel of the Catholic bishop of Berlin, Dr. Winter, and the Lutheran bishop Dibelius (PS-2170, p. 8), and “so thousands [of people] were informed by me” (D6.5.45, p. 11). Gerstein also claims to have tried to be admitted to the papal nunciature in Berlin in order to inform the pope, but was not received (PS-2170, p. 8; T-1310, pp. 19f.). As is well known, Rolf Hochhuth fashioned his play The Deputy based on this fanciful narrative.⁶⁵

The rest of the story no longer directly concerns Gerstein’s alleged mission, but merely consists of disconnected ravings.

In early 1944, Günther, who never even bothered to ask Gerstein what he had done with the hydrogen cyanide Günther had ordered him to pick up in Kolin, evidently because he trusted Gerstein unconditionally, asked him to get him a large quantity of hydrogen cyanide, to be precise 8,500 kg, “for a very obscure purpose” (T-1310, p. 20; PS-2170, p. 8: “für einen sehr dunklen Zweck”), but with his acute sagacity, Gerstein was able to understand what this purpose was:

“From some technical questions that Günther asked me, I inferred that the intention must have been to kill a very large number of people in a kind of reading or club room.” (PS-2170, p. 8: “Aus manchen Fragen zum Technische[n], die Günther stellte, entnahm ich, daß wohl beabsichtigt gewesen sein muß, in einer Art Lese- oder Klubräumen eine sehr große Zahl von Menschen umzubringen.”)

As you can see, the RSHA’s ingenuity in matters of gassing knew no bounds.

Fortunately, Gerstein was able to persuade Günther to ship the poison to the Oranienburg and Auschwitz Camps, where Gerstein pulled off another one of his magic disappearing tricks:

“I then arranged it so that I let the poison disappear immediately after arrival, in each case for the purpose of disinfection, which constantly required railway cars of hydrogen cyanide there.” (PS-2170, pp. 8f.: “Ich richtete es dann so ein, daß ich das Gift dort sofort nach Eintreffen jeweils für Zwecke der Desinfektion, die dort laufend Waggon[s] an] Blausäure brauchte, verschwinden ließ.”)

Here the fallacious use of the term “Desinfektion” by a specialist like Gerstein is incomprehensible, since hydrogen cyanide was not a disinfectant at all, but a mere pest-control chemical. The book for which Gerstein had given his advice in 1943, explains very clearly that disinfection (sterilization) concerns the killing of microorganisms that cause infection, while the fight against parasites (lice, fleas, bedbugs, etc. but also rats) falls within in the realm of pest control, which is also called disinfestation – “Entwesung” in German. And among the chemical disinfestation agents available at the time (usually highly toxic gases), this book obviously never mentions railway cars full of liquid “Blausäure,” but Zyklon B.⁶⁶

Gerstein then explained why he had in his possession the Zyklon-B invoices mentioned earlier (but he always spoke of “Blausäure”), which he handed over to the two allied intelligence agents mentioned earlier, and which were later included in Document PS-1553.

Gerstein wrote:

“I have on me the notes [invoices] for 2.175 kg, but in reality, we are dealing with some 8,500 kg, enough to kill 8 million people.” (PS-1553, p. 8: “J’ai sur moi les notes de 2.175 kg, mais en vérité il s’agit de cca 8.500 kgs, assez pour tuer 8 million d’hommes.”)

“I am sure that Günther wanted to get the poison in order to kill millions of people on occasion. It was enough for some 8 million people, 8500 kg. I submitted the invoices for over 2,175 kg.” (T-1310, p. 21: “Ich bin sicher, dass Günther das Gift beschaffen wollte, um Millionen Menschen eventuell umzubringen. Es reichte für cca. 8 Millionen Menschen, 8500 kg. Über 2.175 kg habe ich die Rechnungen eingereicht.”)

In fact, the twelve invoices in question show a Zyklon B quantity of 2,370 kg. In this regard, Gerstein explained:

“I always had the invoices made out in my name, allegedly because of discretion, in truth to be free in my disposition and to be able to make the poison disappear. Above all, I avoided bringing the matter up again and again by presenting invoices, but rather left the invoices completely unpaid, while putting off the company.” (T-1310, p. 21: “Die Rechnungen liess ich stets auf meinen Namen ausstellen, angeblich wegen der Diskretion, in Wahrheit um in meiner Verfügung freier zu sein und um das Gift verschwinden lassen zu können. Vor allem vermied ich es, durch Vorlage von Rechnungen die Sache immer wieder in Erinnerung zu bringen, sondern liess die Rechnungen lieber völlig unbezahlt, unter Vertröstung der Firma.”)

The facts presented by Gerstein are partly confirmed, but also partly refuted by the documents.

First of all, the twelve invoices for Zyklon B contained in PS-1553, as mentioned earlier, are indeed addressed to SS Obersturmführer Kurt Gerstein, Berlin, Leipzigerstrasse 31/32, but DEGESCH sent him only the invoices, while they sent the cargo of Zyklon B directly to the camps, to be precise “to the Oranienburg [or Auschwitz] Concentration Camp, Dept. Disinfestation and Disinfection” (“an das Konzentrationslager Oranienburg Abt. Entwesung u. Entseuchung”; “an das Konzentrationslager Auschwitz Abt. Entwesung u. Entseuchung”; see Document 13). Once the Zyklon B was delivered, its use depended exclusively on the administration of these two camps, so Gerstein’s claim of being “free in my disposition” in order “to make the poison disappear” is a risible lie. Other documents confirm Gerstein’s dilatory attitude regarding paying the invoices, but they debunk his fantasies about Günther’s alleged request.

In a letter sent to the director of DEGESCH, Dr. Gerhard Peters, dated January 8, 1946, we read (NI-15028):

“While checking our books, we came across an outstanding debt of Obersturmführer Kurt Gerstein, Oranienburg G 36, in the amount of RM 17,000, resulting from deliveries of June 30, 1943 through May 31, 1944. As you known, you personally arranged for the delivery at the time.”

In his reply, dated January 20, Dr. Peters confirmed that he had made the aforementioned Zyklon-B deliveries, and that he had unsuccessfully solicited payment (ibid.).

In its verdict of May 27, 1955 wrapping up the appeal proceedings against Dr. Peters, the Frankfurt/Main Jury Court ascertained that, in June 1943, Dr. Peters had personally received from Gerstein the order of delivering certain quantities of Zyklon B to the concentration camps of Oranienburg and Auschwitz. The first delivery, of 240 kg was made on June 30, 1943. Between this date and May 31, 1944, DEGESCH, as part of this assignment, supplied 3,790 kg of Zyklon B, which includes the 2,370 kg resulting from the twelve invoices mentioned earlier. From June 30 to November 9, 1943, seven deliveries were made for a total of 1,420 kg. Two invoices dated November 9, 1943, of 195 kg each, were paid, one by the “SS-Standortverwaltung Auschwitz (Ober-schl.),” that is, by the administration of the Auschwitz SS Garrison, the other by the “SS-Führungshauptamt, Amtsgruppe D, Sanitätswesen der Waffen SS, Verwaltung,” hence the central administration of the Waffen SS’s health services (Rüter et al., pp. 117f.).

From the twelve invoices of Document PS-1553, it appears that the price of Zyklon B was 5 RM per kg, so DEGESCH’s billing of 17,000 RM corresponded to 3,400 kg of Zyklon, i.e. the total supplies (3,790 kg) minus the two deliveries of November 9, 1943 (390 kg), which had been paid by the Auschwitz camp administration directly.

The source was Document NI-7278, a collection of DEGESCH invoices sent to SS Obersturmführer Kurt Gerstein listing the following deliveries of Zyklon B:

Invoice Date	kg Zyklon B	Invoice Date	kg Zyklon B
30 May 1943	240	9 November 1943	195
21 September 1943	200	14 February 1944	195
21 September 1943	200	15 February 1944	195
4 October 1943	195	13 March 1944	210
14 October 1943	195	13 March 1944	210
9 November 1943	195

The total is 2,230 kg, with 810 kg in 1943 and 1,420 kg in 1944. In summary, the total supply was 4,600 kg, that is, the 3,790 kg mentioned earlier plus the 810 kg of 1943. In 1944 the supply was therefore of $(810 + 2,370 =) 3,180$ kg of Zyklon B.

From this it appears that Gerstein’s claim of an order for 8,500 kg of Zyklon B in early 1944 by Günther is Gerstein’s pure invention, just like the alleged delivery of this quantity.

The story shows that Gerstein was a premeditated liar, because he presented the twelve invoices for Zyklon B as proof of this alleged supply of 8,500 kg. In practice, he misused these invoices, which had quite a different meaning, to deliberately concoct the false story of Günther’s alleged mass-murder plans.

This fact had already been openly recognized by the Frankfurt/Main Jury Court in the first trial against Dr. Peters, although from a different perspective. The verdict of March 28, 1948 had in fact established:

“The court is convinced that Gerstein is knowingly untruthful in many respects in this report.”

In this regard, the verdict concluded that Gerstein had tried to minimize “his part in the implementation of the extermination program,” and to make his alleged acts of sabotage appear very effective. “This way it can be explained psychologically that the report is untrue on a number of significant points” (ibid., pp. 166f.).

One of these lies directly concerned Dr. Peters, about whom Gerstein wrote:

“Incidentally, the director of Degesch told me in a conversation that, for killing people, he had supplied hydrogen cyanide in vials.” (PS-2170, p. 9: “Der Direktor der Degesch erzählte mir übrigens gesprächsweise, daß er für Tötungen von Menschen Blausäure in Ampullen geliefert habe.”)

In reality, with the sentence of March 28, 1949, Dr. Peters was sentenced to five years in prison exclusively for allegedly having “participated in the murders committed in the former concentration camp Auschwitz as part of the National-Socialist human-extermination program by delivering the poison Zyklon B without warning agent in 1943 and 1944,”⁶⁷ that is, precisely because of the orders placed by Gerstein! However, the verdict of May 27, 1955 overturned the previous verdict and acquitted Peters, ordering the state to pay all legal expenses (ibid., p. 105).

The supply of liquid hydrogen cyanide in vials, which never existed, is obviously only one of the many fictions invented by Gerstein.

Before returning to the analysis of the Gerstein Report, allow me to dwell a little more on the issue of hydrogen cyanide.

Gerstein had suddenly discovered that he was a gassing expert, because he claimed that 8,500 kg of hydrogen cyanide was enough to kill 8 million people (who must have been non-Jews). This would correspond to a lethal dose of just over 1 gram per person.⁶⁸ If we accept Gerstein’s unfounded value for the sake of the argument, and if we further assume that his superiors at the RSHA, relying on his expert “knowledge,” did so as well, then what did they expect Gerstein to do with the 100 (or 260) kg of liquid hydrogen cyanide he took from Kolin to Bełżec? If 8,500 kg of Zyklon B permitted the gassing of 8 million people, then 100 (or 260) kg of liquid hydrogen cyanide would have been enough to kill some 94,000 (or 245,000) people, which is an obvious absurdity, because the logic of Gerstein’s assignment implies that he was supposed to carry out only some experimental gassings in order to convert the existing facilities from Diesel-exhaust gases to hydrogen cyanide. Conducting mass exterminations of tens of thousands of people over many weeks was not part of his assignment. This is another confirmation of the total inconsistency of Gerstein’s claimed mission.

Further confirmation for the absurdity of Gerstein’s claimed mission is indirectly adduced by the authors of a well-documented book on Zyklon B, Jürgen Kalthoff and Martin Werner, who also dealt specifically with this topic. With reference to the Hygiene Institute of the Waffen SS (Hygiene-Institut der Waffen-SS), whose headquarters were in Berlin, Knesebeckstraße 43/44,⁶⁹ they wrote (Kalthoff/Werner, p. 162):

“Hygiene Institute of the Waffen SS in Berlin, Knesebeckstraße 43/44. It had research departments for chemistry, parasitology, bacteriology (Dr. Dötzer worked there, who used the collaboration with Dr. Bruno Tesch for his publications),^[70] for climatology, zoology and water hygiene. In the water-hygiene department, Gerstein had made a name for himself with the invention of a de-lousing device for uniforms and underwear that worked with steam,^[71] for which his superior, Joachim Mrugowski, commended him.”

However, the two authors treat the whole matter with a disconcerting superficiality. Gerstein’s mission is trivialized by them with a silly observation (ibid., p. 165):

“The hydrogen cyanide picked up by Gerstein in Kolin in 1942 was not used to murder people. In the Belzec and Treblinka Extermination Camps (the camps of ‘Aktion Reinhard’), mass murder took place with engine exhaust, not with Zyklon B.”

But this orthodox “fact” cannot exclude that hydrogen cyanide was actually used there for experimental purposes. To exclude it, the two authors would have had to quote Gerstein himself. They also say nothing about the fact that Gerstein had picked up bottled liquid hydrogen cyanide, although they themselves give the following warnings (ibid., p. 238):

“Liquid HCN: The transport took place in steel, aluminum or thick-walled glass bottles. There is a risk of decomposition through polymerization, but also of explosiveness in high concentrations with air.”

With a minimum of honesty, and by virtue of their own well-documented study, they should have found it absurd to assume that Gerstein took liquid hydrogen cyanide instead of Zyklon B for his phantom mission. Indeed, any honest historian should consider such a mission completely pointless already due to the following orthodox “facts”:

1. Gerstein was a specialist in the use of Zyklon B for disinfestation purposes.
2. The alleged experts on the use of Zyklon B for the purpose of extermination were to be found at Auschwitz, where the homicidal gassing installation called “Bunker 2” is said to have been put into operation on June 30, 1942.

⁶⁹ The twelve invoices made out to Gerstein were sent to Leipzigerstraße 31/32, Berlin, which was neither the Institute’s headquarters nor Gerstein’s home address, which in 1944 was “Lützowstraße 47 I” (PS-2170, p. 12) or “Bülowsstraße 47 I” (PS-1553, p. 10). What, then, was located at Leipzigerstraße 31/32? The answer is surprising: a restaurant/wine shop called “Rheinische Winzer Stuben”! (See Document 15). This false address has an obvious relationship to the fact that Degesch ended up with 17,000 RM of unpaid Zyklon-B invoices as mentioned earlier. This duplicity raises further disturbing questions about Gerstein’s trustworthiness.

⁷¹ With such qualifications, Gerstein could be at best a “steam chamber” specialist of Treblinka!

3. In July 1942, the Auschwitz Camp received 475.2 kg of Zyklon B, or 396 cans of 1.2 kg each (see Mattogno 2015, p. 70).
4. No later than August 6, 1942, as noted earlier, the Lublin-Majdanek Camp received 540 kg of Zyklon B, or 360 cans of 1.5 kg each.
5. Despite the presumed failure of Gerstein's mission, Zyklon B was allegedly introduced at Lublin-Majdanek in 1943 for the purpose of extermination.
6. On February 19, 1943, Erich Muhsfeldt was sent on a mission from Lublin to Auschwitz and brought with him SS Oberscharführer Anton Endres, a non-commissioned officer of the camp's health services (SDG: Sanitätsdienstgrad) who "was to learn about the Auschwitz disinfection installations and the method used to kill people with gas in the gas chambers,"⁷² after which gassings with Zyklon B began in Lublin-Majdanek (Kranz, p. 222);
7. Auschwitz is about 400 km from Lublin.

Therefore, if one does not want to stolidly persist in attributing this absurd Holocaust yarn to the SS, making them a coven of mentally retarded people, the story should look something like this: an SS expert from Auschwitz would have been sent to Lublin, taking a few cans of Zyklon B along, or better still, he would have picked them up directly at Lublin-Majdanek, and he would have done his job within a few days. The conversion of the Belżec and Treblinka Diesel gas chambers into Zyklon-B chambers based on the model of "Bunker 2" would have required only the creation of an adequate number of introduction openings for Zyklon B in the roof or the side walls of the existing buildings.

In this context, one cannot help but highlight what Kuwalek reports: in 1971, 36 steel bottles were found – no one knows where – which apparently were cylinders over one meter high with a circumference of 45 centimeters. The investigation of these containers "ascertained" that they had contained "prussic acid or hydrogen cyanide." The words "Rommenhöller" and "Berlin Kohlens[...]" were legible on the cylinders.

"This company could indeed produce prussic acid, although its production focused on carbon monoxide and carbon dioxide."

For Kuwalek, these cylinders were the "trace" of the first killing experiments in Belżec. And here is the ultimate intellectual pearl of Kuwalek's mental effusions (Kuwalek, pp. 127f.):

"However, the experiments with the use of gas in cylinders were undoubtedly ineffective, mainly due to the need for frequent and expensive transport from Germany."

⁷² Minutes of the interrogation of E. Muhsfeldt of Sept. 8, 1947. AGK, NTN, 144, p. 91.

Therefore, the company “Rommenhöller” specialized in the production of carbon monoxide (Kohlenmonoxid) and carbon dioxide (Kohlendioxid), but allegedly could also produce hydrogen cyanide, which is Kuwałek’s opportunistic conjecture. Kalthoff and Werner never mention this company, and it can be safely assumed that it never had anything to do with hydrogen cyanide. The engraving “Kohlens[...]” on the steel bottles is reconcilable only with the German terms for carbonic acid (Kohlensäure) or carbon dioxide (Kohlenstoffdioxid), that is, simple carbon dioxide, which is well known to be not toxic. Therefore, the company “Rommenhöller,” which did not produce hydrogen cyanide, would have filled the aforementioned cylinders intended for carbon dioxide with – liquid hydrogen cyanide!

The inefficiency of gassing people with cylinders of liquid hydrogen cyanide, as stated by Kuwałek, would have applied in the same way to the claimed liquid-hydrogen-cyanide bottles of Gerstein’s mission. In fact, if one follows the logic of Gerstein’s rantings, he would have converted the gas chambers at Bełżec and Treblinka not in a way to make them fit for use with Zyklon B, but for the “Galardi procedure,” which consisted in pouring liquid hydrogen cyanide from a bottle into a bowl or directly on the floor – which was evidently totally unfeasible for gassing people, as mentioned earlier. Hence, subsequent gassings at Bełżec and Treblinka would always have required liquid hydrogen cyanide.

I close this brief digression on Holocaust teratology with a final observation. If we follow Gerstein’s narrative, Globocnik used Diesel-engine-exhaust gases at Bełżec, Majdanek, Sobibór and Treblinka for mass murder, but he wanted this system to be changed to that of hydrogen cyanide. This took place on August 17, 1942. Now, in “his” camp par excellence, that of Lublin-Majdanek, carbon monoxide in steel bottles was allegedly introduced a short while later instead! “Carbon monoxide began to be used in September or October 1942” (Kranz, p. 222), although “there are no documents relating to the supply of carbon monoxide” (ibid., p. 223).⁷³

In an attempt to justify the follies of their witnesses, the Holocaust orthodoxy inevitably becomes entangled in their own folly.

Returning to Kalthoff and Werner, with regard to the Zyklon-B supplies of 1943 and 1944, they cite the two trials against Dr. Peters mentioned earlier, without any reference to Gerstein’s phantom supply of 8,500 kg of hydrogen cyanide. In this regard, they claim that “Gerstein meant absorbed liquid hydrogen cyanide (= Zyklon B), but without warning agent” (Kalthoff/Werner, Note 2, p. 161), but, if he had meant this – since he was an expert in the sector – wouldn’t he have written this explicitly?

Regarding the targeted victim group of these phantom 8,500 kg of hydrogen cyanide, Gerstein wrote that he did not know who they were, but made some hypotheses:

“On the basis of the number [8 million], I thought of the inmates of the concentration camps and of the foreign workers, but also of the officers, of the German clergy, and of the prisoners of war.” (PS-2170, p. 9: “Ich dachte der Zahl [8 Millionen] nach an die Insassen der Konzentrationslager und die ausländischen Arbeiter, aber auch an die Offiziere, die Deutsche Pfarrerschaft und an die Kriegsgefangenen.”)

This is a somewhat foolish hypothesis, given that he understood that the killing had to take place “in a kind of reading or club room”! Such ramblings were even more odd, since Günther did not even know whether hydrogen cyanide would really be used for mass murder:

“Günther said that he did not yet know and could not yet discern whether, when, for what purpose, for which group of people the poison will or will not be used.” (PS-2170, p. 8: “Günther sagte, er wisse noch nicht und könne noch nicht übersehen, ob, wann, wozu [sic] welchem Zweck, für welchen Personenkreis das Gift gebraucht oder auch nicht gebraucht werde.”)

About Günther’s alleged order, Gerstein specified:

“The poison was to be delivered to his office in Kurfürstenstrasse and kept there in a shed that he showed me.” (PS-2170, p. 8: “Das Gift sollte in seine Dienststelle in der Kurfürstenstrasse geliefert werden und dort in einem Schuppen, den er mir zeigte, verwahrt werden.”)

Gerstein explained that this was too dangerous, that he could not take that responsibility, and that he managed to convince him “with difficulty [...] to keep the poison in the Oranienburg and Auschwitz Concentration Camps” (PS-2170, p. 8), where he made it disappear immediately “for the purpose of disinfection” (PS-2170, p. 9). This is another embellishment of the intentional lie exposed earlier: Gerstein claims that he let disappear the phantom 8,500 kg of hydrogen cyanide sent to Oranienburg and Auschwitz, and the twelve invoices (for much less) prove it!

But in this case, Gerstein would be solely and willfully responsible for the dispatch to Auschwitz of 1,185 kg of Zyklon B without warning agent. Therefore, in the eyes of the Frankfurt/Main Jury Court, he had to be even more guilty than Dr. Peters for having “participated in the murders committed in the former Concentration Camp Auschwitz as part of the National-Socialist human-extinction program, by delivering the poison Zyklon B without warning agent” in 1944!

Gerstein’s further lies get increasingly ridiculous and grotesque. On another occasion, Günther, who was evidently affected by some gassing frenzy, is said to have asked Gerstein whether it was possible to poison the Jews detained at Theresienstadt by throwing “cans of hydrogen cyanide” (“Blausäure- dosen”) into the moat of the fortress where they were allowed to take walks. To thwart this plan, he declared that it was impossible. But he added:

“Later I found out that the SD obtained hydrogen cyanide in some other way and that they killed the Jews after all – who were supposed to be so lucky in Theresienstadt.” (PS-2170, p. 9: “Ich habe dann später erfahren, daß sich der SD auf andere Weise doch Blausäure verschafft und die Juden – die es in Theresienstadt angeblich so besonders gut haben sollten – doch umgebracht hat.”)

This is a humongous tomfoolery that is part of the most-vulgar black propaganda, of which Gerstein generously offers an entire compendium:

1. “On one day in Oranienburg, I moreover saw several hundreds or even thousands of homosexuals disappear into the furnaces.” (PS-2170, p. 9: “Ich habe ferner in Oranienburg an einem Tage mehrere hunderte oder gar tausende Homosexueller in den Öfen verschwinden sehen.”). “Another day in ORANIENBURG, I saw thousands of pederasts disappear without traces in a furnace.” (D6.5.45, p. 13: “Un autre jour a ORANIENBURG, j’ai vu disparaître sans traces des milliers de pederastes dans un fourneau.”).
2. “I avoided visiting the concentration camps often, because it was customary – particularly at Mauthausen Gusen – near Linz – to hang one or two prisoners in honor of the visitors.” (PS-1553, p. 9: “J’ai évité de visiter souvent les champs [sic] de concentration, parcequ’il était usuel – en préférence à Mauthausen Gusen – près de Linz – de pendre à l’honneur des visiteurs un ou deux prisoniere.”)
3. “In Mauthausen, it was customary to make the Jews work at a high-altitude quarry. After some time, the service SS said: Be careful, there will be some accident within a few minutes! Indeed, one or two minutes later, a few Jews were thrown from the quarry, falling dead at our feet.” (PS-1553, p. 9: “A Mauthausen, il était usuel de faire travailler les juifs à une carrière de grande altitude—. Après quelque temps les SS du service dirent : Attention, après quelque minutes il-y-aura quelque malheur! Vraiment, une ou deux minutes plus tard, quelques juifs furent précipités de la carrière, tombants morts à nos pieds.”). According to this, Gerstein was also in Mauthausen, but in his interrogation by Judge Mattei, this camp does not appear among those he visited (M19.7.45, p. 28).
4. A certain Haller, who was at the same time an SS Sturmbannführer (major; PS-2170, p. 10) and a SS Obersturmbannführer (lieutenant colonel; T-1310, Ergänzungen, p. 2), told Gerstein that, after his arrival in Bromberg, he had prohibited the custom of killing Jewish children by smashing their heads against house walls, and that he had ordered them to be shot instead. On one occasion, two girls, who were either 3 and 5 years old (PS-2170, p. 10) or 5 and 8 years old (T-1310, Ergänzungen, p. 3), had begged him on their knees to spare them. “But of course, I had to have them shot too, said Haller.” (PS-2170, p. 10: “Aber auch sie mußte ich natürlich erschiessen lassen, sagte Haller.”).

5. Thousands of religious Poles – maybe 8,000 (PS-2170, p. 10) or maybe 2,000 (D6.5.45, p. 14) – were shot after having been forced to dig their own graves.
6. “The most-hideous concentration camps were by no means Belsen or Buchenwald. Mauthausen-Gusen near Linz on the Danube and Auschwitz were far worse. Millions of people have disappeared there in gas chambers and gas cars (mobile chambers).” (PS-2170, p. 9: “Die scheußlichsten Konzentrationslager waren übrigens keineswegs Belsen oder Buchenwald. Weit schlimmer waren Mauthausen-Gusen bei Linz an der Donau und Auschwitz. Dort sind Millionen von Menschen in Gaskammern und Gasautos (fahrbaren Kammern) verschwunden.”; similar D6.5.45, pp. 12f.).
7. “In Auschwitz, millions of children alone were killed by holding a swab of hydrogen cyanide under their noses.” (PS-2170, p. 9: “In Auschwitz wurden allein Millionen Kinder durch Unterhalten eines Blausäuetupfens [sic] unter die Nase getötet.”). This phantom event took place at once at Auschwitz and “at the Ravensbrueck Concentration camp” (D6.5.45, p. 13: “dans le camps de concentration de RAVENBRUECK”). Perhaps these imaginary murders were carried out using the phantasmagorical hydrogen-cyanide vials!
8. Various experiments were carried out on the mentally ill: “Attempts have also been made with compressed air: people were put into cauldrons, into which compressed air was pressed by means of the usual asphalt-road compressors.” (PS-2170, p. 10: “Auch mit Preßluft sind Versuche gemacht worden: Die Leute wurden in Kessel gesteckt, in die mittels der üblichen Asphaltstraßen-Kompressoren Preßluft eingedrückt wurde.”).

Some might at least think of excusing this incredible series of ravings by resorting to the excuse of hyperbole, which is a feature of many testimonies. But Gerstein firmly insisted, even while under oath, on the literal truth of all his claims:

“All of my statements are literally true. Before God and all of humanity, I am fully aware of the extraordinary consequences of my recordings, and I take it on my oath that nothing of all that I have recorded is fictitious or invented, but everything is exactly as stated.” (T-1310, p. 24: “Alle meine Angaben sind wörtlich wahr. Ich bin mir der ausserordentlichen Tragweite dieser meiner Aufzeichnungen vor Gott und der gesamten Menschheit voll bewusst und nehme es auf meinen Eid, dass nichts von allem, was ich regsitriert [sic] habe, erdichtet oder erfunden ist, sondern alles sich genau so verhält.”)

“All my statements are true to the fullest extent. Before God and all of humanity, I am fully aware of the extraordinary consequences of my recordings, and I take it on my oath that nothing of all that I have recorded is fictitious or invented, but everything is exactly as stated.” (PS-2170, p. 13: “Alle meine Angaben entsprechen in vollem Ausmaß der Wahrheit. Ich bin mir der ausserordentlichen Tragweite dieser meiner Aufzeichnungen vor Gott und gesamten Menschheit voll bewußt und nehme es auf meinen Eid, daß nichts von allem, was ich aufgezeichnet habe, erdichtet oder erfunden ist, sondern alles sich genau so verhält.”)

“I am ready to take an oath that all of my statements are totally true.” (PS-1553, p. 9: “Je suis pret de preter un serment que tous mes déclarations sont totalement vraies.”)

An even-more-serious perjury was committed by Reder in his declaration to the authorities of the Federal Republic of (West) Germany of December 7, 1954:

“I affirm the accuracy of my statement under oath.”

Another, equally foolish attempt at justification consists in considering some of Gerstein’s figures as mere errors of estimation made in good faith. For example, Georges Wellers commented (Wellers 1979, p. 31):

“It is undeniable that there are some glaring contradictions in the ‘report,’ some of which are real, for example, the surface of the gas chambers, and others are only apparent, such as their number. [⁷⁴...] There is moreover the assertion that in a room of 20 or 25 m² 700 or 800 people are crowded together, which seems difficult to believe if one were to take literally both the surface area and the number of people indicated.”

But this condition was set by Gerstein himself, who claimed that all his statements were “literally true” (“wörtlich wahr”).

Wellers then explains that the dimensions of the gas chambers given by Gerstein were merely a

“It is evidently an estimate with the ‘naked eye’ with all the approximation that this implies, especially on the part of a man who is deeply and violently shaken by what he sees in 1942, and who was always emotionally escalated in 1945, in the midst of defeat, when he wrote his ‘report’. This explains why sometimes he gives 4 m x 5 m of surface area and sometimes 5 x 5.” (ibid., p. 30: “Il s’agit de toute évidence d’une estimation à ‘l’oeil nu’ avec tout ce que cela comporte d’approximation surtout de la part d’un homme qui est profondément et violemment frappé par ce qu’il voit en 1942 et qui est resté toujours au comble de l’émotion en 1945, en pleine défaite, en rédigeant son ‘rapport’. Ceci explique que tantôt il indique 4 x 5 m de surface et tantôt 5 x 5.”)

⁷⁴ In fact, there is no contradiction in this regard, neither real nor apparent.

The fact is, however, that Gerstein entered the gas chambers when they were empty, on the day he did not see any dead inmates, and then, when he saw them die, he began to diligently time the victims' agony like a zealous extermination bureaucrat, so that he couldn't then have been "deeply and violently shaken." It should also be kept in mind that Gerstein was an engineer, so even when estimating the size of a chamber "with the 'naked eye'," his error wouldn't have been huge, and it is even less likely that he would have mistaken a rectangle for a square. As for the 700-800 people, Wellers states that Gerstein did not provide "a precise figure that he had no way of establishing, but an estimate expressing the extreme crowding" (ibid.).

But even this explanation is refuted by Gerstein himself with his absurd calculations examined earlier. Furthermore, Gerstein clearly states in this context:

"Wirth is right, if the SS helps out a little, 750 people can be accommodated in 45 cubic meters!"

That number was therefore not Gerstein's estimate, but a number given by Wirth, which was assumed to be correct by Gerstein, who subsequently "verified" it mathematically.

On the other hand, from where Gerstein stood when the drama is said to have unfolded, he could get a fairly accurate idea of the number of victims; he could even count them:

"I myself am standing with Hauptmann Wirth up on the ramp between the death chambers." (PS-2170, p. 4: "Ich selbst stehe mit Hauptmann Wirth oben auf der Rampe zwischen den Todeskammern.")

"between the death chambers" means that Gerstein was in the corridor, between the two sets of rooms; consequently, all the victims marched past him and Wirth.

The question of the 750 people, which is much-more-complex, will be explored in Part 4.

The justification of the estimate "with the 'naked eye'" doesn't hold water for other figures either, such as the reported height of the mountains of shoes or clothes – 35 or 40 meters. Even if Gerstein were wrong by over 25%, which would still be excessive for an engineer (who could take the gas-chamber building, the watchtowers or the trees as reference points), the figures would still be absurd.

But the question does not end there, because it is still necessary to resolve the jarring contradictions between the 1943 text "Tötungsanstalten in Polen" ("Killing Facilities in Poland") on the one hand and the collection of subsequent writings of 1945 on the other. I list here only the essential ones:

1. The circumstances of Gerstein's visit to the "killing facilities" of Bełżec (here "Belsjek") and Treblinka are in total contrast to those described in 1945. Gerstein is not unexpectedly chosen by the RSHA for the putative

- top-secret mission, but takes the initiative himself: he tries to get in touch with SS officers in Poland, earns their trust, and manages to “get permission” (“toestemming te krijgen”) to visit two of the four “killing facilities.”
2. Treblinka is located “about 80 km north of Warsaw.” In the 1945 versions, it is located 120 km NNE of Warsaw.
 3. Gerstein was unable to enter the other two “killing facilities,” that is, Majdanek and Sobibór. In 1945, however, Gerstein stated to the contrary that he had visited either Bełżec, Sobibór and Treblinka, but not Majdanek, or Bełżec, Treblinka and Majdanek, but not Sobibór.
 4. The transports consisted of cattle cars with 120 people in each. In the 1945 versions, there is talk of a train of 45 cars with 6,700 people, on average 148 people per car.
 5. “In normal weather conditions, about 90% of them arrive alive, although once, last summer, it happened that, due to a lack of water, 50% died.” In the 1945 reports, “only” 1,450 of these 6,700 deportees died, less than 22%.
 6. As soon as the deportees arrived, they were gathered in special huts. In the 1945 versions, they are left out in the open.
 7. The “gassing” took place “the next day or a few days later” (“de andere dag of enkele dagen later”). In the 1945 versions, it takes place on the same day of the transport’s arrival.
 8. 700-800 people were herded into the killing building (gebouw). In the 1945 versions, 700-800 people are crammed into a single “gas chamber.”
 9. “Ukrainian criminals” cut the hair of the all victims, “men and women,” whereas in the 1945 versions, Jews of the “labor commando” cut only the women’s hair.
 10. The “gassing” was carried out by “a big tractor” (“een groote tractor”). In the 1945 versions, there is only talk of a diesel engine.
 11. The victims all died “within an hour” (“binnen het uur”). In the 1945 versions, 32 minutes were enough.
 12. “In each facility, the number of killings [batches] is recorded statistically.” This is in contradiction with the French report of April 26, 1945: “In Belcek [sic] and tréblinka [sic], we did not bother to count the number of people killed with any exactitude.” (PS-1553, p. 7: “A Belcek [sic] et à tréblinka [sic], on n’est pas se donné la peine de compter d’une manière quelquelement exacte le nombre des hommes tués.”).
 13. “Three to four killings are carried out per day, i.e. within 24 hours. Hence, this results for the 4 facilities in a total of 8,000-9,000 deaths per day.” In the 1945 versions, the three camps of Bełżec, Treblinka and Sobibór have a maximum combined extermination capacity of 60,000 people per day, and an average of 44,500.

14. “In total, 6 and a half million men have already perished in this way, including 4 million Jews and 2-and-a-half-million mentally ill and so-called enemies of the Germans.” This obviously false figure is in contradiction with the mutually contradictory and absurd figures of the 1945 reports: 25 million or 20 million.

The March 1943 report was written with a relatively fresh memory, at the latest seven months after Gerstein’s claimed visit to Belżec, so it should form the standard for assessing the complex of writings known as the “Gerstein Report,” which date from late April through mid-July of 1945; but instead, Gerstein’s 1943 text was evidently only the beginning of his literary delirium.

Saul Friedländer reports that Gerstein, suffering from diabetes, had been forced to frequently interrupt his military training course since 1941 due to this illness that caused repeated “precomatous conditions which explained his blanking out and his peculiar reactions,” as a certain Dr. Nissen wrote to Gerstein’s widow, which “might have partially explained a number of things, notably the strange and wild look that was observed by a number of people who saw him,” as Friedländer observed (Friedländer 1969, p. 174). Friedländer even spoke of the “schizoid aspect of Gerstein’s personality” (Friedländer 1967, p. 27).

And in fact, the “Gerstein Report” cannot be the testimony of a sane, lucid and balanced person, but rather the testimony of a lying visionary or a visionary liar.

Tregenza expressed it as follows (Tregenza 2000, p. 243):

“According to the current state of research, the Gerstein material on Belżec must also be called a questionable source, and in some respects, it must even be classified as a fantasy.”

3.4. Gerstein’s Guarantors

This is fully confirmed by the statements of his acquaintances, which show that Gerstein told each contact a different version of the alleged incident.

In June 1944, the Swiss diplomat Paul Hochstrasser met Gerstein in Berlin. He later reported what he had learned from the SS officer in a typescript titled “Notes on extermination measures under the rule of National Socialism” (“Notizen betreffend Vernichtungsmassnahmen unter der Herrschaft des Nationalsozialismus. Für Herrn Prof. Dr. Carl Ludwig in Basel”) dated “Hamburg, 25. Juli 1955.”⁷⁵ In these “Notes” on Gerstein’s statement, Hochstrasser wrote on pages 3f.:

“G.[erstein] was repeatedly in extermination camps to inspect the disinfection. Shortly before the meeting in June 1944, he had been in the Berblenka [Treblinka] camp (Gouvernement [occupied Poland]), and during the three-hour get-together (Gerstein, liaison man and I), he was still visibly impressed by these experiences. [...] In a locked hall, they were so tightly packed that no one could fall over. Diesel-engine exhaust gases were then let in. The killing process took 1-1/2 hours, because the influx of gases was irregular. [...] A difficult problem was the removal of the corpses: mass graves, chem. destruction or incineration. All three types have been tried. Because of the large quantity, the following procedure was ultimately used there: In large pits, the corpses (many supposedly still moved) were piled up in layers by the hundreds (see above comment on trucks with tipping devices in Dachau), doused with gasoline or the like, and burned as much as possible to make room for the next delivery. Among others, a professor from a West-German university was charged with examining a radical elimination procedure of the corpses. However, no sufficiently effective method was found.”

The contradictions with other versions of the “Gerstein Report” are obvious. Gerstein had gone to the “extermination camps” “repeatedly,” and not just once. He had visited the camp of “Berblenka,” that is, Treblinka, “Shortly before the meeting in June 1944,” an expression that cannot refer to a visit in August 1942. The Bełżec Camp is never mentioned, and the whole description of the alleged extermination refers to Treblinka. Gerstein’s assignment concerned the inspection of “the disinfection” rather than implementing changes to the killing system, that is, the replacement of diesel-engine exhaust gases with hydrogen cyanide. The killing took place “in a locked hall,” in the singular, and not in four chambers, and it lasted for 90 minutes instead of 32 minutes – plus two hours and 49 minutes of trying to start the engine. Even the attempts at eliminating corpses through “chem.[ical] destruction or incineration” are in contrast with the other versions, as well as the cremation technique with liquid fuels in the pits themselves. The “professor from a West-German university” could only be Prof. Wilhelm Pfannenstiel, who was put in charge of “examining a radical elimination procedure of the corpses.” According to the German report of May 4, 1945, however, Pfannenstiel joined Gerstein “more by accident,” only “because there was still a free seat in the car” (PS-2170, p. 3: “da noch ein Platz im Auto frei war”), that is, he did not have to carry out any assignment at the Bełżec Camp.

At the aforementioned trial against Gerhard Peters, the former DEGESCH director, who held the patent and production license for Zyklon B, various witnesses spoke of their meetings with Gerstein. The verdict of March 28, 1949 refers to this as follows (Rüter et al., pp. 147f.):

“The reason for his [Gerstein’s] mission to Belcec [sic] in August 1942, according to his communication to the witness [Hermann] Eh.[lers], was to take measures there against the infestation with rats that was getting out of control due to mass burials.”

Witness Armin Peters stated that Gerstein showed him

“a top-secret, official letter that had been delivered to him by a courier a few hours ago. It came from the then Higher SS and Police Leader in Lublin, who used this route to request a monthly supply of 500 kg of hydrogen cyanide for ‘pest-control purposes’ from Gerstein and to personally commission him with the procurement. [...]

As far as I can remember, he procured the first delivery of hydrogen cyanide from ‘Degesch,’ and transported it by truck to Lublin himself.” (ibid., p. 148)

This story contradicts all the versions of the “Gerstein Report” of 1945, both regarding the origin of the order (which was allegedly given to him by the RSHA, through SS Sturmbannführer Rolf Günther rather than the Höherer SS- und Polizeiführer of Lublin Odilo Globocnik), and the quantity of hydrogen cyanide (100 or 260 kg, rather than 500), which moreover is said to have been a unique delivery, not a monthly recurring one.

Bishop Otto Dibelius, invariably cited as the guarantor of Gerstein’s trustworthiness, described his meeting with this SS officer in the following way (Dibelius, p. 141):

“He stated the following: The SS had instructed him to work out a procedure for eliminating a large number of corpses without polluting the air or leaving any other unpleasant traces. With this assignment, he was sent to one of the large concentration camps. There he witnessed an incineration operation: the train cars rolled in, jammed full of people, mostly Jews, men, women, children; undressing; marching to the gassing facility under the leather whips of the SS; forcing people into the gas oven with incessant cries of desperation; the engine starts; the screams fall silent; the corpses are dragged out through the wide side doors; the teeth are checked, and the gold fillings are broken out; finally the corpses are thrown into a deep pit; soil on top; done!

Kurt Gerstein said this with a half-choked voice.”

This story also presents various evident and inexplicable contradictions with respect to the versions of 1943 and 1945, in particular regarding Gerstein’s assignment, which here is said to have concerned corpse elimination rather than gas-chamber conversion.

3.5. Baron Göran von Otter

I already mentioned Gerstein’s meeting with Baron von Otter, the last issue to address in this part of my study. Gerstein recounted:

“There [in Warsaw], when I tried in vain to get a bed in a sleeping car, I met the secretary of the Swedish embassy in Berlin, Baron von Otter. Still under the fresh impression of the terrible events, I told him everything with the request that he report this to his government and the Allies immediately, since every day of delay would have to cost the lives of thousands and tens of thousands more. He asked me for a reference, which I gave him to General Superintendent Dr. Otto Dibelius, Berlin, Brüderweg 2, Lichterfelde West, a trusted friend of Pastor Martin Niemöller and a member of the church resistance movement against Nazism. I met Mr. von Otter two more times at the Swedish embassy. In the meantime he has reported to Stockholm and informed us that this report had had a significant impact on Swedish-German relations.” (T-1310, p. 19: “Dort [in Warschau] traf ich, als ich vergeblich ein Schlafwagenbett zu erhalten versuchte, in Zuge den Sekretär der Schwedischen Gesandtschaft in Berlin, Baron von Otter. Ich habe noch unter dem frischen Eindruck der entsetzlichen Ereignisse diesem alles erzählt mit der Bitte, dies seiner Regierung und den Alliierten sofort zu berichten, da jeder Tag Verzögerung weiteren Tausenden und 10Tausenden das Leben kosten müsse. Er bat mich um eine Referenz, als welche ich ihm Herrn Generalsuperintendenten D.Otto Dibelius, Berlin, Brüderweg 2, Lichterfelde West, angab, einen vertrauten Freund des Pfarrers Martin Niemöller und Mitglied der kirchlichen Widerstandsbewegung gegen den Nazismus. Ich traf Herrn v.Otter noch 2 mal in der schwedischen Gesandtschaft. Er hat inzwischen nach Stockholm berichtet und teilte wir mit, dass dieser Bericht erheblichen Einfluss auf die Schwedisch-Deutschen Beziehungen gehabt habe.”)

Gerstein found a way to contradict himself here too:

“Despite my passing on of these things in August 1942 to the Swedish legation in Berlin, apparently these figures were simply not believed.” (PS-2170, p. 7: “Trotz meiner Weitergabe dieser Dinge im August 1942 an die Schwedische Gesandtschaft in Berlin glaubte man 2-mal anscheinend einfach diese Zahlen nicht.”)

This refers to his delusion of 20 million victims, among his other figures.

From the perspective of this study, the whole question boils down to what exactly Gerstein related to Baron Göran von Otter.

Historian Walter Laqueur, who researched the matter carefully, wrote (Laqueur 2012, pp. 48f.):

“The question of what became of this report has been a matter of much speculation and it can now be answered with some assurance. Von Otter at first composed a written account of his dramatic meeting, but then decided not to send it with the diplomatic mail since he was to return to Stockholm within a week of the event. [...] Following a request made by the present writer, access was first given to the von Otter file in February 1980. But the only document found was a letter by von Otter to Viscount Lagerfelt at the Swedish legation in London.”

This letter has never been published, and we only know the brief summary of its contents as given by W. Laqueur, which is certainly not irreproachable, because it states that it contains details concerning the extermination procedure in Belzec (ibid., p. 49), yet in reality, the letter only contains the words “all the details.”

In 1983, when preparing the documentation for my 1985 study Il rapporto Gerstein,” I obtained from the Riksarkivet (National Archives) in Stockholm a photocopy of the letter in question, of which I gave a thorough summary in the chapter dedicated to von Otter (Mattogno 1985, pp. 89f.). Here I present the complete translation:⁷⁶

“Helsingfors [Helsinki], July 23, 1945

Strictly confidential

First secretary of the legation Baron Lagerfelt, London.

On my return journey from a visit to Warsaw, which I made by train in the last days of August 1942 [sista dagarna i augusti 1942], a German SS man came up to me after he had learned that I was a Swedish diplomat.

He told me that he had something extremely important to tell me, and I suggested that he take advantage of the long journey to talk about it. After a mental breakdown, which the man overcame only with difficulty, he reported that he was returning from an assignment of several days at a corpse factory in Belzec [vid en likfabrik i Belzec], which lies a little east of Lublin. He then described the whole gassing procedure [hela gasningsförfarandet] and gave me all the details [alla detaljer] which I requested in order to check regarding the transport conditions, the technical procedure, the reaction of the victims, the SS guard personnel and the performing Ukrainian workers [verkställande ukrainska arbetarnas], the treatment of victims before and after the execution, the salvaging of jewels, gold teeth and money set aside, the manner of burial, etc. I saw documents, hydrogen-cyanide orders, identity card and more [dokument, cyanvätebeställningar, identitetskort m.m.].

The man’s purpose, according to what he told me, was to draw the attention of a neutral power to what was going on in Germany, and he entertained the idea that the German people would not want to support the Nazi government even for a moment if knowledge of the extermination of people were to spread and were to be confirmed by an impartial foreign authority.

He had also referred the matter to a high Protestant pastor who had an attitude of opposition, the superintendent Dibelius, with whom I myself have compared his statements and received confirmation of the congruence in this regard as well as the trustworthiness and identity of the man. On this occasion, I also received certain confirmation of the information received regarding the background of my guarantor’s participation in the extermination action. This consisted in the fact that the man, who had never engaged in political activity and even less had been a Nazi, had enlisted for service in the SS to receive confirmation by this way of his suspicions on the causes of the fact that a large number of patients had died in the years 1941-1942 in hospitals for the mentally ill, including a close relative whom he loved very much. He had thought that he would have had the opportunity to clarify the matter by enlisting in the health section of the SS, which was the name of the organization that set up the death factories, since as an engineer he had dealt with health issues.

The event has occupied my thoughts very much, and I believe that the least I can do is to try somehow to inform the competent authority that this member of the extermination section of the SS has made an attempt to impede the continuation of the operation, and that he, as far as I am aware, did not actively participate in the procedure.

The man's name is engineer Kurt Gerstein. He was born around 1907, at that time he lived in Bülowstrasse, probably at no. 49, he is originally from Braunschweig, if I remember correctly, or from these regions, and his office, SS-Sanitätsabteilung, had branches in Giesebrechtstrasse. I have no idea whether the man is still alive.

He visited me at the embassy some six months after [något halvvår efter] our first meeting to inquire about what we had been able to do, and judging by his appearance on that occasion, he could take his own life at any time out of desperation for what was happening in his country.

I now feel relieved of this matter here, and I would be grateful if you would conscientiously consider whether there is any way to bring this information to the attention of the competent war-crime investigators so that the man can be treated with regard to his own actions as described by me.

Please inform me at the next opportunity. Von Otter [handwritten signature]."

The other documents contained in the von-Otter file are an "Aide-Memoire" written in English by Baron Lagerfelt and dated August 7, 1945,⁷⁷ in which the Swedish diplomat summarized von Otter's letter without naming him,⁷⁸ and a "strictly confidential" letter dated London, August 14, 1945, in which Lagerfelt informed von Otter that he had transmitted the aforementioned "Aide-Memoire" to his "opposite number at the Foreign Office."⁷⁹

These two documents were published in French translations by Poliakov in 1964 (Poliakov 1964a, pp. 13f.) and subsequently reprinted by Roques (Chelain 1988, pp. 460-462).

The letter of July 23, 1945 demonstrates first of all that von Otter had never before reported about this matter to his government, not even verbally, since thanks to it he felt "relieved of this matter here," which he had hitherto kept to himself as a secret that tormented him. Secondly, it shows that, when he wrote the letter, he had no "written account of his dramatic meeting" before his eyes, as Laqueur claimed, not even simple notebook notes, because in his letter, both the place and the date of Gerstein's birth are wrong:

⁷⁷ Lagerfert/BB Kungl. Svenska Beskickningen, "Aide-Memoire" London, 7th August, 1945.

⁷⁸ This letter was published in a 1955. German translation in Poliakov/Wulf, pp. 114f.

⁷⁹ Lagerfert/BB Kungl. Svenska Beskickningen, London 14th August 1945. Strängt förtroligt.

“He was born around 1907, at that time he lived in Bülowstrasse, probably at no. 49, he is originally from Braunschweig, if I remember correctly [...].”

In fact, he was born in 1905 in Münster. If we consider that Gerstein had shown von Otter various documents, including his identity card (identitetskort), these errors are somewhat strange. Furthermore, the phrase “if I remember correctly” (“om jag minns rätt”) confirms that the letter in question was written by von Otter without any contemporaneous written support, report or simple memo.

In contradiction to this, Gerstein wrote that, in the meantime, von Otter “has reported to Stockholm and informed us that this report had had a significant impact [erheblichen Einfluss] on Swedish-German relations,” which is patently false, so that inevitably one of the two lied.

In his letter, von Otter states that Gerstein had claimed during their exchange while on the train from Warsaw to Berlin that he had “also referred the matter” (saken) to Superintendent Dibelius. From the context it is clear that “the matter” was Gerstein’s idea of having the “knowledge of the extermination of people” (“kännedom om människoutrotningen”) confirmed and disseminated by a neutral power, that is, the alleged mass extermination perpetrated in the Polish camps. However, when these two characters met, they were both still on the train from Warsaw to Berlin, so at that point, Gerstein, who had just left Treblinka, could not yet have told Dibelius about this.

If Gerstein told Dibelius later what Dibelius claimed about it – the procedure of eliminating corpses, the incineration operation, the gas oven, as mentioned earlier – it is difficult to see how von Otter could have obtained from Dibelius a confirmation of Gerstein’s trustworthiness. Moreover, Dibelius seems to have been anything but convinced that Gerstein was telling the truth before meeting von Otter, and he himself felt that Otter was dispelling his doubts rather than the other way around:

“A few days later, Dr. Dibelius went on, von Otter approached him with a request for information about Gerstein. When the Swede, too, told him about the conversation in the express train, Dr. Dibelius said he felt his doubts cease.”

In fact, Dibelius had considered Gerstein’s story so terrible that he had had a hard time making himself believe it (“Who knew...”, p. 22). Finally, von Otter, not to be outdone by Dibelius, declared in a letter to Helmut Franz of April 2, 1948 that it was Dibelius more than anything or anyone else who convinced him that Gerstein was trustworthy (Franz, pp. 92f.):

“[...] the confirmation I received during our 10-hour conversation through documents he showed me, cross-examination, and later inquiries with Superintendent Dr. Dibelius etc. [...]

My control during the cross-examination and even more through the information provided by Dr. Dibelius completely confirm my view that Gerstein was a deeply idealistic person who tried to do everything to prevent the calamity of Hitlerism."

Therefore, before meeting each other, both Dibelius and von Otter evidently had serious doubts about Gerstein's trustworthiness, and von Otter kept his skepticism evidently well into the post-war years. In fact, it is difficult to understand how two people having serious doubts about what Gerstein told them could share their doubts and emerge together with confidence. Yet that is what von Otter claimed more than ten years after the fact, because in an interview dating back to December 21, 1966, he blatantly contradicted himself, as his initial doubts about Gerstein's tale had suddenly turned into certainty of their veracity right from the start (Joffroy, p. 17):

"Coincidentally, a few weeks later I met Otto Dibelius at the Swedish Church in Berlin, during the installation ceremony of a Lutheran pastor. I managed to verify then that Gerstein hadn't been lying to me, had I not already been convinced by his story."

Von Otter added (ibid.):

"We arrived in Berlin early. I went straight home. I was very agitated inside, anxious: the same day I spoke to my boss, and I wrote my report."

which, as explained earlier, is false. What version of his tale did Gerstein tell von Otter anyway? That of 1943, that of 1945, that which Dibelius claimed he heard from Gerstein, or yet another version? Von Otter's tale of the "corpse factory in Bełżec" (a typical term of anti-German black propaganda that does not appear in any of Gerstein's writings)⁸⁰ is vague and generic, and does not even cover six lines in the original letter; it does not even mention Jews or Treblinka.

If we assume that von Otter correctly reported Gerstein's claims, Gerstein referred to euthanasia "in the years 1941-1942," while the operation on Reich territory was notoriously halted in August 1941, and further stated that the health section of the SS (SS-Sanitätsabteilung), "was the name of that organization that set up the death factories," which is nonsense even from an orthodox point of view.

For his part, von Otter assured that he received a visit from Gerstein in Berlin "some six months" later, but this contradicts what Gerstein stated:

"After a few weeks, I saw Baron von Otter two more times." (PS-1553, p. 8: "Après quelques semaines j'ai vu encore deux fois le baron de Otter.")

It was only in 1964 that the Swedish diplomat finally decided to reveal "all the details" of what Gerstein had confided to him, but he brazenly plagiarized Léon Poliakov's article "Le dossier Kurt Gerstein," in which the latter had presented a highly manipulated version of Gerstein's French text of April 26, ⁸⁰ In Polish black propaganda, the equivalent also used by Reder (1946, p. 35) was "fabryka śmierci" – death factory.

1945, going so far as to falsify the floor area of the “gas chambers,” as already pointed out earlier. Von Otter copied both Poliakov’s manipulations and errors, as can be seen from the following two significant examples:

Gerstein: “45 waggons, contennants 6.700 personnes, 1450 déjà morts à leur arrivée.” (PS-1553, p. 6).

Poliakov: “45 wagons, contenant plus de 6.000 personnes. 1450 déjà mortes à leur arrivée.” (Poliakov 1964a, p. 8)

Von Otter: “45 Waggonen, insgesamt mehr als 6.000 Menschen. 1450 waren schon tot.” (Braumann, p. 12)

Gerstein: “‘Bien remplir’ – le hauptmann Wirth a ordonné. Les hommes nus sont debout aux pieds des autres, 700-800 à 25 mètres quarrée, à 45 m cube!” (PS-1553, p. 6)

Poliakov: “‘Bien remplir’, a ordonné Wirth, 700-800 sur 93 m².” (Poliakov 1964a, p. 9)

Von Otter: “Man hatte 700 bis 800 Juden in jede der vier Kammern von je 93 Quadratmetern gepresst” (Braumann, p. 12)

Even the misspelling “Belsec” comes from Poliakov’s text. Therefore, von Otter is at best a controversial and unreliable guarantor, not to mention mendacious.

From what I have stated above, one can draw the reasonable conclusion that Gerstein – assuming that the meeting on the train actually took place – told von Otter a story so inconclusive that the Swedish diplomat did not consider it worthy of even a brief report.

In confirmation of this we can adduce the story of Karl Yngve Vendel, during the war the Swedish consul in Stettin (now Szczecin). In mid-August 1942, he made a trip to East Prussia, where he gathered information on the persecution of the Jews. After his return to Berlin, Vendel wrote a “strictly confidential” report (“strängt förtroligt”) of seven pages on August 20, 1942, in which the most terrible news concerning the alleged extermination of the Jews, albeit in an extremely imaginative way, was this:⁸¹

“In one city [stad], all Jews were gathered for what is officially announced as ‘delousing.’ At the entrance, they had to leave their clothes, which were immediately sent to the ‘Spinnstoffinsamlingen’ [Spinnstoffsammlung]; the delousing procedure instead consists of their gassing [förgasning], and then they could be placed in a specially prepared mass grave.”

Von Otter’s (alleged) report, which was of immensely superior value and importance, if it was actually written, was evidently deemed by the Swedish embassy in Berlin unworthy of even a meager note.

Part 4:

Reder versus Gerstein

4.1. Diesel or Gasoline Engine?

The extermination system alleged for the Belżec Camp evolved in Polish literature and in that of Western countries in two different directions. In the latter, the Diesel-engine version advocated by the “Gerstein Report” immediately prevailed.

On January 30, 1946, the deputy attorney general of the French Republic, Charles Dubost, presented document PS-1553 as RF-350 to the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg. It had been found by a collaborator of Dubost among the documents seized by the Americans (Joffroy, p. 266). PS-1553 was a group of documents among which, as explained earlier, Gerstein’s report dated “Rottweil 26 April 1945” and the twelve aforementioned Zyklon-B invoices were most-important. The “Gerstein Report” was accompanied by an “Assessment Report” dated “May 5, 1943 [recte: 1945]” by Major D.C. Evans and Mr. J.W. Haight, to the secretariat of the Combined Intelligence Objectives Subcommittee (CIOS), a London-based body that coordinated the U.S. and British intelligence services. The two authors of the Assessment Report described their chance encounter, in a requisitioned hotel at Rottweil, Germany, with Kurt Gerstein, who had given them his report of April 26, 1945.

During the trial, PS-1553 was at the center of a purely formal dispute on January 30, 1946 between the president of the Court and Dubost, which lasted into the afternoon session. Eventually, the document was accepted by the Court, but only the twelve Zyklon-B invoices were given great prominence. The “Gerstein Report” was relegated to the background; it was simply “added” to the invoices (IMT, Vol. VI, pp. 332-364). But already on July 4, 1945, the Parisian newspaper France Soir had published Gerstein’s imaginative “confession” under the headline “J’ai exterminé jusqu’à 11.000 personnes par jour” (“I exterminated up to 11,000 people a day”), as mentioned in Chapter 3.1., and its content was even broadcast on the radio (Joffroy, p. 248).

The report of April 26, 1945 was translated into German on January 14, 1947,⁸² and this translation was partially read during the session of January 16, 1947, of “The Medical Case” (also called the Doctors’ Trial); Document PS-1553, presented as Exhibit 428, was admitted by the Court.⁸³ A partial English translation of the report was published in the Trials of War Criminals, specifically as Exhibit 428 (Vol. 1, pp. 865-870).

Document PS-1553 was subsequently submitted during the IG-Farben Trial. In the afternoon session of the session on November 26, 1947, Dr. Hans Seidl, who defended Walter Dürrfeld, raised two objections against the admission of the report, first because it was an unsworn statement, and also because the witness had disappeared without a trace. The president of the Tribunal rejected the first objection, but accepted the second.⁸⁴ However, he considered the twelve invoices on the supplies of Zyklon B contained in the document to be convincing,⁸⁵ but in the procedural documents, PS-1553 was published in full in photocopy, including the report of April 26, 1945.⁸⁶

In 1949, Gerstein's tale was discussed during the trial against G. Peters, and in 1955 during his appeal trial, as mentioned earlier.

During the Eichmann Trial in Jerusalem (April 1961-May 1962), Document PS-1553 was accepted by the Court as T-1309, and an excerpt of the report was read out in the courtroom during the 67th session (June 6, 1961; State of Israel, Vol. III, pp. 1227-1229).

The verdict of the trial against Josef Oberhauser (January 18-21, 1965), accepted Gerstein's story with regard to the alleged gassing procedure, and it sanctioned that the gassings were carried out by means of a Diesel engine.

For the purposes of the present study, we may leave it at that.

In the wake of the Gerstein Report, orthodox Holocaust historiography also accepted what Globocnik presumably told Gerstein in Lublin, namely that the gas chambers of the Belżec, Sobibór and Treblinka Camps all operated "with Diesel exhaust gases."

This was explicitly confirmed for Treblinka by the Düsseldorf Jury Court in the verdict of the trial against Kurt Franz (September 3, 1965; Rückerl, p. 203), while for Sobibór, the verdict of the Hagen Jury Court of December 20, 1966 (trial against the camp personnel) mentioned an engine without specifying the type (ibid., p. 163). The uncertainty of the Court probably depended on the fact that various defendants spoke of a gasoline engine (Benzinmotor), although in relation to the first alleged gassing building (Franz Hödl, in an interrogation of March 29, 1966, even spoke of the simultaneous presence of two engines, one gasoline and one Diesel, although the latter was allegedly not used⁸⁷). The most-qualified witness, Erich Bauer, the alleged "Gasmeister" of Sobibór, declared, however:⁸⁸

Therefore, Sobibór’s second gassing building was also equipped with a Diesel engine.

This, moreover, was always implied by orthodox Holocaust historiography, as Barbara Distel wrote again in 2008 in an authoritative collection of orthodox Holocaust papers (Distel, p. 378).

The 1984 article by U.S. engineer Friedrich Paul Berg “The Diesel Gas Chambers: Myth within a Myth,” which appeared in 1994 in an improved and expanded German translation in an anthology of revisionist articles (Berg 1994; 2019), demonstrated scientifically the utter ineffectiveness of Diesel engines for killing purposes, especially if compared with gasoline engines, and even more-so with producer-gas generators, which were used by hundreds of thousands of internal-combustion-engine vehicles in wartime Europe. These gas generators “smoldered” wet coal or wood and produced a gas mixture rich in highly toxic carbon monoxide that was then used to fuel the engine. Berg’s paper upset the certainties of orthodox Holocaust historians, who could not continue to attribute such a degree of foolishness to the top ranks of the SS. They then tried to fend off the blow by erasing the Diesel engine from the historical record and putting the gasoline engine in its place. For this purpose, Reder’s testimony became crucial, since the Bełżec Camp, so to speak, is emblematic.

However, from a historiographical point of view, this solution created an even-more-serious problem, indeed an inextricable one with no way out, because the two main witnesses of this camp, Reder and Gerstein, openly contradict each other on the extermination system, one being an eyewitness supporter for the gasoline engine, the other for the Diesel engine: which of the two should be given preference, and why?

Denying this contradiction was impossible, even though that is exactly what Nella Rost Hollander tried to do, with lots of chutzpah:⁸⁹

“These two testimonies are almost identical; therefore, they confirm each other.”

In order to overcome this evident dichotomy while keeping the petrol engine as the “truth”, it was necessary to discredit Gerstein. The operation to achieve this was started by Peter Witte as early as 2004:⁹⁰

“According to his own oft-repeated statement (since 1944, first published in Kraków in 1946), Rudolf Reder, the only known survivor of the Bełżec Extermination Camp at the time, said he carried 4 to 5 kanistry benzyny (gasoline canisters) daily into the engine room of the gas chambers. There was located the ‘maszyna’, motor pedzony benzyna (a petrol-powered motor). His statement was supported by the Polish electrician Kasimierz Czerniak, who helped to install the engine room in 1942: he describes a gasoline engine with an estimated 200 or more HP, whose exhaust gases were discharged through pipes laid underground (October 18, 1945). A confusion with a Diesel engine can be ruled out, as Diesel fuel is called olej napedowy in Polish. The theory of a diesel engine for the gas chambers in Belzec goes back to the statement of Kurt Gerstein (1945), who, according to his own statement, did not see the engine, however, but merely heard it. Thus, it found its way into historiography without further evidence.”

Witte uttered two blatant lies, which I have underlined in the quote. First of all, from Gerstein’s account it is evident that he was for at least 2 hours and 49 minutes in front of the Diesel engine, which did not start, and he carefully timed the difficult starting procedure:

“Heckenholt is the operator of the Diesel engine, a small technician who is also the builder of the system. With the Diesel-exhaust gases, the people are supposed to be put to death. But the Diesel doesn’t work! Captain Wirth comes. You can see that he is embarrassed that this has to happen today when I am here. Yes, I see everything! and I wait. My stopwatch registered everything well. 50 minutes 70 minutes – the Diesel won’t start! The people wait in their gas chambers. In vain. You can hear them crying, sobbing. ‘Like in the synagogue,’ says Professor Pfannenstiel, his ear to the wooden door. Captain Wirth hits the Ukrainian who is supposed to help Unterscharführer Heckenholt with the diesel 12, 13 times in the face with his riding whip. After 2 hours 49 minutes – the stopwatch registered everything well! – the Diesel starts.” (T-1310, p. 14: “Heckenholt ist der Chauffeur des Dieselmotors, ein kleiner Techniker, gleichzeitig der Erbauer der Anlage. Mit den Dieselauspuffgasen sollen die Menschen zu Tode gebracht werden. Aber der Diesel funktioniert nicht! Der Hauptmann Wirth kommt. Man sieht, es ist ihm peinlich, dass das gerade heute passieren muss, wo ich hier bin. Jawohl, ich sehe alles! und ich warte. Meine Stoppuhr hat alles brav registriert. 50 Minuten 70 Minuten– der Diesel springt nicht an! Die Menschen warten in ihren Gaskammern. Vergeblich. Man hört sie weinen, schluchzen. ‘Wie in der Synagoge’ bemerkt der Professor Pfannenstiel, das Ohr an der Holztür. Der Hauptmann Wirth schlägt mit seiner Reitpeitsche dem Ukrainer, der dem Unterscharführer Heckenholt beim Diesel helfen soll, 12, 13 mal in’s Gesicht. Nach 2 Stunden 49 Minuten– die Stoppuhr hat alles wohl registriert!– springt der Diesel an.”)

Gerstein was therefore present and saw everything, and since he was a “graduate engineer” (Diplomingenieur) and a “mining commissioner” (Bergassessor; T-1310, p. 1), it must be assumed that he could distinguish a Diesel engine from a gasoline engine. The second lie concerns the statement made by Kazimierz Czerniak during his interrogation of October 18, 1945, which we do well to quote from the Polish original (Libionka, pp. 188f.):

“During the operation of the death camp, the Germans took me to Belżec and in the camp area took me to the power plant [do elektrowni], which was on the right side of the camp entering the camp from the road leading to Lwów. The power plant was installed in a hut. So, I had to connect the dynamo to the engine that powered the dynamo. I cannot give the voltage of the current. In the hut where the aforementioned machines were located, there was a control panel from which many cables departed.

In addition to this power plant, there was a second power plant in the camp area, built earlier, which was located in the vicinity of the aforementioned power plant. The voltage of the current from the earlier power plant was 220 volts, 20 amps. This current was used only for lighting the camp and the huts. This power plant was considerably smaller than the one built later. The motor of the small power plant had 15 hp, while the motor of the large power plant had a power of 200 hp. From this engine, pipes went underground [pod ziemią] to discharge the exhaust gases. I don't know [nie wiem] where these pipes led. Then I noticed that, in addition to the two power plants, which were located in huts, there were still other huts. At the camp I saw Jews walking around who were working in the camp. The engine with a power of 200 HP was secured to beams placed on the floor of the hut.

After two weeks, I was again taken by SS to the Belżec camp. Then I took the measures of the exchange of the narrow-gauge railway that led from the hut [od baraku] in which Jews were killed to the pits. At that point I had the opportunity to be near this hut [przy tym baraku]. I saw that from this hut three doors [troje drzwi] led to a wooden ramp [na rampę drawianą], and from this ramp started a narrow-gauge railway that forked in the upper part of the camp. These doors were locked with hooks and moved by rollers on rails. The blacks [SS men] told me laughing that this hut was a warehouse. I understood that in this hut there was the gas chamber [komora gazowa].”

The witness specified that this hut “was located at a distance of about 50 meters from the railway siding.” Three months later, he was again taken to the camp “to repair a car” [celem reperacji samochodu], which he did in the garage. Then he continued:

“I add that for the aforementioned engine with a power of 200 HP, I made a filter whose function was to remove the smoke from the gas and to discharge this gas elsewhere. I did the filter about two weeks after the day I mounted the dynamo to this machine.”

Czerniak further stated that “the 200-hp engine was gasoline-operated [był poruszony benzyną]” and that his third visit took place in the fall [jesienią] of 1942 (ibid., p. 189).

Keep in mind that Czerniak's testimony supposedly confirms Reder's testimony regarding the use of a gasoline engine for the purpose of killing, so here I examine it above all from this perspective. The first observation is also the decisive one: the witness refers to the first alleged gassing building (a hut with three gas chambers, near the spur, served by a narrow-gauge railway to transport the bodies to the mass graves), while Reder speaks of the later, second building. I mention only in passing the various absurdities and contradictions of this testimony with respect to the orthodox Holocaust narrative:

1. There were two electric-power generators.
2. No engine dedicated to killing the victims existed.
3. The larger power generator was driven by a gasoline engine of 200 HP, from which exhaust pipes left underground, discharging the exhaust gases to an unknown location.
4. The two power generators were located close together.
5. There was a killing hut at a distance of about 50 meters from the railway siding, and this was about 260 meters from the opposite border of the camp.
6. Czerniak claims that this hut was “the gas chamber,” but he does not explain from where he got that idea.
7. The claim that a “filter” was installed in order to purify the engine’s exhaust gasses is preposterous nonsense: were the SS men at Belzec afraid that the victims’ bodies would be a little sooty?

Witte’s explanation is therefore only a deceptive subterfuge in an attempt to solve an insoluble problem. In a “prestigious” mainstream work, a worthy colleague of Witte, Achim Trunk, accepted this nonsense as a fact without comment:⁹¹

“Gasoline-powered engines are attested to as the murder generators; but there is also some talk of Diesel-powered machines.”

In a note, he mentions Gerstein, but a few pages later, he forgets him again, writing instead (Trunk, pp. 34f.):

“Reliable sources show that gasoline engines were actually used in the ‘Aktion Reinhardt’ extermination camps. Rudolf Reder, one of the very few survivors of the Belzec Extermination Camp, spoke of a gasoline-powered engine that stood in a small room near the gas chambers. It consumed 80 to 100 liters of gasoline every day.”

To call a mendacious storyteller like Reder, who has blatantly contradicted himself and the foundations of orthodox Holocaust historiography in so many ways, a “reliable source” is truly outrageous. This also means in turn that Trunk did not consider Gerstein’s statements to be reliable, and in fact, in this context Trunk does not mention Gerstein at all. Poor Gerstein, who until 2000 had dominated the orthodox historiographical scene with regard to the “Aktion Reinhardt” camps: now he is thrown into the orthodox Holocaust dumpster as useless, if not downright harmful.

⁹¹ Trunk, p. 31; cf. my observations in Mattogno 2016a, pp. 26-30.

Out of ignorance or bad faith, no orthodox Holocaust historian has ever realized, let alone pointed out, that Reder's gasoline engine could not have been an extermination tool, as seen earlier, and as will be repeated in this chapter. Having clarified this, we can now move on to expose this insuperable problem in detail.

4.2. "Discordant Concordance"

The relationship between Gerstein's and Reder's testimonies is at the same time paradoxical in terms of form – a real "discordant concordance" – but also enigmatic with regard to the common source.

Both accounts have many common elements, but they almost always appear deformed with substantial modifications, additions or omissions.

First of all, I quote Gerstein's camp description:

"The other day, we drove to Belcec. A small special railway station had been created for this purpose on a hill north of the Lublin-Lemberg highway in the left corner of the demarcation line. South of the road were some houses with the inscription 'Sonderkommando Belcec der Waffen-SS'. Since the actual head of the entire killing facility, Police Captain Wirth, was not there yet, Globocnik introduced me to SS Hauptsturmführer Obermeyer (from Pirmasens). That afternoon, he only let me see what he had to show me. I saw no dead that day, only the smell of the whole area in hot August was putrid, and millions of flies were everywhere. – Close to the small two-track station was a large hut, the so-called cloakroom, with a large counter for valuables. Then a small tree-lined road in the open under birch trees, lined to the right and left by double barbed wire, with inscriptions: To the inhalation and bathing rooms! —

In front of us a kind of bathhouse, right and left in front of it, large concrete pots with geraniums, then a small staircase, and then right and left three rooms 5 × 5 meters, 1.90 m high, with wooden doors like garages. On the back wall, not quite visible in the dark, large wooden ramp doors. On the roof as a 'clever little joke' the Star of David!– An inscription in front of the building: Heckenholt Foundation!– I couldn't see more that afternoon.– The other morning just before seven it is announced: The first transport arrives in ten minutes!– In fact, after a few minutes, the first train from Lemberg arrived. 45 cars with 6,700 people, 1,450 of whom were already dead upon their arrival. Behind the barred hatches, terribly pale and frightened children peered through, eyes full of fear of death, and furthermore men and women. The train arrives: 200 Ukrainians tear open the doors and whip the people out of the cars with their leather whips. A large loudspeaker gives further instructions: undress completely, including prostheses, glasses, etc. Hand in valuables at the counter, without vouchers or receipts. Tie the shoes together carefully (because of the collection of textiles.), because otherwise no one would have been able to find matching shoes in the heap 25 meters high. Then the women and young girls to the hairdresser, who cuts off all the hair with two or three strokes of the scissors and makes it disappear in potato sacks.” (T-1310, pp. 10-12: “Am anderen Tage fuhren wir nach Belcec. Ein kleiner Spezialbahnhof war zu diesem Zweck an einem Hügel hart nördlich der Chaussee Lublin-Lemberg im linken Winkel der Demarkationslinie geschaffen worden. Südlich der Chaussee einige Häuser mit der Inschrift ‘Sonderkommando Belcec der Waffen-SS’. Da der eigentliche Chef der gesamten Tötungsanlagen, der Polizeihauptmann Wirth, noch nicht da war, stellte Globocnec mich dem SS-Hauptsturmführer Obermeyer (aus Pirmasens) vor. Dieser liess mich an jenem Nachmittag nur das sehen, was er mir eben zeigen musste. Ich sah an diesem Tag keine Toten, nur der Geruch der ganzen Gegen im heissen August war pestilenzartig, und Millionen von Fliegen waren überall zugegen. – Dicht bei dem kleinen 2-gleisigen Bahnhof war eine grosse Baracke, die sogenannte Garderobe, mit einem grossen Wertsachenschalter. Dann eine kleine Allee im Freien unter Birken, rechts und links von doppeltem Stacheldraht umsäumt, mit Inschriften: Zu den Inhalier- und Baderäumen !—

Vor uns eine Art Badehaus, rechts und links davor grosse Betontöpfe mit Geranien, dann ein Treppchen, und dann rechts und links je drei Räume 5 × 5 Meter, 1,90 m hoch, mit Holztüren wie Garagen. An der Rückwand, in der Dunkelheit nicht recht sichtbar, grosse hölzerne Rampentüren. Auf dem Dach als ‘sinniger kleiner Scherz’ der Davidstern!!— Vor dem Bauwerk eine Inschrift: Heckenholt-Stiftung!— Mehr habe ich an jenem Nachmittag nicht sehen können.— Am anderen Morgen um kurz vor sieben Uhr kündigte man an: In zehn Minuten kommt der erste Transport!— Tatsächlich kam nach einigen Minuten der erste Zug von Lemberg aus an. 45 Waggon mit 6.700 Menschen, von denen 1450 schon tot waren bei ihrer Ankunft. Hinter den vergitterten Luken schauten, entsetzlich bleich und ängstlich, Kinder durch, die Augen voller Todesangst, ferner Männer und Frauen. Der Zug fährt ein: 200 Ukrainer reissen die Türen auf und peitschen die Leute mit ihren Lederpeitschen aus den Waggon heraus. Ein grosser Lautsprecher gibt die weiteren Anweisungen: Sich ganz ausziehen, auch Prothesen, Brillen usw. Die Wertsachen am Schalter abgeben, ohne Bons oder Quittung. Die Schuhe sorgfältig zusammenbinden (wegen der Spinnstoffsammlung.), denn in dem Haufen von reichlich 25 Meter Höhe hätte sonst niemand die zugehörigen Schuhe wieder zusammenfinden können. Dann die Frauen und jungen Mädels zum Friseur, der mit zwei, drei Scherenschlägen die ganzen Haare abschneidet und sie in Kartoffelsäcken verschwinden lässt.”)

According to Gerstein, the tree-lined road in the open under birch trees [Birkenallee] was “some 150 meters” long (PS-2170, p. 4: “etwa 150 Meter”).

Before examining the convergences and differences between the Reder’s and Gerstein’s stories, we must keep in mind that Reder was deported to Belžec on August 17, 1942, while Gerstein arrived at the camp the very next day, so that Gerstein's narrative should be perfectly comparable to Reder's.

In this regard it should be noted first of all that Reder is completely unaware of Gerstein's visit, which should have left quite an impression in his memory, both because he had arrived at the camp the day before, and because of the extraordinary presence of Wirth, the former commandant of the camp who on August 1, 1942 was appointed camp inspector of "Aktion Reinhardt" and also became commandant of the Lublin Labor Camp (Kuwałek, p. 58), and also for the even-more-extraordinary presence of Globocnik.

Since for Reder, the transports usually consisted of 50 railway cars with 100 people per car, Gerstein's train (coming from Lwów, like Reder's) had 45 cars with a total of 6,700 people, hence 149 people per wagon, which should have been an extraordinary event that Reder should have remembered; even more-astonishing was the number of deportees dead on arrival: 1,450! A really conspicuous mortality for "a 7-hour trip," as Reder claimed (although his story points at 4 hours). Before 1946, however, Reder never mentioned inmates arriving dead at the camp. Only after coming into contact with the German judiciary, did he begin to "align" his tale with the official "truth" by making some concessions (such as the "hose" and the engine exhaust entering directly into the gas chambers):

"Every day, 3 transports of about 100 cars arrived, and in each car were about 100 people; when they arrived on the scene, some were already dead."

But not even this statement can be a confirmation of Gerstein's story, according to which the average deaths were $(1,450 \div 45 =) 32$ per railway car, therefore, for Reder, 32 dead out of 100 deportees, a figure that cannot possibly be called just "some." I will return to the question later.

As for the topography and structure of the camp, Gerstein immediately saw the hill (Hügel) of Bełżec, while Reder, in his three and a half months at the camp, never noticed it. Gerstein, for his part, did not notice the barrier screens placed inside (or maybe outside) the camp fence and "placed on top of each other, of two meters in height" (1946), therefore clearly visible.

I already observed earlier that Reder's description of the killing building are in conflict with that of the current orthodox Holocaust narrative, which in turn strictly depends on Gerstein's account. He mentions a hut "with the inscription 'cloakroom'" ("mit der Aufschrift: Garderobe"), in which there is a large counter with the inscription "Deposit of money and valuables" ("Geld- und Wertsachen Abgabe"). Inside there was a room ("ein Zimmer") with about 100 stools (Hocker), which was the barbers' room (Friseurraum). This hut was separated from the killing building by "a road lined with birch trees of about 150 meters" ("eine Birkenallee von etwa 150 Meter"), "fenced in left and right by double barbed wire" ("rechts und links von doppeltem Stracheldraht umzäunt”) and bearing the inscription “To the inhalation and bathing rooms” (“Zu den Inhalier- und Baderäumen”; all in PS-2170, p. 4).

Reder never mentions the loudspeaker which gave instructions to the deportees, and he knew nothing about the “cloakroom” hut and its counter. For him, there was only a shack of 30 × 15 meters used exclusively for hair cutting.

Here we must underline the admirable German logistical organization of the pre-extermination procedure: a hut of 450 square meters contained about 100 stools (one on every 4.5 square meters), with only eight barbers in it. Evidently, among the 15,000 deportees who arrived every day in three transports, people who could shear off hair were very rare.

According to Reder, this hair-clipping hut was connected to the killing building by a small courtyard just wider than the hut and in the shape of a rectangular trapezoid. Where Reder “saw” only wooden-board fences, Gerstein saw a 150-meter-long corridor fenced in with barbed wire connecting the hair-clipping hut to the extermination building (the infamous “hose”), which in turn was completely unknown to Reder. This corridor was lined by birch trees (Birken in German, brzozy in Polish), which in itself is a peculiar claim, because there were only pines within the camp (Kiefern in German, sosny in Polish; see Chapter 2.5.).

For both witnesses, the killing building had an identical structure. Ignoring Reder’s insane 100 m × 100 m for the entire building, the measurements were:

- height 3 to 3.5 m, with a flat roof
- access staircase of three steps, 1 meter wide
- central corridor 1.5 meters wide
- access doors to the chambers 1 meter wide
- rear sliding doors on wheels, 2 meters wide
- chamber measuring either 5 m × 4 m or 5 m × 5 m (Gerstein’s data).

The dimensions mentioned by Reder therefore reconcile well with those mentioned by Gerstein, and this is decisive for the packing density of the victims in the chambers, as I will explain later.

However, even in this regard the descriptions of the two witnesses present striking “discordant concordances.”

Gerstein “saw” a sign with the words “Zu den Inhalier- und Baderäumen” at the entrance to the 150-meter corridor, while Reder “saw” a sign with the words “Bade und Inhalationsräume” directly “on the front attic wall saying” (1.11.44) of the killing building, or above its entrance door:

“The gas chamber was disguised as a bath house by way of a sign placed above the door with the words ‘Bade und Inhalationsräume.’” (26.1.56)

Gerstein observed “right and left in front of [the gassing building] large concrete pots with geraniums,” while Reder noticed only one (small) pot, and in a different spot:

In an earlier statement, Reder had stated that “A vase of flowers hung under the sign” (1.11.44), meaning the sign saying “Bade und Inhalationsräume,” which was placed above the entrance door; therefore this “large vase” was also hanging above this door.

Strikingly, Gerstein did not see at all the two raised “ramps” that Reder saw on either side of the killing building.

Other “observations” by Gerstein that do not find the slightest confirmation in Reder’s stories are the Star of David on the roof of the killing building, and the inscription “Heckenholt-Stiftung” in front of it.

For Reder, there was a protective net covered with foliage above the building as anti-aircraft camouflage: the building

“had a flat roof covered with roofing felt, and above it again a wire-mesh roof covered with green foliage.” (1946)

Strikingly, Gerstein didn’t see this bulky display at all.

Reder states explicitly (but he also contradicted himself on this) that children (and the elderly) were not gassed, but rather “were carried on a stretcher, and unloaded at the edge of huge pits” (1946), where they were shot and killed. Gerstein instead “saw” “mothers with infants at their breast, small, naked children” entering the gas chambers (T-1310, p. 13: “Mütter mit Kindern an der Brust, kleine, nackte Kinder”).

I mentioned earlier that Reder knew nothing of such unusual events as the Gerstein’s visit to the camp in the presence of Globocnik and Wirth. One might think that this was due to his job as an excavator operator. However, he states that the team assigned to excavating the mass graves, after the killing of the victims, suspended its activity and was used for dragging the corpses instead, which also applied to Reder:

“After twenty minutes, the doors of the rooms were opened, and the workers – Jews – among whom I was as well, fastened the loop of a belt to the hand of a dead man [and] two of us dragged the corpses [to the place] where the dentists were and [who] extracted gold teeth from their mouths.” (22.9.1944)

“Since, as I mentioned, about 14,000 people were gassed every day and had to be buried, I and others were engaged not only in excavating the pits, but also in removing the corpses from the gas chambers and transporting them to the pits.” (26.1.1956)

For Reder, the gassing usually lasted 20 minutes on the clock, a time span that occurs in all his statements:

“The engine was running without interruption for exactly 20 minutes, after which Moniek gave the signal to one of the operators, and this engine was turned off.” (29.12.45)

“The machine ran for 20 minutes by the clock. It was turned off after 20 minutes.” (1946)

Gerstein, on the other hand, “clocked” 32 minutes, after the victims had been locked up in the gas chambers for 2 hours and 49 minutes – in which case they would have suffocated after just a few minutes of having been locked up, as indicated earlier, if one were to follow his literary fiction.

This would therefore have been an absolutely exceptional event. One of the many oddities of this story is that Reder mentioned a similar case, but in a completely different context:

“Once the killing machine broke down. Informed of this, he [the camp commandant] arrived on horseback, ordered the machine to be repaired, and did not let people out of the asphyxiation chambers; – they had to [wait to] die of asphyxiation for another couple of hours.” (1946)

In his delirious testimony of omnipresence, Reder provided a parallel account of the alleged event as follows:

“But when the machine broke down once, I was called too, because I was called ‘der Ofenkünstler’ [the furnace artificer]; I looked at it and saw glass tubes that were connected to the tubes that went into each chamber.” (1946)

And finally, with reference to the camp commandant:

“I saw him for the first time when the gassing device stopped working, and the people were half-gassed. He was called by phone at his home, and I saw that he gave orders.” (26.1.1956)

I have already dwelled on these “glass tubes.” I may add here that the story is rather insane: Reder was called to repair an engine because he was a stove specialist! Obviously, one cannot believe that there was no real qualified mechanic in Bełżec, since, according to Reder,

“From each transport, skilled workers, such as mechanics, carpenters, shoemakers, tailors, were chosen immediately after arrival.” (1945)

In summary, from Reder’s point of view, Gerstein’s visit should have been quite exceptional in three respects: the number of deportees and those dead on arrival, the presence of Gerstein, Wirth and Globocnik, and the extended duration of the gassing due to an engine malfunction. Despite all this, Reder never mentioned this visit. As for the second point, Reder remembered well having seen for the first time the camp commandant when the “machine” broke down, and even more-so he should have remembered the alleged event described by Gerstein.

Another contradiction concerns the engine tenders: according to Gerstein, they were SS Unterscharführer “Heckenholt” (actually Lorenz Hackenholt) assisted by a Ukrainian, for Reder, however, they were two “askari,” as he repeatedly stated. The following quote condenses them all:

“The actual machine was operated by two askari, fiends, always the same. I found them [employed] at this work and left them there [still doing it].” (1946)

The removal of corpses from the death chambers presents further insurmountable contradictions. Gerstein is completely unfamiliar with Reder's 2-meter-high piles of corpses right outside the extermination building, and the corpse-transport system is also contradictory: while Gerstein talks about wooden stretchers or carts used to move corpses to the mass grave, Reder wrote about dragging them on foot through the sand using leather straps wrapped around the corpses' wrists. On the way to the mass graves, Gerstein "saw" "two dozen dentists" (T-1310, p. 15; PS-2170, p. 6: "Zwei Dutzend Zahnärzte") check the corpses' mouths, while "other dentists" (ibid.: "andere Zahnärzte") extracted gold teeth; for Reder, there were only altogether eight "dentists" (1946), or maybe ten (1945).

For Reder, the entire trip from the killing building to the mass graves (between 150 and 500 meters) was overhung by a camouflage net:

"Behind them [was] a sandy road along which the corpses were dragged. Over it, the Germans had built a roof made of taut iron wires, on which they had scattered green foliage. It was meant to protect the ground from aerial observation. This part of the camp under the leaf roof was obscured." (1946)

Gerstein, on the other hand, reported nothing about this camouflage.

I will address the issue of mass graves later in detail. Here I note only that Reder had not even noticed that "millions of flies were everywhere"; indeed, since he "saw" 30 mass graves with three million corpses altogether, there should have been billions of flies.

The shoe mountain 25 or 35-40 meters high did not exist at all for Reder, who claims instead that the personal effects of the deportees were piled up in the camp warehouse.

Gerstein, on the other hand, did not notice that an orchestra was playing music all day long, nor did he notice the sand-extracting machine, which undoubtedly would have made a lot of noise. Reder, who claims to have operated this machine for two months straight and therefore knew it well, declared that it ran on gasoline. The ARC website (Aktion Reinhard Camps: www.deathcamps.org) states that the excavation machines used in Treblinka that were photographed by Kurt Franz, whose photos are reproduced on that website, were manufactured by the Menck & Hambrock Company of Hamburg. The website also contains the decrypt of a German radio message sent on June 2, 1943 by SS Sturmbannführer Wirth in the name of SS and Police Leader Lublin Globocnik regarding the rental of a clamshell excavator (Greifbagger) from the Lamczak Company of Berlin-Neukoelln (the machine was unusable and was sent back).⁹²

Three types of grab excavators exist:

⁹² On the ARC website, the source is generically referred to as "Public Records Office, Kew (England)." The precise reference is: TNA, HW 16-25. German Police Decodes Nr 3 Traffic: 2.6.43. ZIP/GPDD 498a/15.6.43, No. 10/12.

1. A shovel excavator (Löffelbagger; literally: spoon excavator), with the shovel mounted on a hydraulic arm allowing maximum digging force but limited range;
2. a dragline excavator (Eimerseilbagger, literally: bucket-rope excavator), which is a bucket suspended on wire ropes from a boom, which increases downward range but limits maneuverability of the bucket and the force it can exert on the ground; and finally
3. a rotary-bucket excavator (Schaufelradbagger; literally: bucket-wheel excavator) with a number of buckets attached to a large rotating wheel, huge machines used to extract massive amounts of soil/coal/ore from large quarries.

The type photographed at Treblinka was the drag-line excavator. The technical characteristics of these machines, with specific reference to the one produced by the Menck & Hambrock Company of Hamburg Altona, are reported in detail in a 1929 book. The available power sources were either steam engines (Dampfbagger), Diesel engines (Dieselbagger) or electric motors (Elektrobagger; Ritter, pp. 58f.).

Back then, as is the case today, most heavy construction machinery was powered by Diesel engines, which have a much higher torque at low rpms than gasoline engines, and they tend less to overheat, two very important characteristics for slow-moving or stationary machines imposing frequent drastic load changes on their engines. The same is true for large-size electricity generators, which are virtually never powered by gasoline engines.

This means that Reder was telling a lie, or that he was not even able to distinguish a gasoline engine from one of the three types listed above, which certainly does not increase his credibility regarding the gasoline engine of the killing building.

Finally, neither Reder nor Gerstein noticed the camp's two electricity generators as seen by Czerniak.

The most-striking contradiction between Reder's and Gerstein's testimony concerns the murder weapon. While Gerstein "saw" a Diesel engine whose exhaust gases asphyxiated the victims, Reder describes a phantom "machine" that included a gasoline engine with a compressor, gas cylinders, wheels with spokes and glass tubes, whose exhaust gases did not asphyxiate the victims:

"These gases were discharged from the engine directly into the courtyard, not into the chambers. [Gazy te były odprowadzane z motoru wprost na dwór a nie do komór.]" (29.12.45)

Those who, like Witte, invoke Reder's testimony to support their claim that gasoline engines were used as murder weapons are therefore either ignorant of the facts or disingenuous. And since the two key "eyewitnesses" contradict each other in such a radical way on this essential point, it follows that orthodox Holocaust historiography cannot affirm anything in this regard, since any position is a purely arbitrary choice, because they either have to make do with a Diesel engine whose inapt exhaust gases allegedly killed the victims, or with a gasoline engine whose exhaust gases were not used to kill them.

Another important topic concerns the color of the gassing victims. Trunk states that the Diesel engine prevailed “in the older literature,” but the more recent one leans towards the gasoline engine (Trunk, p. 32), and he describes the toxicological effects of the respective exhaust gases (ibid., p. 28):

“The victims of carbon-monoxide poisoning can usually be recognized by the red color of the mucous membranes, as hemoglobin saturated with carbon monoxide (and thus the blood as a whole) has a cherry-red color.”

This applies to gasoline engines. But how does he explain that some witnesses claim that the bodies of victims poisoned with carbon monoxide produced by engine-exhaust gases were blue? Here is Trunk’s answer:

“If Diesel engines were used, it certainly would have taken much longer to die, because Diesel engines produce significantly less carbon monoxide. They also emit a significant amount of irritants. In this case, death may have been caused by a combination of carbon-monoxide poisoning (internal asphyxiation) and a lack of oxygen (external asphyxiation).”

In a footnote, he clarifies that “individual reports exist, according to which the corpses exhibited a bluish skin color,” which he explains by the “lack of oxygen as a cause of death” (ibid., p. 32).

Let’s examine what the corpses “seen” by Gerstein and Reder looked like.

Gerstein: “The bodies are thrown out, blue, wet with sweat and urine, the legs full of feces and menstrual blood.” (PS-1553, p. 7: “On jête les corps, bleus, humides de soudre [sueur] et d’urin, les jambes pleins de crotte et de sang périodique.”)

Reder: “The corpses found in the chamber did not show an unnatural color at all. They all looked like living people, mostly their eyes were open. Only in a few cases did it happen that the corpses were stained with blood.” (29.12.1945)

“[...] the corpses were standing upright, the faces as if dreaming, unaltered, not blue.” (1946)

Hence, while the corpses were blue according to Gerstein, they were not blue according to Reder, but for neither of them they were cherry-red.

Two conclusions can be drawn from this. The first is that neither witness ever saw any corpses gassed with carbon monoxide. The second is that Gerstein’s blue corpses are only reconcilable with a gassing using a Diesel engine, while the non-blue corpses without any unnatural discoloration as claimed by Reder are irreconcilable with any type of gassing, neither with a Diesel engine, nor with a gasoline engine, nor with suffocation due to a lack of oxygen. These findings make the orthodoxy’s gasoline-engine Holocaust schizophrenia based on Reder’s testimony even more acute.

As mentioned earlier, Robert Kuwałek relies heavily on Reder's statements in his book, so he should be a firm supporter of the gasoline engine, but he is quite confused about it, because he writes (Kuwałek, p. 128):

"Therefore, even the simplest solution was the installation of a Diesel engine [silnika dieslowiego], for which only gasoline was needed [do którego potrzebowano jedynie benzyny]."

He devotes several anodyne pages to Gerstein (ibid., pp. 203-210), but does not point out any of the numerous absurdities contained in Gerstein's various texts, indeed, he even tries to eliminate one, asserting that in Kolin he had picked up Zyklon B! (ibid., p. 206)

Kuwałek does not juxtapose Gerstein's tale with Reder's, thus hiding from his readers their striking mutual contradictions with this deliberate omission.

With regard to the brief, sketchy reference to exterminations in a report by Karl Yngve Vendel as quoted earlier, he dares to say that in it "there was a precise description of the killing of Jews in the gas chambers"! (ibid., p. 208) He is a worthy emulator of Witte, indeed.

As mentioned earlier, a comparison between the two testimonies also exhibits surprising concordances, some presented in very different ways, but others matching almost to the letter, and this is the most-enigmatic aspect of the whole story. One could surmise that both Reder and Gerstein witnessed some underlying, real events, but they "dramatized" them in their tales following different psychological patterns. But this can explain only to a small degree the huge divergences pointed out here. And in any case, there is another fact that radically precludes this explanation, namely the fact that they were "eyewitnesses" to physically impossible or blatantly false events.

Earlier I established that the measurements relating to the killing building provided by Reder are fully compatible with Gerstein's, so that, in practice, both "saw" 750 people in a room of 20 or 25 square meters; regarding the number, Reder is even-more-specific: "the askaris counted 750 people for each room" (1946). In this regard, the agreement is almost literal:

Reder: "There were about 750 people in there; 6 times 750 people yields 4,500." (1945)

Gerstein: "Up to this moment, the people in these 4 chambers are alive, 4 times 750 people in 4 times 45 cubic meters!" (T-1310, pp. 14f.).

Reder's story, in a few lines, presents three other surprising concordances on false claims:

The first is the affirmation that the corpses in the chambers remained standing after their execution (a tale repeated by many "eyewitnesses"):

Reder: "the corpses were standing upright" (1946)

Gerstein: "the dead are still standing" (PS-1553, p. 7)

The second claim concerns observations pertaining to winter:

Reder: “the remaining women waited their turn near the hut, naked, barefoot, even in winter and in the snow.” (1946)

Gerstein: “of course naked also in winter, or in cold weather!” (PS-2170, p. 5; similar PS-1553, p. 6: “also in winter naked!”/“aussi en hiver nus!”)

Since the camp began its activity in early spring of 1942, both Gerstein and Reder arrived in Bełżec in August 1942, and Reder claims to have escaped in late November of that same year, how do you explain this reference to winter?

The third claim concerns the mass graves. Both witnesses described enormous mass graves of very similar dimensions: they measured 100 m × 25 m × 15 m for Reder, and 100 m × 20 m × 12 m for Gerstein.

As already mentioned in Chapter 2.15., the archaeological investigations conducted by Dr. Andrzej Kola resulted in the identification of 33 areas with disturbed soil which Dr. Kola called mass graves, with a total area of just 5,490 square meters and a volume of 21,310 cubic meters. The graves were of highly irregular sizes and shapes, and the deepest of them measured 5.2 meters, while the largest pit had a surface area of 432 square meters (24 m × 18 m).³⁷

The mass graves described by Reder and Gerstein each had a surface area of 2,500 and 2,000 square meters, respectively, which is evidently a blatantly false figure, of which neither could have been an “eyewitness.” It is also very unlikely that both committed a simple error of estimation – and pretty much the same one to boot – by confusing a length of 24 m with 100 m, and a depth of just over 5 m with one of 12 or 15 m.

Reder adds another nonsense of his own: the blood that burst from the mass graves!

“the next day a sinister sea of blood flowed to the edge of the pit.” (1945)

“and ominous, thick blood burst out of the pits and flooded the whole surface.” (1946)

Gerstein described the mass graves instead as follows:

“After several days, the corpses fermented and then, a short time later, they collapsed so that a new layer could be thrown on them. Then 10 cm of sand was scattered over it so that only a few heads and arms protruded.” (T-1310, p. 16: “Nach einigen Tagen gärten die Leichen hoch und fielen alsdann kurze Zeit später stark zusammen, so dass man eine neue Schicht auf dieselben draufwerfen konnte. Dann wurde 10 cm Sand darüber gestreut, so dass nur noch vereinzelt Köpfe und Arme herausragten.”)

Reder says that the corpses were piled up to “one meter above ground level” (1945, 1956) and adds:

“During the first days, a high mound of soil towered over such a pit. As time went by, this soil subsided, and the ground slowly leveled off.” (29.12.1945)

Gerstein presents his account as an eyewitness, because immediately afterwards he states that he “saw Jews climbing around on the corpses in the graves” (T-1310, pp. 16f.), but since this claimed event happened “after several days” (“nach einigen Tagen”), he cannot have observed it in person, as he left the camp the next day.

Another concordance on a falsehood concerns the influx of transport. Reder declared:

“The transports had 50 cars, 3-4 times a day” (1945)

In the Gerstein-based essay “Killing Facilities in Poland,” we read:

“Three to four killings are carried out per day [...].”

As explained earlier, in actuality the influx was 0.69 transports per day, hence two transports every three days. How do we explain these concordances in Reder’ and Gerstein’s statements – particularly those on the absurd and the false? Was there an unknown common source or sources?

Regarding the genesis of the legend about the “extermination camps” as fabricated in Jewish and Polish clandestine reports during the war, we certainly know a lot, but not everything. There are probably interferences and interconnections that have escaped out attention. One concerns the claimed mass graves of Bełżec and Treblinka.

Reder first mentioned mass graves measuring 100 m × 25 m × 15 m in his interrogation of September 22, 1944. But more than a year before that, Jankiel Wiernik had made the exact same statement regarding Treblinka:⁹³

“The mass grave was 100 m long, 25 m wide and 15 m deep,” (“Masowy grób miał 100 m długości 25 m szerokości 15 m głębokości,”)

and this cannot be accidental. Dr. Caroline Sturdy Colls’s archaeological survey of the area of the former Treblinka II Camp (the presumed extermination camp) revealed the presence of 11 areas with disturbed soil which she called “potential mass graves.” The two largest of them measured just 34 m × 12 m and 26 m × 17 m (Sturdy Colls/Brantwaite, p. 70).

In practice, both Wiernik and Reder committed the same perjurious lie in relation to two different camps: is it believable that this is a coincidence?

But there is another no-less-surprising “coincidence”: the capacity of the gas chambers – 700-800 people – is identical for Treblinka in a story by Samuel Rajzman as published in 1945 (Rajzman, p. 122):

“Each woman was shaved to the skin with clippers, then was sent to the bath-house, which consisted of 10 chambers with a capacity of 700-800 people each.”

⁹³ Jankiel Wiernik, “Relacje Żyda, uciekiniera z Trebłinki, Janika Wiernika, zamieszkałego w Warszawy przy ul. Wołyńskiej 23, lat 53.” Ghetto Fighters House Archives, Catalog No. 3166, Collection 11261.

But the “coincidences” don’t end there. The size of the alleged gas chambers given by Gerstein – 5 m × 5 m × 1.90 m – are identical to those given by Jankiel Wiernik in his first text on Treblinka from early 1944 in relation to the first alleged gassing building:⁹⁴

“When I arrived at the camp, there were already 3 gassing chambers [komory do zagazowywania]. During my stay, 10 more were added. The size of a room was 5 x 5 meters, a total of 25 square meters, the height of 1.90 meters. [...] A hermetically sealable iron door [żelazne] led to each room.”

These figures then underwent a literary transformation. The number of gas chambers of the first building was doubled (3 + 3 = 6), and they were arranged like those claimed for the second presumed gassing building at Treblinka, which – as I documented in another study (Mattoigno/Kues/Graf, pp. 784-798) – was a literary transformation of the system of steam chambers mentioned in a report of November 15, 1942: a structure with a central corridor and five chambers on each side.

It is worth noting that, in his 1943 report “Killing Facilities in Poland,” Gerstein did not report anything about such a structure:

“The corridor ends at an iron door of a stone building. The door is opened, and the 700-800 [people] sentenced to death are whipped into it until, crammed like herring in a barrel, they can no longer move.”

On the other hand, the iron door appears in Wiernik’s aforementioned description.

What can be affirmed with certainty, therefore, is that since 1943 a tall tale was being bandied about which was based on the various myths there were interpreted and even dramatized by the various “eyewitnesses.”

A final enigma remains, though, which relates to the claimed inscription on the alleged killing building, which was “Bade und Inhalationsräume” for Reder, and “Zu den Inhalier- und Baderäumen” for Gerstein.

Kola published a photograph of a sign in Polish, allegedly found in the area of the Bełżec Camp, which contains instructions for deportees to hand over valuables, shoes, etc., including the final one to enter completely undressed “for bathing and inhalation” (“do kąpieli i inhalacji”; Kola, p. 12). Inhalation was a specific therapy for respiratory diseases.⁹⁵ In normal practice, bath houses and shower rooms are associated with disinfection and disinfestation, while here we have an incomprehensible combination of a hygienic measure (the bath house) with a therapy (inhalation). If assuming that the deportees were to be deceived about what was going to happen to them, one would expect words such as “bathing and disinfection rooms” (“Bade- und Desinfektionsräumen”) or “bathing and disinfestation/fumigation rooms” (“Bade- und Ent- wesungsräumen”), yet most certainly not “inhalation,” which makes no sense. Former Sobibór inmate Kurt Thomas reported that the alleged gassing building was referred to as “state disinfestation center” (“Staatliche Seuchenbekaempfungsstelle”),⁹⁶ a name perfectly congruent with both points of view, the orthodox as well as the revisionist one.

We need to keep in mind that the Belżec Camp was intended for two large areas populated by Polish Jewry, the larger of which was the Galicia District, from which 251,700 Jews were deported to that camp, if we follow Kruglow (1989, p. 107), including about 60,000 from Lwów. Kruglow writes that the largest deportation from this city, involving some 40,000 people, began on August 13, 1942 (ibid., pp. 102f.). But already more than a month earlier, a German newspaper in Lwów had reported the establishment of a delousing facility (Entlausungsanstalt) for Jews “on Hospital Street at the corner of Emilia-Byka-Street, in the middle of the current Jewish quarter, in which 1,500 people can be treated daily.” The procedure was described as follows: in the changing rooms (Entkleidungsräumen), people took off their clothes, which were disinfested in hot-air chambers (Heißluftkammern), while they themselves were treated with “Kuprex,”⁹⁷ a liquid disinfectant. Then they received their disinfested clothes in a separate, isolated part of the structure (“Fleckfiebergefahr in Lemberg...”).

A month later, several thousand Jews deported to Belżec had surely passed through the plant or in any case knew it, so they knew what to expect when entering such a facility. Trying to deceive them with writings such as “Bade und Inhalationsräume” or “Zu den Inhalier- und Baderäumen” requires attributing a considerable degree of stupidity to the SS, the same degree they must have had in giving Gerstein the kind of mission he claims to have had.

In his first declaration of September 22, 1944, Reder knew nothing yet about these inhalation rooms; in fact, he declared that the killing building was called “Bath and Disinfection” (Баня и дезинфекция/banja i dezinfektsja). In his statement of November 1, 1944, he merged the two themes, asserting:

But two sentences later, he introduced the expression “Bade und Inhalationsräume,” which is an obvious contradiction.

The origin of this expression, as regards the “inhalations,” remains an unsolved and perhaps unsolvable mystery, but considering it can assist in evaluating the testimony containing it.

⁹⁶ German translation of a letter by K. Thomas to the World Jewish Congress in New York dated December 3, 1961. ZStL, AR-Z 251/59, Vol. 5, p. 1027.

⁹⁷ Kuprex or Cuprex was a copper-based liquid lice-killing preparation (Kupferpräparat) with which the hair was vigorously rubbed; after an hour, the hair was washed with hot water and soap (see Kirstein, p. 75).

Finally, Reder's and Gerstein's statements about the killing building remain to be examined in the light of Dr. Kola's archaeological investigations, which I have examined thoroughly elsewhere, to which I refer.⁹⁸ From an orthodox point of view, the result was a total failure, as Robert O'Neil shortly afterwards (O'Neil, p. 55) implied:

"We found no trace of the gassing barracks dating from either the first or second phase of the camp's construction."

In his 2000 book where Dr. Kola disclosed the results of his investigations, he tried to pass off the imprint in the soil of a building that was "undoubtedly built entirely of wood [całkowicie z drewna]," which he labeled "G" and which measured 3.5 m × 15 m, as the imprint of the second killing building. From the point of view of what witnesses have claimed, this is absurd for two reasons: First of all, because the building in question was said to have been made of concrete, and second of all, because the building had to measure either 11.5 m × 15 m (two sets of three rooms of 5 m × 5 m, separated by a 1.5-m corridor), 9.5 m × 15 m (4 m × 5 m rooms) or 11.5 m × 12 m (5 m × 4 m rooms). All these sizes are irreconcilable with those found: 3.5 m × 15 m.

Kola noted that Reder had mentioned a concrete structure and commented (Kola, p. 60):

"Research surveys carried out in this area showed no traces of any masonry or concrete structure, which undermines the reliability of this [Reder's] report on this issue."

But "this issue" is the fundamental and essential one: were there homicidal gas chambers at Bełżec, or were there not?

⁹⁸ Mattogno 2016, Section IV.5., pp. 92-96; Mattogno/Kues/Graf, Chapter 11.

Conclusion

In summarizing and concluding, we have established that orthodox Holocaust historiography on the Bełżec Camp has been resting on only two legs since 1945: the two “eyewitness accounts” by Rudolf Reder, who was evidently a premeditated liar, and by Kurt Gerstein, a deranged and raving lunatic. Moreover, despite matching parametric points, the statements of these witnesses are structurally in conflict, which makes a coherent reconstruction consistent with both testimonies impossible.

For that reason, two different orthodox historiographies arose from the beginning: the Polish one, which slighted Gerstein and immediately relied on Reder, whereas Western orthodox Holocaust historians, who knew only the “Gerstein Report,” took his story as Gospel, thus giving official sanction to the tale that Diesel-engine exhaust gases were used in the Bełżec “gas chambers” for mass murder, a method that was later also attributed to the Treblinka Camp and (with some uncertainty) to the Sobibór Camp.

But when the amply-documented technical article by revisionist engineer Friedrich Paul Berg on the ineffectiveness of Diesel engines as a killing tool was published in 1984, orthodox Holocaust historians gradually turned to the gasoline engine as the murder weapon, which would indeed have been far-more-effective. They then cited Reder’s statements instead in support of their new tack, who had in fact always talked about a gasoline engine.

But here they came up against the main and most-striking contradiction: Reder indeed mentioned a gasoline engine, but he also explicitly stated that the exhaust gases it produced “were discharged by the engine directly to the outside and not into the chambers.” In other words, Reder himself excluded the emissions of gasoline engines from the agents used to kill the victims.

“I don’t know whether any gas was released through these pipes into the chambers, whether the air in the chambers was compressed or whether the air was pumped out of the chambers.” (29.12.1945)

In this flimsy testimonial framework, historians who cite to Reder's statements to substantiate their thesis of gas chambers infused with gasoline-engine-exhaust gases consistently omit this crucial element of Reder's testimony, which renders homicidal gassings impossible with the system described by him: "were discharged by the engine directly to the outside and not into the chambers." To stay on this specific point, orthodox Holocaust historians face the dilemma that they have to pick either a gasoline engine that could kill but presumably did not affect the victims (Reder) or a Diesel engine that allegedly caused it, but was incapable of doing so.

Michael Tregenza thought to overcome this impasse by throwing out Reder and Gerstein altogether and invoking Wilhelm Pfannenstiel and the SS defendants at the Belżec Trial instead, but this option is no-more-sustainable than the others, because, as I explained in my study Belżec: Propaganda, Testimonies, Archeological Research, and History, they limited themselves to regurgitating insipid summaries of the orthodox version then en vogue that had been ordained "self-evident" and not open to any substantial challenge within the German legal system.

The archaeological investigations led by Prof. Dr. Andrej Kola inflicted the final blow to the already-very-shaky orthodox narrative on the Belżec Camp: on the one hand, Kola's research results explicitly contradicted both Reder and Gerstein regarding mass graves, and on the other hand, they confirmed the absence of any archaeological traces of the presumed gas chambers.

Забрали меня в Бельзец в июле 1942 года. Бельзец находится на расстоянии 60-70 км от Львова и представляет собой узловую железно-дорожную станцию, из которой идут дороги на Варшаву, Ярославль, Томашев, Замость. От основной магистрали идет построенная немцами одноколейная ветка, идущая в специально построенное немцами сооружение, приспособленное для уничтожения людей. Это сооружение представляло из себя три барака, состоящей из 250 человек /двести пятьдесят/ два барака для работающих евреев в составе 500 человек /пятьсот/, здание под названием " " /"Баня и дезинфекция"/, над входом в это здание висел газон с цветами; следующим зданием была кухня, склад для вещей убитых и продуктов питания для работающих и охраны, поликлиника для охраны.

Баня была сделана из бетона, остальные бараки были все деревянные. Когда меня привезли в Бельзец, то один из эсэсовцев спросил, кто какую имеет специальность. Я назвал себя машинистом, а так как им нужен был такой работник, то они оставили меня работать на бензиновом двига-

Introduction

As is widely known, “Sonderkommando” is the term used for the labor units that, according to orthodox Holocaust historiography, consisted mostly of Jewish inmates and worked in the crematoria and the purported homicidal gas chambers at the Auschwitz and Birkenau Concentration Camps. According to the testimonies of persons claiming to have been participants, their main task was to extract corpses from the homicidal gas chambers after a mass execution, to remove from their corpses anything of potential value to the SS, and to either cremate them in cremation furnaces or in outdoor fires, or to bury them in mass graves. In the second half of 1942, they claim also to have been forced to exhume tens of thousands of corpses from mass graves, and to burn these on outdoor fires. Filip Müller (1922-2013), who was deported from Slovakia to Auschwitz on April 13, 1942, and registered there under Number 29236, is one of the best-known among the putative witnesses of the so-called “Sonderkommando” of the Auschwitz and Birkenau crematoria, and he is undoubtedly considered the most-authoritative in Western orthodox Holocaust historiography. For example, the late US historian Raul Hilberg explicitly recommended only two memoirs on Auschwitz in his main work The Destruction of the European Jews: the memoirs of the former camp commandant Rudolf Höss (Höss 1959) and of Filip Müller (Müller 1979b; see Hilberg 2003, p. 1331). Hilberg cites both works repeatedly in his book.

But Müller is also highly appreciated in Polish historiography: in Volume III, “Mass Murder,” of the Auschwitz Museum’s five-volume work on the history of the camp, Franciszek Piper mentions him no less than 36 times! (Piper 2000)

This dubious fame comes almost exclusively from his rather late and incredibly overrated 1979 book Auschwitz Inferno: The Testimony of a Sonderkommando. The Holocaust historians who limn it usually overlook with great nonchalance Müller’s previous statements, which already taken by themselves inexorably shake Müller's trustworthiness down to their foundations. They also neglect the gross plagiarism, the obvious falsehoods and the glaring contradictions of his book's claims with respect to the orthodox Auschwitz narrative, which demolish the credibility of these memoirs completely. Faithful to their misleading method, centered on the axiom that all incriminating witnesses have always or at least basically told the truth, these historians, in their historical "reconstruction" of the alleged extermination process at Auschwitz, intentionally ignore the striking contradictions that put these witness statements in an insurmountable mutual conflict. This is true above all as to Müller and as to the main source – but not the only one – of his plagiarisms: Miklós Nyiszli, whose various statements I analyzed in a dedicated study (Mattoigno 2020a).

Dov Paisikovic (1924-1988), Müller's self-claimed companion in misfortune in the "Sonderkommando" of Birkenau, did not share in Müller's media fortunes, no doubt because no book of his authorship about his alleged war-time experiences has found the light of day. His statements, although detailed, remain virtually unknown even to experts in the field. Dr. Franciszek Piper, the former head of the Auschwitz Museum's historical research department, refers to him only once, and moreover only in a footnote, where he limits himself to saying that "[During the Auschwitz Trial,] Paisikovic stated that a physician always looked through a peephole" of the gas-chamber door (Piper 2000, p. 180, Note 526). Dutch cultural historian Dr. Robert van Pelt, who gained the limelight of orthodox Holocaust scholarship with his 1999 expert report on Auschwitz during the libel trial of British Historian David Irving against U.S. authority on Jewish History Dr. Deborah Lipstadt and her publisher, does not mention Paisikovic at all in his 2002 book on Auschwitz. Van Pelt wasn't too fond of Filip Müller either, because he mentioned him only twice, and then almost only in passing (van Pelt, pp. 149, 205).

However, due to Paisikovic's persona as an "eyewitness" to the alleged extermination activity at Birkenau, his statements should garner greater interest among historians.

Much better-known is Alter Szmul Feinsilber (or Fajnzylberg), alias Stanisław Jankowski (1911-1977), also an "eyewitness" of the "Sonderkommando" who, together with Henryk Tauber and Szlama Dragon, is part of the Auschwitz Museum's great testamentary trinity. Jankowski was interrogated in Krakow by Deputy Prosecutor Edward Pełchalski on April 16, 1945, and in a 1971 Polish book publishing the "manuscripts" of former "Sonderkommando" prisoners, his deposition was introduced as a "valuable source of information" (Bezwińska/Czech 1971/1973, p. 7).

Jankowski arrived in Auschwitz on March 27, 1942, and was registered under Number 27675. At first, he was sent to Birkenau, where he stayed for five weeks, then he was transferred to the Auschwitz Main Camp and housed in Block 11, where he stayed until the autumn of 1942, but spent the first five weeks in the hospital. In November 1942, Jankowski was assigned to the crematorium, where Müller claims to have met him. Müller characterized him as “my friend Stanislaw Jankowski” (“mein Freund Stanislaw Jankowski,” Müller 1979a, p. 82; the English edition omits the name: “A friend of mine,” Müller 1979b, p. 51).

In the present study, I examine his testimony above all as a source of Müller’s plagiarism, but I also dedicate a specific chapter to him (see Chapter 9).

Where I considered it appropriate for comparative reasons, I quote from statements by Szlama Dragon¹ and Henryk Tauber.²

The next three witnesses of the “Sonderkommando” dealt with in this study – Henryk Mandelbaum, Ludwik Nagraba and Joshua Rosenblum – don’t report knowing the first three nor either report knowing one another; their statements are little known or unknown, but nevertheless deserve adequate exposure. I will deal with them in Chapters 10 and 11.

Strictly speaking, David Fliamenbaum was not part of the “Sonderkommando” in the sense that he did not explicitly claim such a function, but he claimed to have been an eyewitness to the alleged events inside the Birkenau crematoria, and it is precisely this quality that makes the members of the “Sonderkommando” important. Fliamenbaum’s statements, made during a Soviet interrogation of March 1, 1945, have been completely unknown so far, like the witness himself, but they are not without relevance, because they represent one of the intermediate stages in the literary evolution of the gas-chambers narrative from the many initial, naive and crude thematic variations of the years 1942-1943, which then gradually crystallized in the final, more-or-less-consistent version imposed and sanctioned in 1945 by the Soviet Commission of Inquiry in its well-known report of May 7, 1945 (see in this regard Mattogno 2021).

Aaron Pilo and Samij Karolinskij are two minor witnesses; the first is almost-unknown, the other completely unknown to Holocaust historiography.

The testimonies of two more-important witnesses who claim to have been members of the Auschwitz “Sonderkommando” – Henryk Tauber for Crematorium II and Szlama Dragon for the so-called bunkers – are analyzed in a separate study (Mattogno 2021a).

Part 1:

Filip Müller's False Testimony

1. Müller's First Statement

1.1. The Statement Published by Ota Kraus & Erich Kulka (1946)

In the following pages, I reproduce in full the first two statements by Müller in chronological order, and summarize the others, given their excessive length. In this way, I present an exhaustive picture of Müller's testimony, providing all requisites for a sound historical evaluation of it.

One of the first general historical descriptions of the Auschwitz Camp, the 1946 book The Death Factory (Továrna na smrt), written by Ota Kraus and Erich Schön (Kulka), two former camp inmates, contains a statement by Müller on Auschwitz,³ which I quote from the published English translation of the book, with an eye to the original text and the German translation. Original text missing in, or significantly different from, the published English translation is added here in brackets (Kraus/Kulka 1966, pp. 156-160; subsequently referred to as the Kraus-Kulka Statement):

"I came to Auschwitz I on April 20th, 1942, with the first Slovak convoy and at first I worked in the camp like all the other prisoners.

On May 24th, 1942, I was with a friend of mine. We were terribly thirsty and had somehow managed to get some water. For this we were punished by being sent to the crematorium to work at the gas chamber. When we arrived, we found some hundreds of corpses, fully dressed, and luggage lying about on the ground. We were filled with unspeakable horror as we saw what we were expected to do. Five prisoners were already working there. We had to carry the corpses to the furnaces.

The SS man in charge of us, a man of about twenty named Starck, struck me with a stick, remarking that I had only to finish my work and then I too would go into the furnace. Two Slovak doctors in their despair told Starck they would rather he shot them dead.

Having had no previous experience of stoking furnaces, we bungled things badly. Fire broke out at the crematorium, which made it impossible for the corpses to be burnt. The SS blamed us for sabotage, and four of our comrades were killed on this account.

When the fire was put out, Starck brought seven more prisoners. We loaded the remaining corpses onto three lorries, and then followed the most ghastly journey I have ever undertaken.

It was late at night and I sat in the last lorry on a heap of corpses. Behind us was a small car marked on the sides and roof with a large Red Cross; the headlights dazzled us and lit up our grim load. All the time we were guarded by SS men, armed with automatic rifles.

The lorries struck out across a field behind the camp and stopped at a marshy pit. Here we threw the corpses into the water in the pit. This work went on until three o'clock in the morning, after which we returned to the camp. They locked us in a dark cell in Block 11, the execution block, where we waited, dirty and stained with blood, without any food or water, until noon the following day.

When we were let out, we each got a loaf of bread.

Then they took us out to our pit on a fire engine; it was at Brzezinka, near the newly built concentration camp at Birkenau. We had to wait a long time while they drained the water from the pit. Not far from us we saw another group of prisoners digging some new pits. We discovered later that this was the Sonderkommando from Birkenau.^[4]

Then it started! They drove us down into the pit where we stood up to our waists in the swamp. Our task was to place the corpses on one heap so as to make room for more. SS officers and men stood on the edge of the pit and amused themselves watching the disgusting work we had to do. They kept throwing stones at us to make us work faster. Finally, when we had sprinkled the corpses with chlorine and earth, they took us back to the camp where we were again put in the dark cell which we had occupied up to August, 1943. We worked at the crematorium from morn till night.

I experienced a great deal at the crematorium and I saw sights that the world ought never to have to hear about. It was not intended that I, an eye witness, should survive, nor did I myself suppose that I should ever be at liberty again. I do not want, nor would I be able to describe everything in detail. There is too much of it and it is so horrible that many would not believe it. And even today I cannot grasp all that I witnessed.

At Auschwitz crematorium I had to be present at the executions performed by SS Palitsch who carried out the sentences passed by the Camp Gestapo. He was a professional mass murderer. His victims, mostly political prisoners, were made to line up in fives against the wall, and Palitsch merely fired. ...

June 17th, or 18th, 1942, was a beautiful sunny day. The camp was thoroughly tidied up at great speed. We noticed that the SS were all on edge. Evidently something was in the wind but we had no idea what it could be, except that we suspected that some V.I.P. was due to visit the camp.

At about half-past nine, a high-ranking SS officer in a white uniform appeared at the entrance to the crematorium enclosure, accompanied by two SS officers. It was Himmler himself. He made a careful inspection of everything. We were in the room containing the clothes of persons who had been executed when he came round. At the sight of these blood-stained garments, he turned to our SS chiefs in great surprise and asked why they were in this state. Dissatisfied with the answer he was given, he flew into a rage and thundered: 'We need the clothing of these accursed dogs for our German people! It's a waste to gas people in their clothes!'

After this the gas chambers were converted into mock bathrooms with water-pipes and taps, and the people had to undress before they went to their death [were gassed].

In the summer of 1943, the furnaces and chimneys at the Auschwitz crematorium caught fire. Nazi engineers renovated them, but three months later the same thing happened again. Meanwhile four crematoria had been started up at Birkenau, and it was to this camp that we were now transferred. We joined the Sonderkommando and lived in Block 13 in the men's camp, BIId.

Part of the work at the Auschwitz crematorium was the filling of urns. We put ash and dust from a great heap into urns, closed them with metal lids, and stamped them with the name of a victim, the date of his birth and death; the details were taken from lists supplied to us by the Political Department. The urns were packed in wooden crates, about 8 in. × 8 in. × 16 in., and addressed to the relatives who had to pay 2000 crowns per urn. It goes without saying that no urns were sent to the relatives of the Jews.

Many of these urns were sent to Bohemia and Moravia, but none of them contained the ashes of the person whose name was marked on top. When I was transferred from Auschwitz I to Birkenau, there were about 4000 urns there already filled in advance.

At Birkenau life was a little freer. I found several fellow-countrymen in the camp. After evening roll-call I used to climb over the wall of our isolated block and visit my friends in the camp, more especially at the locksmiths' workshop. I found that while they had been able to form a clear idea of the general extent and function of Birkenau, they did not know all the details that I was able to pass on to them. We were continually making plans to escape but never succeeded in bringing it off.

Work at the Birkenau crematoria was the same as at Auschwitz, except that at Auschwitz the crematorium was only a small affair whereas at Birkenau it was an enormous factory – four factories, in fact – turning out death on an assembly line.

I started work at Crematorium I.^[5] I was proposed for the post of Kapo, since my prison number was lower than those of all the others working there [at the crematorium], which meant that I was the oldest prisoner. I did not accept this function, and by way of punishment was transferred to Crematorium IV. Here there was more work since the mechanical apparatus was not so efficient [as in Crematorium I] and burnt only about 1500 people every twenty-four hours. Here I witnessed the 'scientific' experiments performed by SS doctors Fischer, Klein and Mengele. Between 100 and 150 men and women, aged from eighteen to thirty, were selected [from the transports] and shot – unlike the other prisoners who were gassed. A piece of flesh was then cut from their thighs and forwarded to the Bacteriological Institute at Rajsko [where bacteria were cultured]. One of the SS, who was acting as assistant to an SS doctor, told me all about it, remarking that horse meat would have done just as well but would have been a waste.

The youngest women also served as a source of blood which would be drained from their veins for several minutes until they collapsed, after which they would be thrown half-dead into the fire. The blood was poured from a pail into special bottles which were then hermetically sealed. I was told that it was urgently needed at the military hospitals.

In the summer of 1944 SS Forst [Voss], who up to then had been our chief, was replaced by SS Moll, apparently because of his lack of organizing ability and energy. Moll reorganized everything and ordered pits to be dug for the corpses. If there was a lot of work to do, he would even lend a hand himself in throwing the corpses into the pits, rolling up his sleeves and working at double speed. This fanatical madman, who neither smoked nor drank, often declared that an order was an order, and that if the Führer were to order him to burn his own wife and child he would not hesitate to do so.

Moll's sole source of pleasure was human blood and shooting, and his favourite amusement was to play with children whose mothers were waiting for death. He would go up to the mother with a smile, kiss her child, give it a piece of chocolate, and then take the child away with the promise that he would be coming back. Then he would throw the child alive into sizzling human fat [that was draining in channels from the burning pyre]. At the end of the day, when he had done this several times, he would pronounce with satisfaction: 'I've done enough for the Fatherland today!', after which he would order his servant, a French prisoner, to bring him something to eat.

In his spare time he used to go fishing in the Vistula. Twice he took me with him to his private flat at Auschwitz, to bring clothing for his wife and son. His son, aged about seven, asked when he would bring him some more pictures and storybooks. I had the impression the lad knew that the things his father brought him were from people killed at Birkenau.^[6]

I saw nationals of almost all the nations of Europe die in the gas chambers. Those from the Czech Jewish family camp were the only ones to go to their death singing their national anthem. [French female inmates sang the Marseillaise while on trucks riding to the gas chambers]

⁶ During the interrogation on May 10 and 11, 1945 by Judge Jan Sehn, Szlama Dragon stated with reference to Moll: "His wife and two children /a son of about 10 years and a younger daughter of about 7/ lived in Oświęcim." AGK, NTN 93, Vol. 11 (Höss Trial, Vol. 11), p. 109. This was a false rumor at best, because during the Dachau Trial, in which Moll was a defendant, it was established that at the end of 1945 he was 30 years old, married and had two children, one 3 years old, the other 9 months old. Trial of Martin Gottfried Weiss and Thirty-Nine Others. General Military Government Court of the United States Zone, Dachau, Germany, 15th November-13th December, 1945, Vol. VII, pp. 1972f., session of December 8, 1945.

I am the oldest member of the Auschwitz and Birkenau Sonderkommando and the only one to have been through everything [who survived everything]. I only escaped death as a result of a number of lucky chances; it was indeed a miracle.

What I went through seems incredible to me today, like some sort of evil dream. It was much more terrible than could ever be described."

1.2. The Deposition at the Krakow Trial (1947)

On December 11, 1947, Müller testified as a witness for the prosecution during the sixteenth session of the trial against the Auschwitz camp garrison (the Krakow Trial, November 25 to December 16, 1947). This testimony is still unpublished, hence deserves to be reported in full:⁷

"I was Inmate No. 29236 of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp. I arrived at the Auschwitz Concentration Camp in April 1942. In May 1942, I was assigned to Block 11, and in that block, I suffered terrible harassment. It consisted primarily of the fact that we could not get any water to drink at all. As a result of this, I was forced to go at 6 in the morning in search of the leftover tea that was in the courtyard of Block 11, so I had to 'organize it,' as they said in a certain way in the camp. When doing this, the Oberscharführer of Block 11 caught me, and led me to a special room. In the afternoon, Camp Commandant Aumeier arrived in that room, who of course asked me what I had done. Then he took me to another room and, after taking 6 other prisoners, he led us all to the gate of the Auschwitz Camp. By order of Aumeier, the guards took us from the gate of the Auschwitz Camp to the old crematorium of Auschwitz. So, from May 1942 until January 18, 1945, I was present at the gassing [przy gazowaniu] in the crematorium. After we arrived at the crematorium, Aumeier handed us over to his subordinate Unterscharführer Stark, who led us with many blows to the gas chamber and opened it. In that chamber was the first gassed Slovakian transport. These inmates had been gassed in their clothes. Since we were being beaten without interruption and had no experience of running the crematorium facilities, we started a fire in the Auschwitz crematorium. As a result, the gassed victims could not be cremated.

On Aumeier's initiative, two trucks were taken that same evening, at midnight, and the rest of the corpses, about 800, were loaded onto the trucks, and brought to the vicinity of Birkenau. We reached Birkenau at about one in the morning, and were escorted by the Red Cross, which illuminated us from behind with a spotlight. In this car was the defendant Aumeier, as well as the head of the Political Department Grabner. While being violently beaten, we were forced to unload the corpses quickly into pits in which there was still water, so that the work lasted about two days. After that work, bloody, dirty, we were taken to Block 11 and locked up in Cell 13. We were led there by another

⁷ APMO, Proces zalogi, Vol. VII, pp. 1-4; subsequently referred to as Krakow Statement.

Unterscharführer who was on night duty, and all six of us were locked up. The following day, around two o'clock, after lunch, we were taken to the gate of the Auschwitz Camp, and there we waited for the fire engine, painted green, in which were Aumeier and Grabner.

We got into the car, and went to the place where we had thrown the bodies the day before. First, we had to pile up the corpses in the mud in a heap, but since it couldn't be done with precision, we were beaten good and proper. For all this work, the main initiative came from the head of the Political Department Grabner and from Aumeier. Then we doused the corpses with chlorine, and were again locked up in Block 11, Cell 13.

We stayed in Cell 13 of the Bunker for a year and a half, that is, until the Auschwitz crematorium was liquidated. I met the defendants Aumeier and Grabner, that is, I saw them at least once a day, almost until the Auschwitz crematorium was liquidated, so I would like to mention a couple of incidents about their behavior.

At that time most of the Kapos of the crematorium were Germans. One day, a Kapo had a bandaged hand. Unterscharführer Grabner went to him and asked him:

'Fritz, why is your hand bandaged?,' to which Fritz replied, 'I have killed five Jews again.' 'Imbecile, you don't use your hand for this, you have iron [żelazo] for this, if you kill five, you will have [another] ten [to kill], and if you kill ten, you will have [another] twenty.'

In the Auschwitz Camp, I also saw that the tissue of executed non-Jewish inmates was used for various purposes. These people were often shot in the presence of Dr. Mengele and others, whose names I do not know, and in the presence of Aumeier and Grabner. Immediately afterwards, the flesh from their calves was placed in crates, so that on average 6–8 crates of flesh were taken in a week.

It sometimes happened that a German commission came with swastikas on their arms, and asked in the presence of Aumeier and Grabner if it was human flesh. Aumeier replied: 'Horse meat could also be used, but what a pity [to waste] horse meat!'

Unterscharführer Grabner was also guilty of the fact that urns were shipped with completely false ashes of the victims, that is, 3,000 urns were filled with ordinary ash, which were then stored in the SS hospital in front of the crematorium, then, by direct order of the Political Department, they were shipped off.

I saw Aumeier and Grabner shooting Russian prisoners in Block 11, as well as Polish political prisoners. When it seemed to Aumeier and Grabner that this [the shooting] was proceeding too slowly, they hit them even before they died, and they said faster [prędzej].

When Polish political prisoners shouted 'Long live free Poland,' before dying, they separated them and shot them in the abdomen, so that they had an agonizing death lasting two or three hours.

Untersturmführer Grabner, as I have already said, was the main accomplice and promoter of the crematorium at Auschwitz, not Birkenau.

There were cases where corpses with severed heads were brought from Kattowitz: these corpses were brought by the Kattowitz Security Police.

Grabner and Aumeier also participated in the selection of sick and weak people in the hospitals, and handed them over for execution. Untersturmführer Grabner participated in all the selections for the crematorium until 1943. All selections that took place in the crematorium were made in the presence of Grabner until 1943, and also in the presence of Aumeier. Hauptscharführer Palitzsch and Unterscharführer Stark usually did the shooting, and they always received detailed instructions from them during executions.”

1.3. Later Statements

Müller also testified as a witness for the prosecution during the Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial (December 20, 1963 to August 20, 1965), where he was subjected to a very long interrogation during the 97th and 98th sessions (October 5 and 8, 1964).⁸ It took place in German, a language that the witness, a native to the Slovak language, knew but had not mastered completely, which is why his answers are at times cumbersome and unclear, and often the interpreter Stegmann had to intervene to explain to the Court what he meant.

As mentioned earlier, Müller published his memoir Sonderbehandlung/Auschwitz Inferno in 1979, and between 1978 and 1981, he granted a long-winded interview to the French Jewish activist Claude Lanzmann, which was recorded and later included in Lanzmann’s documentary Shoah, which exists also in an abridged book version (Lanzmann 1985).

Overall, these later statements contain conspicuous discrepancies with respect to the two earlier ones, the most-important of which lies in the fact that in the early statements he focused his alleged experiences almost exclusively on the crematorium of the Auschwitz Main Camp, but in his later statements, he predominantly reports on his alleged activities at the “Sonderkommando” of Birkenau.

In the 1946 testimony, the account relating to Birkenau is fleeting and vague, completely devoid of any reference to the alleged extermination process, and is practically reduced to a fatuous anecdote. At that time, little or nothing was known about the alleged gas chambers of Birkenau, and the two editors of Továrna na smrt were former Auschwitz inmates and personal friends of Müller. Hence, it would have made no sense for him to hide from his friends the presumably most-relevant aspect of his experiences at the camp – meaning his alleged activities in the Birkenau crematoria. The fact that in this statement he spoke for the most part only about the Auschwitz crematorium confirms, therefore, that in 1946 he knew nothing of the Birkenau crematoria. This issue is of fundamental importance for establishing the credibility of the witness. It will be examined more-thoroughly in Chapter 5.

During the Krakow Trial, Müller did not mention his alleged experiences at Birkenau at all. Although it is true that this trial's focus was on the defendants Grabner and Aumeier, who were mainly implicated in the use of the alleged gas chamber inside the old crematorium of the Main Camp, it is also true that the witnesses for this trial were chosen on the basis of their ability to testify; nothing would have prevented Müller from testifying also on the crematoria of Birkenau, if he had had relevant information to report on this.

It should also be noted that Hans Stark, a former SS Untersturmführer in charge of inmate admissions at Auschwitz-Birkenau, was a completely marginal figure in Müller's two earlier statements, whereas his deposition during the Auschwitz Trial is completely centered around Stark, thus transforming him into the main actor of the claimed homicidal gassings. The reason for this is easy to see: at the Auschwitz Trial, Müller was called to testify especially against Stark. This is another example of Müller's testimonial opportunism.

In practice, his entire "eyewitness account," with all the value he attached to it, almost completely unfolded in the crematorium at the Main Camp:

"I experienced a great deal at the crematorium and I saw sights that the world ought never to have to hear about. It was not intended that I, an eye witness, should survive, nor did I myself suppose that I should ever be at liberty again." (Kraus-Kulka Statement)

Therefore, if Müller subsequently spoke of his alleged experiences in the Birkenau crematoria, the relevant statements cannot be truthful and necessarily have to come from Holocaust literature. During the 98th session of the Frankfurt Trial, he candidly asserted (Fritz Bauer..., p. 20717):

"I have a certain amount of literature in my library, which contains a number of authentic pictures showing this concentration camp."

He exploited this literature in an unscrupulous way, up to the most-brazen plagiarism, as I will document later. His main sources, which I will analyze in detail in Chapters 4 and 5, are in fact:

1. with regard to the Birkenau crematoria: Myklós Nyiszli's 1946 book I was Doctor Dr. Mengele's Anatomist at the Auschwitz Crematorium (in its 1961 German serialized translation);
2. for various information and drawings of the Birkenau crematoria: Ota Kraus's and Erich Schön's Czech-language book The Death Factory (1946/1957a).

In addition, he used Stanisław Jankowski's deposition of April 16, 1945 for the Auschwitz crematorium, Danuta Czech's German-language articles "Kalendarium of Auschwitz" (1961-1964) for the general history of the camp, and finally Rudolf Höss's autobiographic writings, published in the German original in 1958 (Broszat), for various information.

Before retracing the literary provenance of Müller's statements on Birkenau's "Sonderkommando," it is necessary to examine whether at least his narration relating to the crematorium at the Auschwitz Main Camp is credible.

2. Müller's "Experiences" at the Main Camp Crematorium

2.1. Arrival and Duration of Stay at the Crematorium

First of all, it is necessary to establish the time limits of Müller's stay in the crematorium, starting from the day he arrived there. In the Kraus-Kulka Statement, he claimed that he was assigned there on May 24, 1942. In the Frankfurt Statement (97th session) he declared that he arrived in Auschwitz on April 13, 1942 and was transferred to Birkenau the next day, where he remained for five to seven days. Later he said that he went to Birkenau on April 14 or 15, stayed there for three to four days and then was sent back to the Auschwitz Main Camp. After a couple of days, he was assigned to the "Buna Kommando" for eight to ten days, but in early May, he was sent back to Auschwitz, where he was assigned to the crematorium one Saturday.

Müller was quite sure it was a Saturday, because he explained that "the inmates always slept in on Saturdays, (there was an hour) or maybe more to sleep in." (Fritz Bauer..., p. 20465)

It would therefore be the first Saturday of May 1942, which fell on May 2. This dating is in evident contrast with that of May 24, which was moreover a Sunday. Also in his book, Müller said that "It was a Sunday in May 1942" (Müller 1979b, p. 1), but he did not indicate the date. He remained at the Main Camp's crematorium for about six weeks until the end of June 1942 (Fritz Bauer ..., p. 20506):

"Witness Filip Müller: I was in the Auschwitz crematorium until about the end of June or the beginning of August [sic], I can't, I can't [remember] that.

Presiding Judge (interrupts): Well, roughly how many weeks was it?

Witness Filip Müller: Six weeks.

Presiding Judge: Six weeks.

Witness Filip Müller: About six weeks."

This presupposes an arrival date around mid-May. The maximum period of the witness's stay in the crematorium therefore runs from the beginning of May to the end of June of 1942.

2.2. The Crematorium's Layout

How was the crematorium laid out at the time? The witness does not provide a description. As for the cremation's appearance, he limits himself to mentioning the three double-muffle furnaces and the round chimney ("a round red-brick chimney," Müller 1979b, p. 11). However, the "Inventory plan of Building No. 47a, BW 11. Crematorium" ("Bestandsplan des Gebäudes Nr. 47a. BW 11. Krematorium") of April 10, 1942 shows in the blueprint a square chimney (see Mattogno/Deana, Vol. II, Docs. 206, 206a, pp. 349f.).

Müller then accurately describes the device for introducing corpses into the muffles (the "corpse-introduction device" – Leicheneinführungs-Vorrichtung, although he calls it "cast-iron truck") and the "turn-table" (Drehscheibe; Müller 1979b, p. 14), which was used to turn the devices from a pair of rails running across the furnace room to one of the perpendicular sets leading to each muffle opening. Müller explicitly states that the system lacked an essential device – the pair of rollers (Laufrollen) onto which the side rails of the corpse-introduction stretcher were placed and which served to center the stretcher when it was pushed in, and to prevent it from dropping down onto the refractory grate prematurely, which could damage it. Müller mentions later, when talking about Crematorium II in Birkenau, that its furnaces had such rollers as the only "important innovation" (Müller 1979b, p. 59). Fact is, however, that the furnaces at the Main Camp's crematorium were also equipped with these rollers. He probably claimed they didn't exist, because the two furnaces on display in this building today were badly rebuilt by the museum right after the war, leaving out the rollers in the process, while the corpse-introduction device was mounted correctly (Mattogno/Deana, Vol. I, pp. 261f.). This suggests that Müller's description in his book is not exclusively based on his memory (if at all), but at least to some degree on post-war observations.

After preheating the furnace, the corpses were placed in the muffles – three at a time (Müller 1979b, p. 15). In this regard, the witness states (ibid., p. 16):

"The powers that be had allocated twenty minutes for the cremation of three corpses. It was Stark's duty to see to it that this time was strictly adhered to."

He then adds that 54 corpses could be cremated in the three double-muffle furnaces within one hour, hence three corpses every 20 minutes in each muffle (ibid., p. 17). These claims put Müller's tale squarely into the realm of fantasy, because the cremation capacity of the Auschwitz double-muffle furnaces was one corpse per hour and muffle, or six corpses per hour in the six muffles (Mattogno/Deana, Vol. I, pp. 251-265, 312-341). Therefore, Müller increased the actual furnace capacity by a factor of nine! I will return to this question in Chapter 6.

2.3. The Crematorium Fire and the Chimney's Reconstruction

On the first day of the witness's claimed activity at the crematorium, he was about to undress the corpses of the gassing victims, but then he was assigned to work on the actual cremations. In his first two statements, the related account is somewhat vague:

"Having had no previous experience of stoking furnaces, we bungled things badly. Fire broke out at the crematorium, which made it impossible for the corpses to be burnt." (Kraus-Kulka Statement)

"Since we were being beaten without interruption and had no experience of running the crematorium facilities, we started a fire in the Auschwitz crematorium. As a result, the gassed victims could not be cremated." (Krakow Statement)

This was the prelude to his alleged dispatch to a mass grave in Birkenau, which I will deal with later. At the Frankfurt Trial (97th session), Müller tried to formulate a somewhat-more-credible story. Together with another inmate, Maurice Lulus, he was first charged with removing the slag from the two furnaces' gas-generator grates ("die Öfen entschlacken"), then these furnaces were fired up by Stark and an inmate named Fischl, and their operation was then entrusted to the inmates Müller and Lulus (Fritz Bauer..., pp. 20475-78). Yet then, a fire broke out as follows (ibid., pp. 20478f.):

"And after that, after a few minutes, when the corpses were already burning, you had to turn on the fans – there were fans there too. And we couldn't do that, we saw it for the first time.⁹ And the fans, they were on too long, and that led to a fire in the crematorium."

Presiding Judge: A fire broke out.

Witness Filip Müller: Yes, a fire. Because the fans [ran longer] than they were allowed to, and that's why there was a fire. And then we have to extinguish it with water."

In his book, Müller embroidered this story further (Müller 1979b, p. 14).

"Stark ordered the fans to be switched on. A button was pressed and they began to rotate. But as soon as Stark had checked that the fire was drawing well they were switched off again."

This statement, which refers to the furnace's preheating phase, is nonsense, technically speaking. Each of the crematorium's three double-muffle furnaces was equipped with an air-induction device (Druckluftanlage) with a blower (Druckluftgebläse) driven by a 1.5-HP three-phase electric motor and associated ducts (Druckluftleitung), which entered the rear of the furnace and passed through its masonry above the two muffles. The supercharged air was ultimately fed through four openings placed in the apex of the muffle ceiling. The ⁹ Meaning that the two inmates were unable to do that job because they had never seen it done before.

blower's purpose was therefore not to stoke the fire in the gas generator, but to feed combustion air (oxygen) into the muffle, which was especially important in the cases of cremations using wooden coffins (which was not the case in Auschwitz). Therefore, if the blower had remained in operation for too long, it would only have cooled the refractory masonry of the muffles.¹⁰

How many furnaces were there? At the Auschwitz Trial (97th session), Müller stated that there were three furnaces with two muffles each, only one of which was fired up, although the terms he used to describe it were incorrect and confusing (Fritz Bauer..., p. 20477):

"Presiding Judge: So the furnaces were already on fire?"

Witness Filip Müller: Yes, on fire, but only two.

Presiding Judge: Only two. And how many furnaces were there?"

Witness Filip Müller: Six. [...] Squares, these were three squares [= cuboids, blocks = furnaces]. In each square [furnace] there were two furnaces [muffles]. So six together."

In 1979, he wrote (Müller 1979b, p. 14):

"Now all six ovens [muffles] were working"

Müller then relates that the crematorium staff "had forgotten to switch off one set of fans," which is inaccurate, because each furnace with two muffles had only one blower, and here's what the claimed consequences were (ibid., p. 18):

"They had fanned the flames to such an extent that because of the intense heat the fire-bricks in the chimney had become loose and fallen into the duct connecting the oven to the chimney. This meant that the flames no longer had a way out; fiery red tongues were licking out of the oven and in no time the cremation room was enveloped in a dense fog of sickly choking smoke."

This statement makes no sense either. As explained earlier, the purpose of the blower was not to stoke the fire in the gas generator, but to feed cold combustion air into the muffle. Had the blower been left on too long, the result would have been exactly the opposite of the witness claimed: the two muffles of the furnace would have cooled down to the point where the fire in the gas generator would have gotten weaker as well due to lack of draft, further decreasing the muffles' temperature!

The "Operating Instructions for the Topf Coke-Fired Double-Muffle Cremation Furnace" ("Betriebsvorschrift des koksbeheizten Topf-Doppelmuffel-Einäscherungssofen") prescribed for the heat-generating (second) phase of the burning of a corpse:¹¹

"This increase in temperature can be prevented by blowing in air."

¹⁰ See Photo 60f. in Mattoigno/Deana, Vol. II, p. 56; and the description in Vol. I, pp. 258f., 262.

¹¹ APMO, BW 11/1, p. 3.

This fire – continues Müller – was put out only in the evening; the crematorium had become unoperational.¹²

During the Auschwitz Trial, Müller provided further, no-less-fanciful explanations (Fritz Bauer..., pp. 20578):

“Presiding Judge: Then you moreover told us that a fire had broken out in this Crematorium I in Auschwitz because you did not operate these ovens or the fans properly. What was actually burning there?”

Witness Filip Müller: It didn’t burn like that. The fans tore out the bricks. And the fire came out.

Presiding Judge: Out of where, out of the ovens?

Witness Filip Müller: Torn out of the oven, yes. And then, with water, we had to Presiding Judge (interrupts): extinguish.

Witness Filip Müller: But not a fire on the roof or something.”

This is another huge nonsense: the blowers operated at a very low pressure. By way of comparison, the three forced-draft devices originally planned for Birkenau Crematoria II & III operated with a pressure of 30 mm water column, with a 15-HP motor.¹³ About the blowers for the double-muffle furnaces we only know that they had a much-lower flow rate, since they were driven by small, 1.5-HP motors.¹⁴ But even 30 millimeters of water column equals just 0.3% of atmospheric pressure. How could such a small overpressure tear to pieces the furnace’s masonry (or that of the smoke ducts, if we follow his book’s narration)?

In his imaginative story, Müller adds more nonsense: from the alleged openings produced by the dislodged bricks, flames came out and caused the fire. This is the naïve conception of an ignoramus who thought that a cremation furnace acts like a barrel: if a hole were punched into it, the wine would flow out – or in this case the fire. If such nonsense were true, flames would have come out every time a muffle door was opened, and a fire would have started!

In reality, the gases in the muffles (cremation chambers) of a cremation furnaces always have a lower pressure than the outside air pressure due to the chimney’s draft, which increased with an increased temperature difference. It follows that a possible opening in the refractory masonry not only would not have caused flames to escape, but quite to the contrary, it would have caused large quantities of cold, outside air to rush into the furnace, cooling it down.

The witness confirmed to Lanzmann that there were “ventilators, which were used to heat up the fire,” which, as I have already explained, is false, and he added:

¹² Müller 1979a, S. 32; in the English translation, this entire paragraph was omitted: 1979b, p. 18.

¹⁴ Ibid., pp. 252f.; cost estimate of the Topf Company for a double-muffle furnace.

“So, we let them [the blowers] run for a longer time and suddenly, the fire-bricks caved in. And with that, the pipes of the Auschwitz crematorium to the chimney were blocked.” (Lanzmann 2010, pp. 8f.)

Müller stated that the fire had been extinguished with water, which is more blatant nonsense. Even the most-inept stoker would have known that throwing water into a glowing furnace would irreparably damage its refractory masonry, and even more-so, it cannot be believed that the head of the crematory would have given such an order. Furthermore, although Müller and Lulus were said to have been directly responsible for the alleged fire, Stark did not kill them, but instead four other, uninvolved inmates (Kraus-Kulka Statement) or only three (Müller 1979b, p. 18), namely: “Neumann, Goldschmidt and Filip Weiss” (Fritz Bauer..., p. 20579).

Regarding the crematorium chimney, Müller initially had scanty and confused knowledge:

“In the summer of 1943, the furnaces and chimneys at the Auschwitz crematorium caught fire. Nazi engineers renovated them, but three months later the same thing happened again.” (Kraus-Kulka Statement)

In his book, however, he linked this event to the alleged fire (Müller 1979b, p. 40):

“Prisoner bricklayers replaced the round chimney which had been destroyed during the crematorium blaze by a tall new square chimney.”

Then he adds (ibid., p. 47):

“The continuous operation of the crematorium and, most of all, the overloading of the ovens – an aspect not taken into account during their construction – led to the crumbling of the fire-bricks of the inner lining, so that there was a danger of the chimney collapsing. Therefore, in the summer of 1942 a new square chimney with a double lining of fire-bricks was added. However, operations in the crematorium continued without interruption while this work was carried out.

A team of about thirty was building the new chimney, the majority of them Jewish prisoners.”

Here Müller either attributes two different causes to the same event, or he speaks of the chimneys having been rebuilt twice, or he refers to two different chimneys. The first hypothesis involves an evident contradiction, the second is historically wrong, and the third architecturally false, as that crematorium had only one chimney. I briefly summarize the actual events, which I described at length in another study,¹⁵ but I state right up front that neither the crematorium, nor the furnaces, nor the crematorium chimney ever were on fire.

¹⁵ Mattoigno/Deana, Vol. I, Section II, Chapter 6.1., pp. 212-228.

Between 14 and 15 May 1942 a repair was made to the “Kaminunterkanal,” the smoke duct that connected the three furnaces to the chimney, with the replacement of 50 refractory bricks.

On May 30, 1942, SS Oberscharführer Josef Pollok, in his capacity as the Auschwitz Camp’s building inspector, informed the head of the Auschwitz Central Construction Office, SS Hauptsturmführer Karl Bischoff, that the chimney framing (Kamineinband) had come undone, and that cracks had opened up in the masonry, which was partly due to overheating of the chimney. On June 1, Bischoff consequently prohibited the use of the chimney, thus effectively shutting down the crematorium, and at the same time reported to SS Brigadeführer Hans Kammler, head of Office Group C of the WVHA about this. The next day, Kammler issued an order for the chimney’s immediate reconstruction. The new chimney was built by 688 inmates (and not by “about thirty”) between June 12 and August 8. The old chimney was demolished after July 6.

Müller’s claim that the crematorium remained in operation during these construction works is a factual, because it was necessary to build two new smoke ducts: one 12.20 m long, which connected Furnaces 1 and 2 to the new chimney, the other 7.37 m long for Furnace 3. In July, deliveries of coke to the crematorium fell drastically. After a delivery of five tons on the 18th, the next delivery was made only on August 10th,¹⁶ so the crematorium was certainly inactive for about twenty days, from July 20 to August 9.

Müller claimed that he worked at the crematorium until it closed, so he should have known these facts well. Instead, he told simple confabulations clearly based on second-hand information.

Later in his book, Müller returns once more to this chimney event, writing (Müller 1979b, p. 49):

“The building works department^[17] of the SS had expected that, once the new square chimney was built, operations would run smoothly and without a hitch. However, it turned out quite soon that this new chimney could not cope with the work-load: while it was in use, lining bricks kept coming loose, blocking the flue. It was no longer possible to ‘dispatch’ the transports of Jews which continued to arrive as before without constantly recurring technical trouble. Therefore, in the autumn of 1942 operations had to be restricted.” (My emphasis)

In reality, however, the crematorium was immediately put back into operation at full capacity before fully curing the new chimney’s mortar, which was subsequently damaged by the rapid evaporation of the water still contained in it, causing new cracks to form, as Bischoff wrote to the camp commandant on

The relevant documentation does not contain the slightest reference to the cremation of corpses of gassing victims. Hence, the correlation claimed by Müller between the new damage to the chimney and the alleged gassings is purely imaginary. The scenario he presented is also in direct contradiction to that presented by French orthodox historian Jean-Claude Pressac (Pressac 1993, pp. 35):

“Since each gassing necessitated the complete isolation of the crematorium area, which disrupted the camp’s activity, and because gassings were unfeasible when work was in progress, it was decided at the end of April [1942] to transfer this type of activity to Birkenau.” (Emphases added)

In other words, the current orthodox narrative has it that no gassing took place anymore inside the Main Camp’s crematorium when Müller started working there.

2.4. Mass Graves at Birkenau (1942)

As a result of the alleged crematorium fire, Müller claims that the corpses not yet cremated were brought to Birkenau on trucks, but he provides contradictory data on both the number of corpses and the number of trucks used. In his first statement he claimed that “We loaded the remaining corpses onto three lorries” (Kraus-Kulka Statement), but one year later, he declared:

“On Aumeier’s initiative, two trucks were taken that same evening, at midnight, and the rest of the corpses, about 800, were loaded onto the trucks, and brought to the vicinity of Birkenau.” (Krakow Statement)

During his testimony at the Frankfurt Trial, Müller stated (Fritz Bauer..., p. 20480):

“It may have been 400 or 500 corpses, because (some) were burned in the crematorium before the fire.”

In his book, Müller writes merely (Müller 1979b, p. 20):

“Shortly before midnight we had finished loading the fourth and last truck.”

Finally, in his interview with Lanzmann he stated:

“And later in the evening, a few trucks came and we loaded the rest, maybe 300 corpses onto the trucks.” (Lanzmann 2010, p. 9)

Hence, there were either 800, 400-500 or 300 corpses to be hauled with either two, three or four trucks. If we follow Müller, this trip, in which he participated as well, was done only once. If we take the numbers he volunteered while testifying during the Krakow Trial, then we are to believe that two trucks carried 800 corpses, hence 400 each. Even if we assume with Robert Jan van Pelt that the bodies weighed 60 kg on average (van Pelt, pp. 470, 472), each truck would have carried a load of 24 tons, but the camp documentation shows that the trucks in the camp's motor pool could carry a maximum load of 5 tons (see Mattogno 2015a, p. 55).

The second time Müller returned to the pit “on a fire engine” (Kraus-Kulka Statement), with a “fire engine” (Krakow Statement), with a “fire-brigade car” (Feuerwehrauto; Fritz Bauer..., p. 20483), which are all similar terms, but in his book, he claims to have been riding in an ambulance (Müller 1979b, p. 24), which is quite a different thing.

The story of the mass grave is completely unlikely and contrary to any organizational logic: in the middle of the night, the corpses would have been transported to Birkenau and thrown into a pit that had filled with water due to the high groundwater level, only to return the next day in order to pump the water out of the pit with a fire-brigade vehicle, to recover the corpses and pile them up “to make room for more,” and finally to cover them “with chlorine and earth” (Kraus-Kulka Statement). These operations would also have been useless, because “ground-water had seeped through into the pit” (Müller 1979b, p. 21), and after pumping it out, the pit would have filled up again, submerging the corpses again. Only a lunatic would have given such orders.

2.5. “Gassings,” the “Gas Chambers” and Zyklon B

On the first day Müller was taken to the supposed gas chamber of the Main Camp's crematorium – on May 2 or 24, 1942 – he found “the first gassed Slovakian transport” (Krakow Statement). However, Danuta Czech's Auschwitz Chronicle dates this alleged event to July 4, 1942, and the transport is not said to have been gassed in the crematorium, but in the Birkenau bunkers! (Czech 1990, pp. 191f.)

In his testimony during the Auschwitz Trial, Müller added 100 Soviet prisoners of war to the presumed gassing victims (Fritz Bauer..., p. 20470), but even for Czech this is pure fantasy. He specified that the deportees “died on their feet” (“im Stehen starben”; ibid., p. 20472¹⁹) and, incredibly, not even the defense lawyers contested such nonsense.

Having joined the “Fischl-Kommando” made up of seven inmates, Müller's task consisted initially in undressing the corpses, who evidently had not undressed before being gassed and had even brought their luggage into the gas chamber (as Müller saw “suitcases” and “packages” among the corpses; ibid., p. 20470). The senselessness of this claim, which is in striking contradiction to the orthodox narrative, becomes palpable in the witness's explanations. On ¹⁹ Meaning that they remained standing after they died, if we follow the testimonial fables already en vogue in 1945, of which I will provide other examples in the following chapters.

“June [června] 17th, or 18th, 1942” – as Müller recounts in the Kraus-Kulka Statement – Himmler presumably inspected the crematorium during his visit to Auschwitz (which took place on July 17 and 18), and saw the clothes and linen of the gassing victims in the gas chamber:

“At the sight of these blood-stained garments, he turned to our SS chiefs in great surprise and asked why they were in this state. Dissatisfied with the answer he was given, he flew into a rage and thundered: ‘We need the clothing of these accursed dogs for our German people! It’s a waste to gas people in their clothes!’

After this the gas chambers were converted into mock bathrooms with water-pipes and taps, and the people had to undress before they went to their death [were gassed].”

Hence, according to this legend,²⁰ the practice of stripping the victims before gassing them would have been introduced no earlier than July 17, 1942!

It follows that, after ten months of alleged homicidal gassings,²¹ the SS at Auschwitz had still not figured out that it was easier to have the victims undress themselves before gassing them rather than to remove the clothes from corpses. According to witness Walter Petzold, this “fatal mistake” (“verhängnisvollen Fehler”) was committed by the SS only on the occasion of the mythical first homicidal gassing in the basement of Block 11 of the Main Camp ten months earlier.²² One might expect that they had learned their lesson by the time Müller started working in the Main Camp’s crematorium.

When writing his book in 1978/79, Müller probably no longer remembered the previous nonsense and asserted that “Today this new procedure was to be tried out for the first time” in the crematorium courtyard, where “today” refers to the arrival of a transport of Polish Jews from the Sosnowice Ghetto (Müller 1979b, pp. 31f.). Müller gives no date, but a few pages later he adds that, after a rest of three days (ibid., p. 35), another transport with several hundred Polish Jews arrived who were all destined for extermination (ibid., pp. 35f.), and he specifies (ibid., p. 39):

“Afterwards this technique was used as a reliable method for the mass extermination of human beings without bloodshed, and it began to assume monstrous proportions. From the end of May 1942 one transport after another vanished in this way into the crematorium of Auschwitz.”

²⁰ Neither Czech nor her source Höss claims that Himmler visited the Main Camp’s crematorium on that occasion; instead, he is said to have witnessed a gassing at “Bunker II,” but this is also an imaginary event, as I documented in Mattoigno 2020b, Part Two, Chapter 28, “Himmler’s Visit to Auschwitz of July 17-18, 1942,” pp. 242-250.

²¹ According to the orthodox Auschwitz lore, the “first gassing” notoriously took place on September 3-5, 1941; see Czech 1990, pp. 85-87.

²² W. Petzold, “Bericht über die erste Vergasung von Gefangenen in deutschen Konzentrationslagern, Mauthausen den 17. Mai 1945.” Staatsanwaltschaft beim LG Frankfurt (Main), Strafsache beim Schwurgericht Frankfurt (Main) gegen Baer und Andere wegen Mordes, Az. Js 444/59 (Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial), Vol. 31, p. 5312.

Hence, Müller not only contradicts the orthodox Auschwitz narrative, but also himself.

According to Müller, the cremation activity resumed several days after the alleged fire (ibid., p. 30), therefore in the first ten days of May (or in early June, if we use Müller's other timeline), with the arrival of the transport of Jews from the Sosnowice Ghetto mentioned earlier (ibid., p. 32); on that occasion, 600 people were allegedly gassed in the crematorium's morgue that is said to have been repurposed as a homicidal gas chamber (ibid., p. 33).

According to the Auschwitz Chronicle, the first Jewish transport from Sosnowice arrived in Auschwitz on May 12, and it was allegedly gassed entirely in "Bunker 1" at Birkenau (Czech 1990, p. 166), not at all in the crematorium. However, there is no document in this regard. Czech's source is in fact a simple, somewhat-vague statement in a 1946 book:

"On May 12 [1942], the day of the first evacuation, the process of the systematic operation of total extermination of the Jews of Sosnowice began, which ended in January 1944." (Szternfinkiel, p. 34)

How Czech deduced from this meager "information" that a Jewish transport actually departed from the Sosnowice Ghetto on that day, that it contained 1,500 Jews, that it arrived in Auschwitz on that same day, and that all its claimed deportees were gassed without exception, and in "Bunker 1" to boot, remains a complete and utter mystery.

At this point, Müller runs into another contradiction. During the Frankfurt Trial, he stated that the members of the Birkenau "Sonderkommando" called the then SS Oberscharführer Wilhelm Boger, one of the defendants on trial, "Malech Hamuwes" – angel of death – because he brought the transport announcement:

"The 'Sonderkommando' said about Boger: 'Malech Hamuwes is coming.' That means: 'Death is coming.' In the crematorium, Boger was called: 'Malech Hamuwes is coming.' That means in Yiddish: 'Death is coming.' When Boger comes, you don't say: 'It is Boger,' but you say: 'Malech Hamuwes is coming.'" (Fritz Bauer..., pp. 20514f.)

During the interview with Lanzmann, however, this nickname appears in a completely different context. When the transport from Sosnowice arrived, consisting of 250-300 people (down from 600 in his book, although Czech insists there were 1,500 deportees), Müller heard the words of the deportees, such as "'fachowitz', which means 'a skilled tradesman'. And then I could make out, 'Malekenowis' [Malech Hamuwes], that's Yiddish for 'the angel of death'" (Lanzmann 2010, p. 19).

During the Frankfurt Trial, Müller further stated that he had witnessed gasings "many, many times" (Fritz Bauer..., p. 20498), but he only pointed to the three mentioned above. For the rest, he limited himself to generic statements:

“Gassings happened all the time. Back then – I’m talking about May, June 1942 – people were gassed either before roll call or in the evening after roll call [...]” (ibid.)

“Gassings occurred either in the evening after roll call or early before roll call, so that (at) eight o’clock, after eight o’clock, only the clothes (were there). About three times in a week people were gassed like that.” (ibid., p. 20499f.)

“It goes on like this for six weeks, as I see Stark doing this job. He must [have sent] at least – at least, I say – 10,000, 11,000 people into the gas.” (ibid., p. 20504)

“At least 10,000, 11,000 were gassed, at least from what I have seen with my eyes from one, two meters away.” (ibid., p. 20505)

To these 10,000 to 11,000 gassing victims must be added those alleged shot:

“In 1942, during the six weeks I was there, Stark shot people there, too. Those were the small transports of Jews that were picked up at the bunkers, which I have already mentioned. 80, 100, 120, 60 once, yes.” (ibid., p. 20537)

“Moreover, two are standing there who have worked with him in the gas chamber, the SS members. Yes, the Rottenführer from the Political Department and the Unterscharführer. Because one did not (gas) in the Auschwitz crematorium, if 80 or 100 people arrive; they were not gassed in this gas chamber. Only more, 500, 600, 700 or 300, like that. And back then, when more than 60, 70, 80 or 100 people arrived, the Unterscharführer shot with him together.” (ibid., p. 20538)

In his book, Müller wrote (Müller 1979b, p. 44):

“If a transport of less than 200 people arrived for liquidation then, as a rule, they were killed not by gassing but by a bullet through the base of the skull.”

Regarding the shootings, Müller asserted that Stark and Unterscharführer Klaus had killed together “at least 2,000” people, and that the tasks were divided as follows between the two (Fritz Bauer..., p. 20587):

“Klaus only shot when (transports with) 80 or 100 (people) came. But often transports arrived with only 50 or 60 people. Then Stark shoots.”

The total number of murdered victims allegedly seen by Müller within six weeks therefore amounts to 12,000-13,000. The alleged 10,000-11,000 gassing victims should correspond to about 20 transports of 500-600 people each, but as noted earlier, the witness only mentions the first three. Where did the others come from?

Czech’s Chronicle directly contradicts these statements, because for the months of May and June 1942, it records various transports destined for gassing, but they are claimed to have been sent to the Birkenau “bunkers” for extermination, and only one of these claimed transports had such a small number of deportees. I list the transports claimed by Czech in the following table:

Data	Origin	Number of Deportees
May 5-11	Dombrowa (Dąbrowa Górnica)	630
	Bendsburg (Będzin)	2,000
	Warthenau (Zawiercie)	2,000
	Gleiwitz	586
May 12	Sosnowice	1,500
June 2	Ilkenau	?
June 17	Sosnowice	2,000
June 20	Sosnowice	2,000
June 23	Kobierzyn	566

To top it off, all of these transports are completely invented, as I have demonstrated elsewhere (Mattogno 2016d, pp. 35f.).

As mentioned, the Main Camp’s crematorium was supposedly equipped with a “gas chamber,” yet during his testimony at the Auschwitz Trial, Müller was rather evasive and even enigmatic, merely stating:

“The gas chamber was not as big as I will then describe the gas chambers at Birkenau. No window in it, just above, below a fan and light.” (Fritz Bauer..., p. 20493)

Speaking of the alleged victims, the witness specified:

“No, they weren’t shot. They were gassed. But when I got there the first time, I didn’t know. Afterwards we saw that there was a hall below. There was a large fan below that was turned on. Down there, there were still such green crystals. And there were no people a meter (away) from them.” (Fritz Bauer..., p. 20471)

Where was this fan located? Below what? No one at the hearing asked the witness these obvious questions. In the book, he talked about it again, but without making the matter any clearer either (Müller 1979b, p. 13):

“I noticed that there were some small greenish-blue crystals lying on the concrete floor at the back of the room. They were scattered beneath an opening in the ceiling. A large fan was installed up there, its blades humming as they revolved.”

The side view of the “Inventory Plan of Building No. 47a, BW 11. Crematorium” mentioned earlier shows a large curved tube above the roof of the morgue, the alleged gas chamber. As I explained in detail in another study, it could only contain an air-intake fan, because for extracting the air from that morgue, a separate duct was planned connecting the room to one of the smoke ducts in the adjacent furnace room, which sucked out air from the morgue due to the low pressure created in the smoke duct by the chimney’s draft, possibly enhanced by the forced-draft system installed next to the chimney (Mattogno 2016c, pp. 83-87).

In order to function, an air-extraction fan as suggested by Müller would have required a way of letting fresh air into the room, either by way of a similar ventilation fan, or by opening of one of the two (or both) of the morgue's doors,²³ with the latter way risking contamination of the entire building with hydrogen-cyanide fumes.

The witness had never previously expressed himself clearly on the alleged introduction openings of the Zyklon B piercing the reinforced concrete roof of the crematorium. It was only in 1979 that he indicated their number, asserting that they were "six camouflaged openings" fitted with covers (Müller 1979b, p. 38). But this is notoriously in contrast to the official number of openings allegedly restored in the room by the Auschwitz Museum: four (Mattogno 2016c, Doc. 23, p. 133).

The description of Zyklon B as "green crystals," which in the book became "green-blue crystals" (Müller 1979b, p. 38) and even "purple grains" (only in the German edition, 1979a, p. 183; excised from the English translation, 1979b, p. 115), and in the interview with Lanzmann "blue-purple crystals" (2010, p. 7), was a fable already en vogue immediately after the war that the witness undoubtedly drew from Rudolf Höss's "confessions," for whom Zyklon B was precisely "a crystal-like substance," "a crystallized Prussic acid" (Mattogno 2020b, pp. 44, 66). As for the color of Zyklon B's inert carrier material, Müller makes another mistake. At the time, as it appears from the "Guidelines for the Use of Prussic Acid (Zyklon) for Destruction of Vermin (Disinfestation)" issued by the Health Authority of the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia in Prague (NI-9912), among other sources, this carrier material was made of either "a granular red-brown material ('Diagriess') of diatomaceous earth, "or small blue cubes ('Erco') of gypsum. Hence, what could have been mistaken for "crystals" with some imagination, were actually either grains of diatomaceous earth, although it had a red-brown color, or of gypsum granules which were indeed bluish (neither green, green-blue, nor blue-violet), but it would have been absurd to call them "crystals."

Given its dangerous nature, this carrier material was removed immediately from the disinfestation gas chambers as soon as the residual gas test (Gasrestprobe) was negative and allowed access to the room for specially trained personnel equipped with gas masks (see Mattogno 2004b). This would have applied also to any homicidal gassings. Müller, on the other hand, apparently performed his gas test with his sense of smell and taste, because he wrote in his book (Müller 1979a, p. 185):

"Because the gas was neither odor- nor tasteless. It smelled of burning dry alcohol and produced a sweet taste on the lips."

In the English edition, this was condensed to this brief partial sentence (Müller 1979b, p. 116):

²³ The phantom introduction openings of the Zyklon B would have been inefficient for ventilation due to the formation of laminar currents under the ceiling from the openings to the fan.

“[...] because the gas smelled of burning metaldehyde and had a sickly-sweet taste.”

So, he had inhaled it and tasted it without wearing a gas mask! This fable had already been uttered by Dragon:²⁴

“After opening, it was very hot in the room, and there was gas; it was suffocating, and it was sweet and pleasant in the mouth.”

It is therefore clear that Müller has never seen any Zyklon B in any “gas chamber,” despite his assurances to the contrary.

2.6. “Gassings” in the Crematorium: Müller versus Höss, Jankowski, Piper and Pressac

During the Polish trial staged against Rudolf Höss in Warsaw (March 11-29, 1947), the former Auschwitz commandant made two important statements about the alleged gassings in the crematorium of the Main Camp – in fact, there was only one such gassing according to him (Mattogno 2020b, pp. 214, 165):

“Women were never gassed in Crematorium I. Exclusively those Russian prisoners were gassed there.” (10th Hearing, March 21, 1947)

“After the first gassing in Block No. 11 – this was the prison building – the gassings were transferred to the old crematorium, in the so-called morgue. The gassing was done this way: holes were made through the concrete ceiling, and the gas – it was a crystalline mass – was poured through these holes into the room. I only remember one transport. 900 prisoners of war were gassed in this way. From then on, the gassing was carried out outside the camp, in Bunker I.” (11th Hearing, March 22, 1947)

Therefore, 900 Russian prisoners of war were gassed in the crematorium, after which the gassings were carried out in the “bunkers” of Birkenau. In other words, no Jewish transport was ever gassed in the morgue of the old crematorium. It should be emphasized that Czech’s Auschwitz Chronicle, and consequently the historiography of the Auschwitz Museum, is based precisely on these statements by the former camp commandant.

Müller first mentioned Jankowski in the deposition at the Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial (97th hearing), where he mistakenly referred to him as “Samuel.” The circumstances of the encounter are as follows: after the transport of the corpses to the mass grave at Birkenau, the crematorium Kommando was taken back to a cell of Block 11. On that occasion, the door was opened and three other inmates were put into that cell, including Jankowski, but Müller said nothing about his activity at the crematorium. As will be seen, the reason for this is easily understood. He merely reported that he had been transferred to

Birkenau with Jankowski (98th hearing). In his book, Müller mentions Jankowski only three times in insignificant contexts.²⁵

For his part, Jankowski, in the deposition of April 16, 1945, did not mention Müller at all, and in his 1985 report, hence after Müller's book had appeared, he mentioned a "Müller from Slovakia" only briefly as one of the six Jews who had worked at the crematorium.²⁶

It ought to be kept in mind that Müller claimed that in the crematorium there was a real "gas chamber" complete with a fan and Zyklon-B-introduction openings at least since May 1942. Furthermore, he declared with reference to this "death factory" (Müller 1979b, p. 51):

"Tens of thousands of Jews from Upper Silesia, Slovakia, France, Holland, Yugoslavia and the ghettos of Theresienstadt, Ciechanow and Grodno had been put to death and cremated there [...]"

According to Danuta Czech, however, these transports were all gassed in the Birkenau "bunkers"! Contradicting himself, Müller also wrote (ibid., p. 49):

"From the start this small 'death workshop', into whose gas chamber more than 700 people could be crammed, served to relieve the two extermination centres at Birkenau. Known as Bunker 1 and 2 these were two whitewashed farmhouses with thatched roofs, all that remained of the village of Brzezinka."

The transports listed in the table of Subchapter 2.5. (see p. 33) are all those that are said to have arrived at Auschwitz in the months of May and June 1942. If we assume that the transport from Ilkenau contained 1,500 people, just like the previous one from Sosnowice, then this means that for Müller basically all, or almost all, the transports arriving at Auschwitz would have been gassed in the crematorium: about 12,800 people. Hence, it would have been the "bunkers" (to be precise only "Bunker 1") that would have served "to relieve" the Main Camp's crematorium!

Finally, in the book, which should represent the final and most-authoritative version of his contradictory statements, Müller claimed that he remained in the crematorium until July 1943, so he must have known everything that had happened there.

In 1947, Jankowski testified the following instead:²⁷

"I declare that at the time, it was the end of 1942, there were still no gas chambers in Oświęcim [Auschwitz]. The only gassing of that period known to me took place in November or December 1942. At that time, 390 people were gassed, only Jews of various nationalities, employed in the Sonderkommando of Birkenau. This gassing was then carried out in the Leichenhalle [morgue]. I heard from people employed in the crematorium that even before this gassing some gassings had been carried out in this same Leichenhalle and in other rooms of the crematorium [i różnych ubikacjach krematorium].”

²⁷ AGK, NTN, 82, Vol. 1 (Höss Trial, Vol. 1), p. 16.

In 1985, the witness stated:²⁶

“At the crematorium, the corpses of inmates who died in the camp were cremated, the corpses of those killed in the gas chamber [komora gazowa] – I remember the gassing of about 400 members of the Birkenau Sonderkommando who had been deployed in the open-air cremation of the corpses, and of some other gassing victims.”

Hence, 38 years later, the morgue had turned into a real “gas chamber,” a function that it did not have specifically before, since gassings had also taken place “in other rooms of the crematorium,” but of these “other gassing victims,” Jankowski could not say anything specific, so in this witness’s “knowledge,” the gassing of the approximately 400 inmates of the “Sonderkommando” remained the only “real” one.

Regarding this “Sonderkommando,” Müller specified in the deposition at the Frankfurt Trial (98th hearing) that it was made up of Slovak Jews who were preparing to escape, but were betrayed by an inmate and that “this ‘Sonderkommando’ was gassed at the end of 1942 or at the beginning of 1943.” The event took place in Auschwitz, and he learned about it in Birkenau: “I heard it in Birkenau [...]. I heard it at the Birkenau camp” (Fritz Bauer..., pp. 20762f.).

In contradiction to this, Müller wrote in his book that he actually witnessed the alleged gassing (Müller 1979b, p. 50):

“In mid-December 1942 all who belonged to this Sonderkommando were gassed and cremated. On removing their bodies from the gas chamber we found on some of them scraps of paper with notes scribbled on them to the effect that their plan to escape had been betrayed by certain barrack orderlies.”

These are not the only contradictions between the two “eyewitnesses.” Regarding the crematorium’s “gas chamber,” Müller stated that it had “six camouflaged openings,” while Jankowski stated:²⁸

“This large hall had no windows, it only had two valves in the ceiling and electric lighting, as well as an entrance door from the corridor and another leading to the furnaces. This hall was called Leichenhalle (corpse hall). It served as a morgue and at the same time for ‘slaughters’, that is, inmates were shot there.”

In his affidavit of October 3, 1980, the witness stated (Pressac 1989, p. 124; see Chapter 9):

“It is at Auschwitz that I saw for the first time a gassing in the Leichenhalle. This room had no windows, but there were ventilators in the ceiling. The two thick wooden doors of the room, one in the side wall, the other in the end wall, had been made gas tight. The room was lit by electricity.”

²⁸ Ibid., p. 13.

Finally in 1985, he asserted:²⁹

“The gas chamber inside was painted white, on the ceiling, to the best of my memory, there were two gas-feeding holes [były dwa otwory do wsypywania gazu]; there were no fake showers; I don’t remember a fan.”

Jankowski’s statements are therefore contradictory and in direct conflict with those of Müller, also regarding the absence of fake showers, which for Müller were installed after Himmler’s visit to Auschwitz.

Another contradiction concerns the operation and cremation capacity of the furnaces. For Müller, three corpses could be cremated simultaneously in a muffle within 20 minutes; according to Jankowski, a muffle could hold up to twelve corpses, but only five were placed in them simultaneously, because this way they burned better.²⁸ Jankowski did not say how long the cremation of such a batch took, which is even more-absurd than the one described by his colleague.

In 1985, Jankowski asserted:²⁶

“In the crematorium, there were three furnaces, which each had two hearths. Three corpses were generally placed into each opening. Only at the end of the work [shift], 10-12 corpses were placed inside, which burned in our absence. The introduction of such a number of corpses was not easy, so the Kapos took care of it themselves. The corpses were crammed in by placing a special poker under their armpits. The cremation of a load of five corpses lasted about half an hour.”

The claim that five corpses placed in a single muffle could burn within half an hour is technical nonsense, and that 10-12 corpses could even be introduced into a single muffle is utter delusional nonsense.³⁰

From what Jankowski said about the furnaces, it is also certain that he had a rather faulty idea of how they operated:³¹

“The corpses lay on the grates, under which coke was burning [pod którymi palił się koks].”

Rather than a cremation furnace, for him it was a barbecue grill!

When the officials of the Auschwitz Museum had two of the three original furnaces rebuilt in the Main Camp’s former crematorium after the war, they were undoubtedly inspired by this nonsense, since – as I will explain immediately – they forgot to reconstruct the two coke-burning gas generators in the rear part of each furnace, so that the hearth grates, which were originally located at the bottom of the gas-generator well, were installed beneath the muffle grates instead!

³⁰ See Mattogno 2020c, Chapter 12, “Le cremazioni multiple: il sistema di caricamento delle muffole,” pp. 101-106, and Docs. 29-36, pp. 258-262.

³¹ AGK, NTN, 82, Vol. 1, p. 14.

In 1985, Jankowski himself hinted at this, but in a somewhat confused way:³²

“The currently reconstructed furnaces differ a little from the ones we had to operate, that is, the coke was poured into them from above through a special opening that was at floor level.”

In fact, the most-striking difference of this reconstruction compared to the original furnace is that the entire wall structure of the two gas generators is missing, a block attached to the rear part of the furnace measuring 2.5 (length) \times 0.6 (width) \times 1.4 (height) meters, with the upper surface being inclined. The double-leaf gas-generator loading-shaft door (Generatorfüllschachtverschlüsse) mentioned by Jankowski were arranged on this inclined surface. The gas-generator structure was accessed through a service shaft (Schacht) 0.95 meters deeper than the surrounding floor of the furnace room, so the two doors were located 0.45 meters above floor level,³³ hence not quite “at floor level.”

Regarding the cremation capacity of these furnaces, it is also worth mentioning the relevant statements by Henryk Tauber:³⁴

“In Crematorium I, there were three furnaces with two muffles each, as I mentioned earlier. Each muffle could cremate five human corpses. Therefore, 30 human corpses could be cremated simultaneously in this crematorium. During the time I worked in the service squad of this crematorium, the cremation of such a load lasted an hour and a half.”

It follows that the three double-muffle furnaces of this crematorium had, at the same time, the phenomenal capacity of three corpses per muffle within 20 minutes, five within half an hour, and again five, but in an hour and a half!

In this context, it is worth underlining that Müller’s story is also in total conflict with Jean-Claude Pressac’s historical reconstruction. With reference to the Main Camp’s crematorium, he wrote in fact (1993, p. 34):

“The SS could only conduct gassings there from January 1942 until the date in May when the assembly of the third furnace was resumed, that is to say during four months. It is currently estimated that very few homicidal gassings took place in this crematorium, but that they were amplified because they were so impressive for the direct or indirect witnesses.”

As noted earlier, Pressac said the gassings were transferred to Birkenau “at the end of April” of 1942, so they had ceased even before Müller was assigned to the crematorium!

³⁴ AGK, NTN, 93, Vol. 11, pp. 124f.

The Frankfurt Court did not take Müller's deposition at the Main Camp's crematorium too seriously, on which it ruled:

"The account of the witness Müller about the gassing of Slovak Jews is not very clear. As far as the court knows, gassing no longer occurred in the small crematorium, but in the farmhouses that had been adapted for this purpose." (Langbein, p. 884)

A diplomatic way of saying that the witness was a perjurious liar.

3. Müller's "Experience" at the Birkenau "Sonderkommando"

3.1. Transfer to Birkenau, and Assignment to the "Sonderkommando"

In the two declarations of 1946 and 1947, as noted earlier, Müller limited the description of his experiences almost exclusively to the Main Camp's crematorium. At that time, he knew only trivial anecdotes bandied about by the resistance about Birkenau. Only many years later did he elaborate on his "experience" at Birkenau, which became predominant since the Frankfurt Trial.

In 1946, he stated

"Finally, when we had sprinkled the corpses with chlorine and earth, they took us back to the camp where we were again put in the dark cell which we had occupied up to August, 1943. We worked at the crematorium from morn till night" (Kraus-Kulka Statement), which is to say that he remained in Auschwitz until his actual transfer to Birkenau.

During the Frankfurt Trial, the witness gave a completely different version:

"Witness Filip Müller: There are inmates standing at the gates, a labor service, and they say: 'Take the inmates to the camp!' Yes, that was already at the end of my stay there. And he takes us to the camp. The labor service comes to me and says to me: 'You, if you bring me a lot of dollars – a lot, yes, he doesn't say how many – [I'll get you out] of there.' And I did it."

Presiding Judge: What did you bring him?

Witness Filip Müller: I brought him a large, such a package of American dollars, to the inmate.

Presiding Judge: Yes.

Witness Filip Müller: That was in the morning. When we got back, I give it to him, and he says to me, 'Stay here.' And where the kitchen was, there was a block on the other side, and he says to me, 'Here, stay in the washroom.' I stay there, he comes and he puts me up in Block 14. And I worked in Block 14. Later, I was transported to Buna, Monowitz.” (97th hearing, Oct. 5, 1964, Fritz Bauer..., pp. 20507f.)

These events sound blatantly unlikely and false. It must be remembered that Müller was assigned to the “Fischl-Kommando” of the crematorium, which had seven inmates and which later became the “crematorium working party” under the command of Kapo Mietek Morawa (Müller 1979b, pp. 39f.), which was controlled by Stark. How can one seriously believe that Müller could leave this Kommando so easily, especially since in the meantime he had become a “carrier of secrets”?³⁵

Moreover, since the people allegedly gassed evidently were Jews from Polish ghettos, how can one seriously believe that their pockets were full of US dollars? While it is true that US dollars were a coveted currency in Eastern-Bloc countries during the Cold War – that’s where Müller lived when he testified in Frankfurt – US dollars were pretty much useless in Europe prior to and during the war.

After his transfer to Monowitz, which took place at the end of June 1942, Müller remained “in Monowitz until the spring of 1943” (Fritz Bauer..., pp. 20508f.), that is, for at least 9-10 months; he recounted the subsequent events thus:

“And I get a big phlegmon. I couldn’t work [anymore], in the infirmary I was afraid [of] what was there. And once an Unterscharführer sees us. There were three more of us. One had, I think it was typhus. He had a fever. And we don’t work. So we are hiding. He sees us, [takes] us out, and the next evening we came to Birkenau together with 30 other inmates.” (Ibid., pp. 20509f.)

Although, as he pointed out, he was sent “from Buna to Birkenau as a ‘Muselmann’” (Fritz Bauer..., p. 20510), instead of being gassed for being a “Muselmann” (a term used for an emaciated inmate with no hope of recovery), he was hospitalized at the infirmary, was treated, then went through a convalescent block (Schonungsblock; ibid., p. 20511) and ended up in a Kommando of potato peelers (Kartoffelschälkommando), where he remained for approximately 3 months.

At the 97th and 98th hearings of the Frankfurt Trial, Müller stated that he was transferred to Birkenau in the early summer (Sommerbeginn) of 1943, joined the “Sonderkommando,” and was housed in Block 13 (ibid., pp. 20759-61). At first, he was assigned to Crematorium. I [= II], where he spent “about five or six weeks”, then was transferred to Crematorium IV [= V], which also happened in the summer of 1943 (ibid., pp. 20523f.). The Main Camp’s Crematorium Kommando (Fischl-Kommando) followed him “14 days or a month” later (ibid., p. 20760).

In his statement to Kraus-Kulka, Müller stated that the transfer was due to the fact that he had refused the appointment to Kapo (=foreman). This position had been offered to him because his “prison [=inmate registration] number was lower than those of all the others working” at the crematorium, therefore he had been an inmate for the longest time. Keep in mind, however, that Müller’s registration number was 29236, while that of his friend Jankowski was 27675, hence Jankowski had arrived at Auschwitz earlier than Müller.

In his book, Müller took up the first version: he returned to Birkenau 15 months after he had first stayed there for a few days; the “Sonderkommando” of the Auschwitz crematorium was transferred to Block 13 of Birkenau Sector BIId (Müller 1979b, p. 52), after about 14 months of isolation in Block 11 of the Main Camp (ibid., p. 53). In reality, at Birkenau he was sent directly to the “crematorium team” (ibid., p. 57). The 15 months mentioned above refer to July 1943, the month explicitly indicated by the witness as that of the closure of the old crematorium at the Main Camp, to be precise “mid-July 1943” (ibid., p. 51). This date (like many other data that I will point out in turn) is taken from Jankowski’s statement:³⁶

“I, along with the entire commando of stokers, six Jews and two Poles in number, was transferred to Birkenau in July 1943 and assigned to Crematorium V.”

Müller therefore went to Birkenau with the entire Kommando of the crematorium, but in Frankfurt he had stated that this Kommando had arrived there “14 days or a month” later.

In further contradiction to this, he wrote that “a few days later” – after his arrival at Crematorium II – he was transferred together with the Kommando Lemke, of which he was a part, to Crematorium III (Müller 1979b, p. 65). This therefore evidently happened around mid-July 1943. A few pages later we find him a stoker in Crematorium V, without him saying when he was sent there. Here is the relevant passage (ibid., p. 68):

“For some weeks now I had been a stoker in crematorium 5. During this particular night we cremated corpses from a transport from France [German edition: “from Malines in France”; 1979a, p. 108].”

In the summer of 1943, only three transports were directed to Auschwitz from the Malines Camp, which was located in Belgium, not in France. Transport No. XXI arrived there on August 2, while Nos. XXIIa and XXIIb both arrived there on September 22. From the first, 1,087 deportees were allegedly gassed, from the other two, 875 deportees.³⁷

The next morning, Müller says, another 2,000 Jews arrived in the courtyard of Crematorium V (Müller 1979b, p. 69). This figure of 2,000 deportees is compatible only with the date of August 3, the day when several transports from the Będzin and Sosnowice ghettos are said to have arrived at Auschwitz (according to Czech, four transports with altogether 9,000 deportees as well as a smaller one with 200 deportees from Berlin arrived on August 3; Czech 1990, p. 454).

³⁶ AGK, NTN, 82, Vol. 1, p. 17.

³⁷ Klarsfeld/Steinberg, p. 42; Czech 1990, pp. 453, 492f.

But if Müller had started working at Crematorium II in mid-July, and a few days later had been sent to Crematorium III, only to have been working at Crematorium V already for a few weeks in early August, how could he then have seen, “toward the end of the summer of 1943” (hence probably September 1943) the establishment of a “workshop for melting gold” at Crematorium III, as he claims (Müller 1979b, p. 68)?

From Crematorium V, Müller was inexplicably sent back to Crematorium II:

“One evening at the end of October 1943, I moved out to Crematorium II with a squad of about 100 prisoners on the night shift.” (Müller 1979a, p. 129)

The English translation of Müller’s book omits to mention any crematorium, thus sanitizing Müller’s tale of this inconsistency:

“One evening towards the end of October I went on night duty as one of a team of 100 prisoners.” (1979b, p. 81)

The first documented data on the strength of the crematorium staff (Krematoriumspersonal) dates to January 15, 1944 and mentions 383 inmates for the four crematoria of Birkenau. It is therefore extremely unlikely that three months earlier Crematorium II alone had a night shift of 100 inmates, all the more-so since not even from an orthodox point of view there was any need for night-time activities due to a lack of gassings during these months.³⁸

But Müller’s transmigratory vicissitudes do not end there. During the alleged gassing of the inmates of the Theresienstadt Family Camp on March 8, 1944, which involved 3,700 people and began in Crematorium II according to Müller (1979b, pp. 106f.), he was on the spot by a lucky coincidence and managed to witness it all (ibid., p. 107):

“Together with about thirty prisoners I was in the underground passage which linked the changing room to the gas chamber.”

Then when the second part of the victims was taken to Crematorium III, Müller saw the car of the “disinfecting operators” enter the courtyard of Crematorium III, meaning that the next batch of victims would be disposed of there (ibid., p. 116).

³⁸ According to Czech’s Auschwitz Chronicle, in September 1943 around 7,200 Jews were allegedly gassed on arrival, and about 7,400 in October 1943; in addition, some 5,000 registered inmates are said to have been gassed after having been “selected” during the two months in question. For November 1943, the respective figures allegedly amounted to about 9,000 and about 500, respectively. The claimed total is therefore about 21,100 during these three months, hence, on average just over 230 claimed gassing victims per day. In other words: the crematoria of Auschwitz could have handled that quantity easily using merely normal day-shift activities.

According to the orthodox version later sanctioned by Danuta Czech, the inmates of the Family Camp were indeed gassed in Crematoria II and III (Czech 1990, p. 595).

Müller's transmigrations are therefore clearly a mere literary device invented by him in order to be credited as an "eyewitness" of all the most-important events in the fables of Auschwitz. And in fact, at the beginning of May 1944 he was back at Crematorium V to participate in the excavation of the alleged cremation pits! (Müller 1979b, pp. 126f., 129-132)

3.2. The Selections of the "Sonderkommando"

If we credit the orthodox post-war narrative, the inmates of the "Sonderkommando" were dangerous "carriers of secrets" (Geheimnisträger) who had to be eliminated periodically, generally every three or four months.³⁹ By the early 1960s, this alleged procedure was considered an established fact. For this reason, this controversial dialogue took place at the Frankfurt trial (Fritz Bauer..., pp. 20572f.):

"Presiding Judge: Yes, it was always said that the members of the 'Sonderkommando' who had been there for three or four months, who knew so much and who had seen so much, were then always killed, so that they would stay there any longer.

Witness Filip Müller: No.

Presiding Judge: So we've been told so far.

Witness Filip Müller: [+⁴⁰ There] were selections, but you couldn't say every two or three months."

Considering the fact that Müller remained a member of the "Sonderkommando" until January 1945 according to his own narrative, he is evidently unable to explain his beyond-miraculous survival of at least seven selections – assuming that they occurred every four months until November 1944, when all homicidal-gassing activities are said to have been stopped (Müller 1979b, p. 161). Hence, he was forced to disavow the dogma of the periodic extermination of the "Sonderkommando," thus leaving the judges baffled.

But the problem came back in another form. Müller wrote that, at the end of Birkenau's alleged extermination activity, "all traces of the summer's mass exterminations" were to be erased and that the number of the "Sonderkommando" inmates were reduced to 200 (ibid., p. 160). Of these, 100 were saved, which were divided as follows: 70 were part of the demolition team, the remaining 30, including Müller, worked until January 1945 in Crematorium V (ibid., p. 161). Therefore, the SS of Auschwitz set out to cover up the traces of the alleged exterminations, but left 100 “eyewitnesses” of them alive! Müller could not ignore this irremediable contradiction, which all self-proclaimed witness veterans of the “Sonderkommando” run into. Not knowing how to handle it, however, he appealed to the SS’s mysterious ways of doing things (1979a, p. 271):

⁴⁰ The notes of the associate judge add here as Müller's statement: "I have read that in the literature as well"; ibid., p. 20626.

“Again and again I asked myself how it came about that we, the remaining carriers of secrets of the Sonderkommando, had not been shot before the evacuation. I couldn’t find a reasonable answer to this question.”

The English translations condensed this down considerably (1979b, p. 166):

“Again and again I asked myself why we, the last few remaining Sonderkommando prisoners, had not been shot before the evacuation.”

On the other hand, 5 “carriers of secrets” of the “Sonderkommando,” Müller’s colleagues – Waclaw Lipka, Mieczyslaw Morawa, Joseph Ilczuk, Wladyslaw Biskup and Jan Agrestowski – were transferred from Birkenau to Mauthausen on January 5, 1945, allegedly in order to be killed there,⁴¹ which is an unfounded and utterly absurd claim, because it implies that these inmates were transferred from a death camp to a mere concentration camp a long distance away in order to be killed there!

But there is an even-more-striking contradiction that demands a reasonable explanation. In 1946, Müller had stated:

“I am the oldest member of the Auschwitz and Birkenau Sonderkommando and the only one [jediný] to have been through everything [který všechno přežil: who survived everything]. I only escaped death as a result of a number of lucky chances; it was indeed a miracle.” (Kraus-Kulka Statement)

This claim of the immediate postwar period was typical and indicative both for these witnesses’ arrogance and vanity. For instance, Miklós Nyiszli claimed to have been the only surviving “Sonderkommando” physician, and so did Dr. Charles Sigismund Bendel (Mattogno 2020a, p. 332). Then there is the only survivor of the “Sonderkommando” allegedly gassed on December 5, 1942 – Arnošt Rosin – and at the same time the other only survivor of this gassing, a certain Spanik (Mattogno 2021, pp. 333).

Hence, without giving any explanation, Müller transmogrified from the only survivor to one among one hundred only survivors!

In his book, Müller wrote that he had survived “one Sonderkommando selection after another” (Müller 1979b, p. 166) but previously stated that he had only experienced three selections (Fritz Bauer..., p. 20572):

“In the years 1943 to 45, there were selections in Birkenau. But I say there weren’t any in the main crematorium, in the main camp.”

“In 1942, when I was working in the Auschwitz crematorium, there was absolutely no selection. [...] In 1943 there was one selection.” (Ibid., p. 20573)

⁴¹ Reproduction of this document in: Hefte von Auschwitz, No. 8, 1964, p. 119.

“In 1944 there were practically two selections.” (Ibid., p. 20657)

Regarding the first selection, Müller stated (ibid. pp. 20573f.):

“In 1943 there was one selection. That was at the end of the summer of 1943, when the selection was made, in the courtyard of Block 13. We were 30 prisoners as stokers. We worked in Crematorium IV. [= V...]

Then we came back and there was already a selection. Schwarzhuber was there. And the strong ones were taken; they were told: ‘You are going to Lublin.’ And those who were not strong were left there, so that ... But afterwards, when the ‘Sonderkommando’ comes from Lublin, we see that they have boty, holínky.

Interpreter Stegmann: Shoes, boots.

Presiding Judge: From your people who went into the gas there.

Witness Filip Müller: We ask them; they say they were gassed there. That was one [the first]. The second time was again a selection.”

The Auschwitz Museum’s story line has nothing about a selection among “Sonderkommando” members at the end of summer 1943. Müller, who here relied heavily on rumors, had the misfortune of speaking about it before Danuta Czech cast the narrative of this event into its final shape, which she did only in 1989, when she dated that event to February 24, 1944 (Czech 1989, p. 728/1990, p. 588). The previous German edition of her Kalendarium, which appeared in 1964, did not mention it at all (Czech 1964a, p. 80).

Picking up this legend, Franciszek Piper subsequently developed it as follows, also thanks to Müller’s imaginative tale: on February 24, 1944, all the members of the “Sonderkommando” were gathered in the courtyard of Block 13; the Lagerführer called out the registration numbers of a group of inmates, who were then transferred to the Majdanek Camp (Piper 2000, p. 185):

“They were killed shortly afterwards. [...] Those who remained behind in Auschwitz learned about the fate of their colleagues in April. Nineteen Soviet POWs arrived in Auschwitz then; they had worked at the Majdanek crematorium and had witnessed the executions of the former Auschwitz Sonderkommando members.”

From this it follows that these Auschwitz inmates were killed in the Majdanek crematorium, but according to the Majdanek museum’s current narrative, there was no gas chamber in that building (Kranz, pp. 219-227; for Müller they were gassed). The only claimed gas chambers are said to have been located at the opposite end of the camp, in Building XII^A, but the orthodox narrative has it that they ceased their homicidal activity in early September 1943, and on September 21, the 23 detainees who had worked there were allegedly shot (ibid., p. 226). Piper’s claims are therefore as unsustainable as Müller’s.

Jankowski also told the story of the 200 inmates of the “Sonderkommando” who had been transferred to Majdanek, and also elaborated on a transport from this camp to Auschwitz, to which Piper alluded:⁴²

“At the beginning of 1944, a transport arrived at the Birkenau Camp from Majdanek containing 300 Polish Jewesses, 19 Soviet prisoners and a German inmate who had been Kapo in Majdanek. The men were placed in Block No. 13, in the Sonderkommando, being assigned to work in the crematorium. The 300 women, on the other hand, were kept for 3 days in the Sauna, that is, in the bathhouse, then they were taken to the crematorium, where during the night they were shot and cremated. I know of the shooting and cremation directly from my comrades from the Sonderkommando, who were on duty that night and were eyewitnesses to the execution, and then took part in the cremation of the corpses. The entire transport of Jews executed at the camp was obviously not recorded anywhere.”

His two colleagues, Dragon and Tauber, didn’t have much better information than he did either. Dragon declared:⁴³

“Mostly Slovaks worked in the Sonderkommando that worked at the two bunkers before my assignment to the new Sonderkommando established in December 1942. As I stated earlier, the Sonderkommando to which I was assigned consisted of 200 inmates. Within a short period of time, it was increased to 400. Later, 200 inmates of this Sonderkommando were transferred to Lublin, from where 20 Russians arrived at the Sonderkommando. From these Russians, we learned that these 200 inmates transferred to Lublin had been shot there. In 1943, 200 Greeks were assigned to our Sonderkommando, and in 1944 500 Greeks.”

He didn’t make any specific statements about the dating of this claimed event. Tauber roughly dated the event, but asserted that 300, not 200, inmates were transferred:⁴⁴

“At the beginning, when I was assigned to work in the Sonderkommando, it had about 400 inmates and maintained this force until January or February 1944. In one of these months a transport of about 300 inmates was sent to Lublin. [...] After this transport was sent to Lublin, about 100 remained. From Lublin, 20 Russians and the German Kapo Karol were sent and assigned to our group.”

Also in this case it is worth highlighting the irreducible stupidity that witnesses (and orthodox Holocaust historians) are forced to attribute to the SS to support their legends: the 200 inmates in question were sent to die in the Majdanek crematorium so that their comrades of the Auschwitz “Sonderkommando” would not know anything about it, and at the same time they transferred 19 or 20 Soviet PoWs to this “Sonderkommando” who “had worked at the Majdanek crematorium and had witnessed the executions of the former Auschwitz Sonderkommando members,” evidently informed as to all details of the alleged execution!

Danuta Czech states that the transport from Majdanek arrived at Auschwitz on April 16, 1944, and contained 299 Jews with 2 infants and also 19 Russian PoWs who were assigned to the “Sonderkommando” (Czech 1990, p. 612).

Returning to Müller, being unable to plagiarize a story at least already sketched out, he was forced to improvise, and he did it badly. The related choppy, almost unintelligible dialogue during the Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial shows that he did not know what to say and was inventing things on the fly; he got himself into trouble, claiming that there had been a selection among the “Sonderkommando” of Crematorium IV (= V), but it did not involve the 30 stokers who were part of the “Sonderkommando”. Hence the questions of the President Judge (Fritz Bauer..., pp. 20574-20576):

“Presiding Judge: Who were the prisoners in ‘Sonderkommando’ 13 who were not on duty in the crematorium? What kind of work did they have or what kind of task did they have?”

Witness Filip Müller: They were room attendants who were not in the crematorium.

Presiding Judge: And yet [they] were in the ‘Sonderkommando’?

Witness Filip Müller: Yes.

Presiding Judge: Who therefore were always selected there, as you just said?

Witness Filip Müller: Yes.

Presiding Judge: They were all room attendants?

Witness Filip Müller: No, those were only inmates who worked in the ‘Sonderkommando’.

Presiding Judge: And what were they doing in the ‘Sonderkommando’?

Witness Filip Müller: Working.

Presiding Judge: Exactly the same thing you were doing?

Witness Filip Müller: They weren’t stokers, but something else.

Presiding Judge: But what were they?

Witness Filip Müller: They have the clothes ...

Presiding Judge: You said earlier that there was not a division [of labor]; that one person did this, the other that, but everyone who was in the ‘Sonderkommando’ was also used for everything.

Witness Filip Müller: Yes, yes, yes. That’s the way it is.

Presiding Judge: And how come these people who were selected before you were already in your Block 13?

Witness Filip Müller: Well. We were there as stokers. But Gorges came many times and said: ‘The clothes you have to’...

Presiding Judge [interrupts]: Take away.

Witness Filip Müller: That happened, too, yes. It wasn't always so. It was not divided [so] that [it was said]: 'This one has [to do] this' or 'That one there has [to do] that'. But we always came into the camp after the roll call."

With these awkward and confused statements, the witness tried painfully to get out of the embarrassing situation he found himself in: the "selection" had taken place (and thus saved face), but it had not concerned the actual members of the "Sonderkommando," but rather elements somehow associated with it (and so he explained why Holocaust historiography knew nothing of that "selection").

In his book, this "selection" disappears, or rather, it is transformed into that of February 24, 1944 mentioned earlier. In the related description that follows, Müller was inspired by the stories of Chaim Herman and Salmen Lewental which had appeared in a German edition in 1972:⁴⁵

"In February 1944 there was a selection among members of the Sonderkommando. One evening during roll-call Lagerführer Schwarzhuber, Rapportführer Polotschek and another few SS men appeared in the yard of Block 13. From among the prisoners they selected about 200, telling them that they would be transferred to Lublin where strong men were needed for a special job. Most of them belonged to the group which, with Hössler in charge, had taken part in removing all traces of the mass graves near bunkers 1 and 2. Since work there had come to an end, they were now expendable." (Müller 1979b, p. 90)

However, the motivation for the alleged selection is senseless from an orthodox point of view, given that, as Piper informs us,

"when the new gas chambers and crematoria entered operation in the spring of 1943, use of the two 'bunkers' ceased. Bunker 1 and the adjacent barracks were demolished and the burning pits filled in and levelled. The same was done with Bunker 2, except that the 'bunker' itself was not demolished." (2000, p. 143)

Therefore, the elimination of these mass graves had taken place in early 1943, which means that the inmates who had worked there would have been "useless" ever since; but then why did the SS wait until February 1944 to carry out the "selection"?

It is clear that Müller had no knowledge of these alleged events and invented everything badly.

Shifting the claimed selection from 1943 to 1944 meant that, for this year, he found himself with three selections, while at the Auschwitz trial he had spoken of only two for 1944.

⁴⁵ It is the 1972 German translation of Bezwińska/Czech 1971. On Herman's and Lewental's texts see Mattogno 2021, pp. 245-248, 276-283.

The second selection of 1944 took place, according to the witness, “a few weeks before the revolt” of October 7, in the course of which “several hundreds” of prisoners were killed (Fritz Bauer..., pp. 20647, 20706).

In his book, he sets it “towards the end of September 1944” in Crematorium IV (Müller 1979b, p. 152).

Piper claims that the alleged selection was “at the end of September,” but his only source is Müller’s book! (Piper 2000, Note 563, p. 186) A wise decision, because Dragon and Tauber had made conflicting statements about it. For Dragon, the presumed selection took place after the revolt of October 7, 1944, for Tauber (who traced the revolt to September), before the revolt. Dragon:⁴⁶

“In October 1944, 500 inmates were shot, in particular 400 in the courtyard of Crematorium No. IV and 100 in the camp sector near Crematorium No. II. This same month, Moll selected about 200 inmates from the Sonderkommando, who were taken to Auschwitz and, as we were later informed by the inmates employed at Kanada, were gassed in the chamber that was used to fumigate the items in the Kanada warehouse.”

“We set the date of the revolt to June 1944. I don’t remember the exact date. The revolt, however, did not happen, although everything was ready for its outbreak, and even people from whom we had hidden the preparation of the revolt participated in the secret action. This affair did us a lot of damage, and after it was discovered, it resulted in many victims. First our Kapo Kamiński was shot shortly after the deadline set for the revolt. Since then we were transferred to Crematorium IV to make any contact with the world impossible. About 200 inmates were selected and sent into the gas. They were gassed in the delousing [facility] of the ‘Kanada’ [camp warehouse section] in Auschwitz, and cremated in Crematorium II. This cremation was carried out by the SS themselves who were assigned to the crematorium. The situation became more and more serious for us, and although we were monitored and examined with doubled vigilance, we decided to flee from the camp at any cost. After the preparations, there was a revolt in Crematorium IV in September 1944; it also involved Crematorium II.”

As Piper points out correctly, the series of labor-deployment reports of the Birkenau men’s camp records a decrease in strength of the “stokers Crematorium (I-IV)” from 874 inmates on September 7, 1944 to 662 of October 3,⁴⁸ but the reports in between have not been preserved, and it is not known when or why this decrease occurred. It is clear that neither Müller nor Piper can back up their claims with anything.

Müller’s third selection allegedly took place on an unspecified date, but in any case after the revolt of October 7. Müller spoke of it like this:

“In the year 1944, that was already towards autumn, back then the commando leader was already Scharführer Buch. At that time, Moll was already gone. It so happened that Buch made a selection. He selected and said: ‘There are 300 inmates here in Crematorium III, IV. Of these 300 inmates, 270 will go to a very good job. And they’ll have a great time, bread, drinks, everything.’”
(Fritz Bauer..., pp. 20557f.)

In practice, according to his deposition at the Frankfurt Trial, only the 30 inmates housed in Crematorium V were saved, the other 270 were shot.

In further contradiction to himself, Müller reported in his book that, after the revolt of October 7, the “Sonderkommando” was reduced to 200 prisoners rather than 300 (Müller 1979b, p. 160). About 450 prisoners were killed in the “Sonderkommando” revolt (ibid.), which he cribbed from the first German edition of the Kalendarium of Auschwitz, where Czech mentions precisely the decrease in force from 663 to 212 inmates (Czech 1964a, pp. 73, 75), so that the number of those allegedly killed was 451. The survivors were finally 100 inmates, the aforementioned 30 plus another 70, who were assigned to the demolition team (Müller 1979b, p. 161).

The origin of these two figures is revealing. Müller drew the first from Nyiszli, although Nyiszli had explicitly stated that the 30 inmates he mentioned were not part of the “Sonderkommando”; the second number Müller took from Kraus and Schön/Kulka, for whom 70 was the total number of surviving inmates of the “Sonderkommando”! (See Subchapter 3.4.)

According to the documents, the official name of the so-called “Sonderkommando” was the following, with the number of inmates assigned to it in subsequent columns (which remained practically unchanged from July to the beginning of September 1944; see Mattogno 2016a, pp. 83-92):

April-May 1944:

Official Name (Heizer = stoker)	20 April	3 May	14 May	15 May
–Kommando 206-B: Heizer Krematorium I und II	121	101	40	151
–Kommando 207-B: Heizer Krematorium III und IV	86	106	40	157

Since July 1944:

– Kommando 57-B: Heizer Krematorium I Day	109 inmates, plus 2 skilled workers
– Kommando 57-B: Heizer Krematorium I Night	104
– Kommando 58-B: Heizer Krematorium II Day	110
– Kommando 58-B: Heizer Krematorium II Night	110
– Kommando 59-B: Heizer Krematorium III Day	109, plus 2 skilled workers
– Kommando 59-B: Heizer Krematorium III Night	109
– Kommando 60-B: Heizer Krematorium IV Day	109, plus 1 skilled worker
– Kommando 60-B: Heizer Krematorium IV Night	110

During meetings and for other bureaucratic needs, the respective units were called by these names, but Müller clearly knew nothing of them.

3.3. Müller's Miraculous Survival

In Müller's account of the "Sonderkommando" revolt of October 7, 1944, the only thing that stands out is how he survived the repercussions. Crematorium IV was set on fire, but he entered it anyway and took refuge in the building's furnace room (Verbrennungsraum), which was ablaze:

"I was by now completely out of breath. The crematorium was still burning fiercely. The wooden doors were ablaze, several of the wooden beams were charred and dangling from the ceiling, and there was a fire raging in the coke store." (1979b, p. 156)

And outside, a gun battle was raging.

"In a flash I remembered a place where I would be safe from bullets: inside the flue leading from the ovens to the chimney. I lifted one of the cast-iron covers, climbed down and closed the cover behind me. Inside the flue there was no room to stand upright; I stretched out trying to catch my breath. From outside I could still hear the rattle of machine-guns. When after a while the shooting seemed to die down I crawled towards the chimney because I was able to stand up there." (Ibid.)

During the 97th hearing of the Frankfurt Trial, the witness stated (Fritz Bauer..., pp. 20564f.):

"There was a flap made of [...] metal, a metal lid [...] a duct. [...] which connected the chimney with the furnace. [...] A duct. And then get into the duct and stay there. I can already see the chimney up in front of me, and black water flows and – [...] Hot water, boiling water flowed down. [...] The fire brigade was already there. And all this pours on me, I'm already all [wet] from the water, and that's where I stay. After a three-quarter hour or an hour I can already hear revolvers shooting. I heard how they were shooting outside because there was the chimney."

In both stories Müller mentions only one "duct" and only one chimney, although he himself wrote earlier in the description of Crematorium V (which is mirror-symmetrical to Crematorium IV; Müller 1979b, p. 95):

"The raging flames rushed into the open air through two underground conduits which connected the ovens with the massive chimneys."

But the fundamental problem is another: were the smoke ducts of the furnaces of Crematorium IV and V equipped with inspection shafts in the first place? To understand the significance of the documents and photographs I adduce, it is necessary to first know how this system was structured. I summarize the detailed description that I presented in my specific study on the crematory furnaces of Auschwitz (Mattogno/Deana, Vol. I, pp. 283f.).

The Topf coke-fired 8-muffle furnace was made up of eight single-muffle furnaces as per Topf Drawing D58173 arranged in two groups of four furnaces; each group consisted of two pairs of furnaces opposing each other in such a way that they shared their rear walls and the central walls of the muffles in a manner already used in the Płaszów crematorium. The two furnace groups were connected to four gasifiers coupled in the same way and thus formed a single 8-muffle furnace, also called “Großraum-Einäscherungsofen,” literally “large-scale incineration furnace.”

The two ducts ran horizontally in opposite directions below the floor of the furnace hall and ended in a chimney that had a square cross-section of 0.8 m × 0.8 m and a height of 16.87 m. The chimneys had no draft enhancers.

That said, let’s look at the question of the presence of inspection manholes.

DOCUMENT 1 in the Appendix shows my diagram of the 8-muffle furnace: the two smoke ducts are indicated by No. 7. In the plan of Crematorium IV/V No. 1678(r) of August 14, 1942, the smoke ducts are indicated with dashed lines. DOCUMENT 2 shows the foundations of the two 4-muffle furnaces. The numbers I have placed on it indicate, as in the above scheme:

- 5: vertical smoke duct
- 6: masonry containing the smoke ducts
- 7: horizontal smoke duct
- Achtmuffel-Einäscherungsofen: 8-muffle cremation furnace
- Schornstein: Chimney.
- M1-M8: the eight muffles (the squares represent the muffle openings).

Each of the two smoke ducts, which had to be at least as wide as the chimneys (0.8 m), was about 1.5 meters long from the external wall of the furnace to the chimney. This was the space available on the floor of the furnace room where an inspection manhole might be placed. The smoke ducts obviously crossed the external wall of the chimney, so that, up to the chimney flue, they were about 1.8 meters long. Any inspection manhole placed between the furnace and the chimney, which should have measured 0.45 m × 0.50 m,⁴⁹ would have been no more than one meter away from the chimney flue.

The detailed cost estimates and parts list of the Topf 8-muffle furnace (dated November 16, 1942 and September 8, 1942, respectively) contain no references to any manhole covers.⁵⁰ All that remains is to examine the ruins of ⁵⁰ Ibid., Doc. 230f., pp. 388-392.

Crematoria IV and V. It should be noted that there is practically nothing left of Crematorium IV, while in Crematorium V the remains of the anchor rods of the 8-muffle furnace and the chimneys are still clearly visible. The two crematoria were built on the basis of an identical plan, but in mirror images. Hence, what is true for Crematorium V also applies to Crematorium IV.

When I visited the Birkenau Camp in 1997, having Müller’s story in mind, I made a thorough inspection of the ruins of Crematorium V in search of the inspection manholes of the smoke ducts, with negative results: they do not exist. On that occasion I took several photographs, of which I present the most-significant in the Appendix:

	Direction	Description
Photo 2	east-west	Remains of east chimney, furnace anchor and west chimney
Photo 3	west-east	Remains of east chimney, furnace anchor and west chimney
Photo 4	west-east	Remains of furnace anchor and west chimney
Photo 5	north-south	Remains of furnace anchor and east chimney
Photo 6	north-south	Remains of furnace anchor and west chimney
Photo 7	south-north	Remains of furnace anchor and east chimney
Photo 8	south-north	Remains of furnace anchor and west chimney

In the space between the furnace and the west chimney on one side and the east chimney on the other, there should have been an inspection manhole similar to those seen in Photo 9, relating to Crematorium III, equipped with a metal lid like the one that in 2010 was curiously located on the remains of the reinforced concrete roof of Morgue #1 of Crematorium II (Photo 10). But there is no trace of this in the ruins, so Müller’s tale is just another lie –shameless, but not an original one, because it was invented in 1945 by Szlama Dragon. In relation to the “Sonderkommando” revolt, this witness had in fact declared:⁵¹

“I hid under a pile of wood, and Tauber in the chimney flues [w ciągach komina] of Crematorium No. V.”

Henryk Tauber, on the other hand, did not confirm this fabrication.

3.4. Legendary Anecdote

In the Kraus-Kulka Statement, Müller related some of the many fabrications circulating in the immediate postwar period (see Part 3 in Mattogno 2021):

“Here I witnessed the ‘scientific’ experiments performed by SS doctors Fischer, Klein and Mengele. Between 100 and 150 men and women, aged from eighteen to thirty, were selected [from the transports] and shot – unlike the other prisoners who were gassed. A piece of flesh was then cut from their thighs and forwarded to the Bacteriological Institute at Rajsko [where bacteria were cultivated]. One of the SS, who was acting as assistant to an SS doctor, told me all about it, remarking that horse meat would have done just as well but would have been a waste."

⁵¹ AGK, NTN, 93, Vol. 11, p. 113.

"Here," as he explicitly said, was referring to Crematorium IV (=V). The following year, however, during the Krakow Trial, he stated:

"In the Auschwitz Camp, I also saw that the flesh of executed non-Jewish inmates was used for various purposes. These people were often shot in the presence of Dr. Mengele and others, whose names I do not know, and in the presence of Aumeier and Grabner. Immediately afterwards, the flesh from their calves was placed in crates, so that on average 6–8 crates of flesh were taken in a week.

It sometimes happened that a German commission came with swastikas on their arms, and asked in the presence of Aumeier and Grabner if it was human flesh. Aumeier replied: 'Horse meat could also be used, but what a pity [to waste] horse meat!'"

From the context and the characters involved, it is clear that the scene was placed at the Main Camp's crematorium.

Curiously, as if to take revenge for the plagiarism suffered, Jankowski in turn plagiarized the following imaginative story from Müller, embroidering it as follows (see Chapter 9):

"Every two weeks, SS doctors came to the undressing room and from the corpses cut off muscles, which were placed in clay pots with some disinfectant liquid. Muscles were cut from corpses, both of men and women, as long as they were shot and not gassed."

Another fable related by Müller is this:

"The youngest women also served as a source of blood which would be drained from their veins for several minutes until they collapsed, after which they would be thrown half-dead into the fire. The blood was poured from a pail into special bottles which were then hermetically sealed. I was told that it was urgently needed at the military hospitals." (Kraus-Kulka Statement)

To refute this nonsense, it suffices to give the floor to two former Auschwitz inmates, the famous Primo Levi and the less-well-known Leonardo de Benedetti, a Jewish doctor who, in 1946, wrote a "Report on the Hygienic-Sanitary Organization of the Monowitz Concentration Camp for Jews (Auschwitz, Upper Silesia)," in which, with reference to the camp hospital, we read among other things (Mattoigno 2016, pp. 54-57, here p. 55):

"We shall cover such matters with the remark that even surgeries requiring a high surgical standard were performed, above all those involving penetration of the body wall such as gastroenteroanastomosis for duodenal ulcers, appendectomies, rib resectioning for emphysema, as well as orthopedic interventions for fractures and sprains. Where the overall condition of the patient did not assure that the trauma of the surgery could be withstood, the patient received a blood transfusion before initiating the procedure; transfusions were also performed to alleviate secondary anemia as well as severe hemorrhage from an ulcer or trauma sustained in an accident. For donors, recent arrivals to the camp were selected who were in good health; donation of blood was voluntary and was rewarded with 15 days' stay in the hospital, during which time the donor receives a special diet, so that there was never any lack of volunteers for blood donation."

There is also the pathetic rhetoric of the alleged victims who went to meet death with phenomenal pride and courage:

"I saw nationals of almost all the nations of Europe die in the gas chambers. Those from the Czech Jewish family camp were the only ones to go to their death singing their national anthem. [French female inmates sang the Marseillaise while on trucks riding to the gas chambers]" (Kraus-Kulka Statement)

The creators of this story forgot that the alleged victims were unaware of their impending fate, because the SS had set up a well-organized plot to deceive them – the pretense that they would take a shower and/or would be disinfested. It is therefore utterly unclear what would have motivated them to sing national anthems on the trucks.

In his book, Müller updated this fairy tale on the basis of the equally fabulous story by the "Unknown Author" which in the meantime he had been able to read in the pertinent book (Bezwińska/Czech 1972): Czechoslovakian Jews sang their national anthem and then "they sang 'Hatikvah', now the national anthem of the state of Israel" (Müller 1979b, p. 111).

Müller contributes to this anecdote by inventing a story – more pathetic than comical – to which he devotes almost four pages (ibid., pp. 111-114) that can be summed up in a few lines. He snuck into the gas chamber because he intended to die with the victims, but a group of girls intervened (ibid., p. 114):

"Before I could make an answer to her spirited speech, the girls took hold of me and dragged me protesting to the door of the gas chamber. There they gave me a last push which made me land bang in the middle of the group of SS men."

If he really wanted to die, Müller could have thrown himself easily on the camp's high-voltage fence: death would have been certain, without any last-minute savior.

4. Plagiarized History of Birkenau: Miklós Nyiszli

4.1. "Dayan's Speech"

As mentioned earlier, the primary source of Müller's Holocaust statements regarding Birkenau is Miklós Nyiszli. The memoirs of this formidable impostor (see Mattogno 2020a) appeared in Hungarian in 1946 with the title "I was Dr. Mengele's Anatomist at the Auschwitz Crematorium" ("Dr. Mengele bonco- lóorvosa voltam az Auschwitz-i krematóriumban”). The first German translation was published in installments in 1961 in the Munich magazine Quick, Nos. 3-11, under the title “Auschwitz. Diary of a Camp Doctor” (“Auschwitz. Tagebuch eines Lagerarztes”). And it was after 1961, in his deposition at the Frankfurt Trial, that Müller first mentioned Nyiszli, but at that time he did not yet know how to use the testimony of this Hungarian physician.

In his book, Müller drew profusely from the aforementioned translation, up to direct plagiarism. The most brazen, almost verbatim plagiarism concerns the “the speech of the Dajan” that I will analyze first. I begin with this, because this plagiarism is so evident that it is impossible to mistake the further plagiarisms I will report subsequently.

To prevent the objection that Müller, in 1979, hence 35 years after the claimed event, remembered the exact words allegedly uttered in late 1944 by the “Dajan,” and remembered them exactly the same way as Nyiszli did in 1946, namely that both had personally witnessed the same real event, it is illuminating to outline the general context in which the two witnesses insert the speech in question, starting with Nyiszli:⁵²

“In the early morning hours of November 17, 1944, an SS NCO opens the door to my room and confidentially informs me that by order of the Reichsführer the killing of people in any fashion within the grounds of the K.Z. has been strictly prohibited. [...]

My watch showed two p.m. It is after lunch and I am looking apathetically out our window at the darkly swirling clouds of snow when a loud shout disturbs the silence of the furnace-hall corridor. ‘Alle antreten!’ [‘Everyone fall in!’ German in text] sounds the order. We hear it two times a day, morning and evening, for the customary roll call, but in the afternoon it is of ominous significance. ‘Alle antreten!’ it sounds again, still sharper, still more impatient. Now heavy footsteps resound at the door to our room; an SS man opens it and shouts: ‘Antreten!’ Here’s trouble! We head for the courtyard. We step out into a large circle of SS guards; our comrades are already standing there. There is not the least surprise here, not the least noise. The SS units stand silently with machine pistols trained on us and wait patiently until everyone is in the group. I look around. The young fir trees of the little grove stand unmoving, covered in white. Everything is so silent!

A few minutes later we are ordered to face left and we start off between the close-ranked lines of armed guards. Leaving the crematorium courtyard, our escort does not lead us onto the road, but rather across the road, in the direction of Crematorium II [=III] standing opposite. Sure enough, we advance through its courtyard. We know now that this is our final journey. We are all herded into the crematorium’s furnace hall. Not a single SS guard remains inside. They stand around the building, at the doors and windows, with machine pistols ready for firing. The doors are locked; heavy iron grills cover the windows. There is no way out here. The comrades from Crematorium II are here as well! A few minutes later the ones from number IV are brought in. Four hundred and sixty men stand together and wait for death; only the method of execution still constitutes a matter for conjecture. Here there are specialists who know all of the death-bringing methods of the SS. The gas chamber? That would be impossible to carry out smoothly with the Sonderkommando! Shooting? That is a method that is scarcely feasible here, inside!

The most likely scenario is that they will blow us up together with the building in the interest of achieving two goals at once. That would be genuine SS method, or perhaps we will receive a few phosphorus grenades through the window. [...]

In mute silence, wordlessly – if someone says something to his companion, he does so in a whisper – the Kommando men hunker down wherever they have found places on the concrete of the furnace hall floor. Suddenly the silence is broken: one of our comrades, a black-haired, tall, slim man wearing glasses, about thirty years of age, leaps up from his place and in a ringing voice, so that all can hear, begins to speak. He is a ‘dājen,’^[53] which is a sort of auxiliary priest in a little Jewish community in Poland. He is an autodidact with a great store of religious and worldly knowledge at his command. He is the ascetic of the Sonderkommando, a man who, in order to abide by the dietary prescriptions of his faith, eats nothing from the bountiful kitchen of the Sonderkommando but bread, margarine and onions. His assignment was to have been stoker on a cremation furnace, but as he is a man of fanatic faith I have arranged with Oberscharführer Mussfeld that he should receive an exemption from this horrible work. [...]

I had no other arguments. The Ober accepted them, and at my suggestion the man was sent to the so-called Canada rubbish heap burning in the courtyard of Crematorium II (=III). One should know of this rubbish heap that they bring here all the personal effects and spoiled food, as well as identification papers, diplomas, documents concerning military honors, passports, marriage certificates, prayer books, phylacteries, and Torah scrolls which the transports sent to the gas chambers brought with them from home but which were condemned to be burned as useless items by the SS’s evaluative criteria.

The Canada rubbish heap was a constantly burning mound; in this place hundreds of thousands of photographs of married couples, elderly parents, attractive children and beautiful girls burned in the company of thousands of prayer books. [...]

Here the ‘Dayan’ worked, or rather did not work but merely watched the fire, but he was dissatisfied even with this when I inquired how he was doing. It did not comport with his religious ideas that he should collaborate in the burning of prayer books, phylacteries, prayer shawls and Torah scrolls either. I sym-pathized with him, but I had no means to provide him with an easier job. In the end we were in a K.Z. and Sonderkommando men in a crematorium! This was the 'Dayan' who began to speak."

This is followed by the text of the claimed speech, which I will address later.

"The heavy doors spring open. Oberscharführer Steinberg enters the hall, accompanied by two guards with machine pistols. 'Aerzte heraus!' he shouts in an imperious voice. I leave the hall with my two doctor colleagues and my laboratory assistant. Steinberg and the two SS soldiers stop with us on the road between the two crematoria. The Ober gives me some sheets of paper covered with numbers which he has been holding in his hands until now and tells me to find my number and cross it out. In my hands is a list of the tattoo numbers of Sonderkommando members. I take out my fountain pen; after a quick search I find and cross out my number. When I have done this, he tells me to cross out my companions' numbers as well! This too is done. He accompanies us to the gate of Crematorium I. He orders us to retire to our rooms and not to move from there! We do so.

The next morning a column made up of five trucks arrives in the crematorium courtyard. They dump out corpses from themselves. The corpses of the Sonderkommando. A newly constituted group of thirty carries the victims into the cremation hall. They are laid out in front of the furnaces. Horrible burn lesions cover their bodies. Their faces are burned beyond recognition, their burned and tattered clothes make identification impossible. Even the numbers burned onto their arms are illegible for the most part.

After death by gas, death at the pyres, death by chloroform injection to the heart, the shot to the back of the neck, death in the flames of the pyres and death by phosphorus grenade, this is the seventh type of death I have met with. They took my poor comrades to a nearby forest during the night and did away with them with flamethrowers.

If the four of us survived, the underlying motive still was not the sparing of our lives, but rather just the necessity of our survival for as long as our positions needed filling. It was neither joy nor even relief this time, merely respite, which Dr. Mengele afforded us in leaving us alive."

And here is Müller's respective narration (Müller 1979b, p. 161):

"Towards the end of November 1944 the dismantling of crematoria 2 and 3 began. At the same time there was a final selection among members of the Sonderkommando. All prisoners in the team were lined up in the yard of crematorium 2. This time the camp authorities had taken precautions to prevent a repetition of events during the previous selection. Hundreds of armed SS guards with a large number of dogs stood behind the barbed-wire fence. The political department was represented by Unterführers Boger and Hustek who, together with the Kommandoführers were in charge of the selection.

For a start, the three pathologists and their assistants were sent to one side and after them the thirty prisoners, including myself, billeted in crematorium

5. Finally the SS chose a third group of some seventy prisoners who were to form the demolition team. The rest were told they would be transferred to camp Grossrosen. What happened to them we never learned, but we all realized that their time had come.

Suddenly from out of the ranks of doomed prisoners stepped the young Rabbinical student who had worked [German original: in the attic of Crematorium II; 1979a, p. 262] in the hair-drying team. He turned to Oberscharführer Muthsfeld and with sublime courage told him to be quiet. Then he began to speak to the crowd: ”

This is then followed by the text of the claimed speech itself.

In the following table I compare Nyiszli’s text of this speech according to the translation published by Quick (to the left)⁵⁴ with Müller’s text (to the right).⁵⁵

“Brüder!	““Brüder!” rief er,
Ein unerforschlicher Wille hat unser Volk in den Tod geschickt.	‘nach Gottes unerforschlichem Rat-schluss treten wir jetzt unseren letzten Gang ein.
Das Schicksal hat uns als grausamste Pflicht auferlegt, bei der Vernichtung un-seres Volkes mitzuwirken, ehe wir selbst zu Asche werden.	Ein grausames und schreckliches Schick-sal hat uns gezwungen, bei der Ausrot-tung unseres Volkes mitzuwirken , bevor wir jetzt selbst zu Asche werden.
Der Himmel hat sich nicht geöffnet, kein Regen ist gefallen, der stark genug ge-wesen wäre, die von Menschenhänden errichteten Scheiterhaufen zu löschen.	Der Himmel hat keine strafende Blitze gesandt, er hat auch keinen Regen fallen lassen, der stark genug gewesen wäre, die Brände der von Menschenhänden er-richteten Scheiterhaufen zu ersticken.
Mit jüdischer Ergebung müssen wir uns in das Unabänderliche fügen.	Mit jüdischer Ergebenheit müssen wir jetzt das Unabänderliche hinnehmen.
Es ist eine Prüfung, die der Herr uns ge-schickt hat.	Es ist die letzte Prüfung, die uns der Himmel geschickt hat.
Nach den Gründen zu suchen, ist nicht Aufgabe von uns Menschen, die wir ein Nichts sind gegen den allmächtigen Gott.	Nach den Gründen zu fragen, steht uns nicht an, denn wir sind nichts gegen den allmächtigen Gott.
Fürchtet euch nicht vor dem Tod!	Fürchtet euch nicht vor dem Tod!
Welch ein Wert hätte für uns noch das Leben, wenn es uns durch Zufall erhal-ten bliebe?	Was für ein Wert hätte denn das Leben noch für uns, wenn wir es durch einen Zufall retten könnten?
Wir kämen wohl in unsere Städte und Dörfer zurück. Aber was würde uns dort erwarten – leere, ausgeplünderte Wohnun-gen. Unsere tränenblinden Augen würden	Vergeblich würden wir nach unseren vernichteten Angehörigen suchen.

vergeblich nach unseren vernichteten Angehörigen suchen.
Wir wären allein. Ohne Familie. Ohne Verwandte. Allein und verloren würden wir in der Welt umherirren.	Wir wären allein, ohne Familie, ohne Angehörige, ohne Freunde, ohne Heimat, und müssten ohne Ziel in der Welt herumirren.
Nirgends fänden wir Ruhe und Frieden. Schatten unseres einstigen Ichs und unserer Vergangenheit.	Nirgends gäbe es noch Ruhe und Frieden für uns,
Und so würden wir dann eines Tages einsam sterben... ”	bis wir dann eines Tages einsam und verlassen irgendwo sterben würden.
	Deshalb, Brüder, lasst uns stark und tapfer in den Tod gehen, den Gott jetzt beschlossen hat.””

This at-times-verbatim plagiarism requires an explanation. Müller was a Slovak native speaker, but, as I noted above, he spoke German, albeit with difficulty. He certainly wrote the draft of his book in Slovak, and the Archive of the Yad Vashem Institute in Jerusalem holds about seventy pages of it.⁵⁶ His book, however, appeared directly in German; it is not a translation. In fact, no previous Slovak edition exists. It is therefore clear that it was Müller himself who translated the Slovak draft into German (with the help of Helmut Freitag, who carried out the German reworking of the text) and it was again Müller who transcribed into the German draft the aforementioned passages he copied directly from Nyiszli’s Quick article.

The plagiarism is even more pronounced than it might appear from this comparison, because it mostly involves the other words not directly copied, which Müller replaced with synonyms or paraphrased, as is clearly evident from the comparison of the two translations:

“Brothers!	““Brothers!’ he cried,
An unfathomable will has sent our people to their death.	‘according to God’s unfathomable counsel, we are now entering our final course.
Fate has given burdened us with the cruellest duty to participate in the annihilation of our people before we ourselves turn into ashes.	A cruel and terrible fate has forced us to participate in the extermination of our people before we ourselves turn into ashes.
The sky has not opened, no rain has fallen that would have been strong enough to extinguish the pyres made by human hands.	Heaven did not send punitive lightning, it did not let any rain fall either that would have been strong enough to stifle the fires of the pyres made by human hands.
With Jewish submission, we must submit to the immutable.	With Jewish submissiveness we must now accept the immutable.
It is an ordeal the Lord has sent us.	It is the last ordeal Heaven has sent us.

⁵⁶ YVA, P/25-44.

It is not up to us humans to look for the reasons, since we are nothing compared to Almighty God.	It is not up to us to ask for the reasons, for we are nothing compared to Almighty God.
Do not be afraid of death!	Do not be afraid of death!
For what value would life still have for us if it were preserved by chance?	What value would life still have for us if we could save it by chance?
We would probably come back to our cities and villages. But what would await us there – empty, looted dwellings. Our tear-blind eyes would search in vain for our annihilated relatives.	We would search in vain for our annihilated relatives.
We would be alone. Without family. Without relatives. Alone and lost we would roam about the world.	We would be alone, without family, without relatives, without friends, without a home, and would have to roam about the world aimlessly.
Nowhere would we find peace and quiet. Shadows of our former selves and our past.	Nowhere would there be peace and quiet for us,
And so one day we would die lonely...”	until one day we would die lonely and abandoned somewhere.
	Therefore, brothers, let us go strong and valiant to the death God has now ordained.””

Even the claim that the “Dayan” “ate almost nothing but bread, margarine and onions” (Müller 1979b, p. 66; “aß er fast nur Brot, Margarine und Zwiebeln”; 1979a, p. 104)” was copied almost verbatim from Nyiszli: “he nourished himself... only with bread, margarine and onions” (“hat er sich [...] nur von Brot, Margarine und Zwiebeln ernährt”; Nyiszli 1961, No. 10, p. 47).

Nyiszli believed that the Effektenlager, the Birkenau warehouse sector consisting of 30 barracks, called “Kanada” in the camp slang, was a burning rubbish heap that was in the courtyard of Crematorium III! Müller was helped to avoid such a blunder, because the translator of the Quick article intervened drastically to correct it by radically rewriting the text: where the original text, in correct translation, says (Mattogno 2020a, p. 116):

“I had no other arguments. The Ober[scharführer Mussfeld] accepted them, and at my suggestion the man [the Dajan] was sent to the so-called Canada rubbish heap burning in the courtyard of Crematorium II,” the mendacious German mistranslation reads (Nyiszli 1961, No. 10, p. 47):

“Oberscharführer Mussfeld had accepted this nonsensical reason and transferred him to the ‘Canada’ unit, whose task it is to sort and store the belongings of the newcomers.”

He saved himself by making up the story that the “Dayan” had worked “in the attic of Crematorium II in the hair-drying team,” yet by so doing, he introduced an irreducible contradiction to Nyiszli’s story.

What irrefutably confirms the plagiarism is the context in which the speech was delivered according to the two witnesses: for Nyiszli, this happened in the furnace room of Crematorium III (according to today’s numbering), in front of 460 inmates of the “Sonderkommando”; for Müller, it took place in the courtyard of Crematorium II in front of about 200 inmates of the “Sonderkommando.” For Nyiszli, all the inmates were selected and killed except himself and his three coworkers, namely the physicians Dénes Görög and Józef Körner, as well as the laboratory assistant Adolf Fischer, who were therefore the only survivors of the selection. For Müller, however, there were 100 survivors! For Nyiszli, who never mentions Müller, Müller would have been among those selected, hence would have been killed right then and there. This explains why Müller kept quiet about Nyiszli. As mentioned earlier, he mentioned Nyiszli for the first time during the 98th hearing in the Frankfurt Trial (Fritz Bauer..., pp. 20696-20698):

“1944, during the Hungarian transports, there were two Hungarian physicians, pathologists, in one room in Crematorium I [=II]. One of them, if I remember correctly, was called Doctor Nyiszli, a strong man. They had conducted experiments. And Doctor Mengele joined them very often. These two inmates were then taken to Crematorium IV [=V], where they were in the room next to the chimney – that was the room that connected the cremation room with the undressing room... There, in this room, another man who wasn’t a doctor worked with these two Hungarian doctors. And he came from Theresienstadt. I personally saw that they had put a hunchbacked person into a barrel. They put various salts and acids in it in order to obtain his skeleton.”

In the statements cited earlier, Müller limited himself to misrepresenting some data in Nyiszli’s story: The “pathologists” who were transferred to Crematorium V were not two, but, as I have clarified above, three, plus a laboratory assistant, and these, I repeat, were the only survivors of the “Sonderkommando.” They had never conducted any experiments in Crematorium II, but only autopsies. The presence of an assistant from Theresienstadt is Müller’s invention, and the anecdote of the hunchback is imaginatively taken from Nyiszli’s narration. Nyiszli wrote that a father and son arrived with a transport from the Lodz Ghetto, the father hunchbacked, the son with a deformed foot, so they attracted Dr. Mengele’s attention, who had them killed in order to exhibit their skeletons as proof of the degeneration of the Jewish race (a theory invented and attributed to Mengele by Nyiszli). Nyiszli boiled the two corpses in two iron barrels, but it all happened in the courtyard of Crematorium II (Mattogno 2020a, pp. 106-109), yet for Müller, inside Crematorium V!

Nyiszli's testimony was evidently too embarrassing for Müller, so the Hungarian doctor disappears in his book; he is never mentioned.

Nyiszli, in his memoirs, claimed to have been the only physician and at the same time the only inmate of the "Sonderkommando" who had survived: all the others had been killed or had died (his three collaborators). For Müller, on the other hand, there were only two doctors from the "Sonderkommando," Dr. Pach and Dr. Bendel. According to Müller, "a sort of consulting room linked to a small hospital" had been set up in Block 13 of Camp Sector BIId, where the "Sonderkommando" was lodged.

"In charge of this hospital was Dr Jacques Pach, at that time the only doctor in the Sonderkommando. [...] It was in the spring of 1943 that Jacques Pach was appointed as doctor in the Sonderkommando." (Müller 1979b, p. 63)

Many pages later, Müller explains that it had become necessary "to establish a small ward for prisoners requiring in-patient treatment," and he adds:

"Once Dr Pach's ward for in-patients had been set up the treatment of Sonderkommando out-patients was taken over by Dr Bendel." (Ibid., p. 148)

Previously, up to and including his Frankfurt testimony, Müller knew nothing of Dr. Pach, and he undoubtedly took this information from Henryk Tauber's statement of May 24, 1945, of which he probably had only second-hand knowledge (Mattoigno 2020a, pp. 372f.). The same is true for Dr. Charles Sigmund Bendel, a perjurious professional witness who between 1945 and 1948 gave as many as six false testimonies. He declared that he entered the "Sonderkommando" as a physician on June 2, 1944, and remained there until January 17, 1945 (see ibid., Chapter 4.2., pp. 304-333). Due to these six-and-a-half months of allegedly living together, Müller should have known Bendel perfectly well, and yet, the only reference to Bendel in his book is the one just quoted. It is therefore clear that he had never met him, and had simply read his name in some book in his library. Not knowing what to write about him, he resorted to the old story of "pathologists" inspired by Nyiszli's book. Just as suddenly, "two Hungarian doctors, Dr. Peter and Dr. Havas" enter the scene out of nowhere and without any further explanation (Müller 1979a, p. 248). The sanitized English translation omits their names altogether (1979b, p. 154). Further on, when writing about the selection at the end of November 1944, Müller wrote, as quoted earlier: "For a start, the three pathologists and their assistants were sent to one side [...]". Finally, in reference to Crematorium V, he states (German edition, 1979a, p. 264):

"Here, under the direction of Dr. Mengele, who was assisted by three inmate physicians and the autopsy assistant Fischer, carried out corpse autopsies, which were part of the pseudo-medical experiments with which he was concerned."

The sanitized English translation omits all three inmate physicians and Fischer's name:

"In the same building behind a wooden partition was the dissecting room where Dr Mengele and his assistants continued with their pseudo-medical experiments." (1979b, p. 162)

With various contortions, Müller also plagiarized from Nyiszli the story of the transfer of the dissection room to Crematorium V (Nyiszli 1961, No. 11, p. 50):

"Everything is packed up in the dissecting room and laboratory. We only take the marble slab from the autopsy table. After a few hours, we are finished with the move and have set up both the autopsy room and the laboratory in Crematorium IV [= V]."

However, according to this account, the four inmates mentioned by Müller were the three doctors Nyiszli, Görög and Körner and the laboratory attendant Fischer. At the Frankfurt trial, as seen above, Müller had spoken of "two Hungarian physicians, pathologists," one of whom, if he remembered correctly, "was called Doctor Nyiszli."

As noted earlier, Müller introduces Dr. Bendel in his book with just a few lines as a 1944 "Sonderkommando" physician, who then disappears completely. In his place, suddenly "two Hungarian doctors, Dr. Peter and Dr. Havas," appear from a brief glimpse, who are supposed to be the two previous "pathologists," although one of them was Nyiszli. Finally, by some miraculous doubling, these two inmate physicians turn into four, one of whom was Adolf Fischer, so the other three must have been Nyiszli, Görög and Körner.

Plagiarisms, and the need to hide them, ensnared Müller in a series of contradictions with no way out. I say plagiarisms, because what I pointed out above, while being the most striking example, is not the only one. Another one in the context outlined above is his reference to "pseudo-medical experiments" in the previous quote. It is obvious that Müller had no competence to judge the medical value of any experiments, let alone those allegedly conducted in his absence. In fact, he merely appropriated in two words Nyiszli's invective on the allegedly pseudo-scientific nature which he ascribed to Dr. Mengele's research (Mattogno 2020a, p. 109).

4.2. The Gassing Scene

The most-egregious plagiarism, which alone undermines Müller's credibility (assuming that we can still speak of any credibility at this point), is that concerning the alleged gassing scene. Here, the plagiarism is much more complex. Müller has broken down Nyiszli's related story into sections and recomposed it by changing their sequence and embroidering it with his own interpolations or by taking motifs from Kurt Gerstein's "eyewitness account." But he has not completely abstained from plagiarizing certain terms and expressions, as becomes apparent from the following comparison:

Müller (1979a, pp. 184-186)	Nyiszli (1961, No. 4, p. 29)

Also in this case, the examination of the two full-text passages reveals that the plagiarism is much deeper than is revealed by this comparison. In order to enable the skilled reader to compare the original German text passages, I report here both the German text and the English translation. Here is Müller’s account, German version (1979a, pp. 184-186):

*“Nach einigen Augenblicken befahl er dem Kommandoführer, die Ventilatoren einzuschalten, die das Gas absaugen sollten. [...]
Nach der Öffnung der Gaskammer wurde zuerst befohlen, die herausgefallenen Leichen und dann die hinter der Tür liegenden wegzuschaffen, um den Zugang freizumachen. The following is Müller’s published English version (1979b, pp. 116-118):

“After a while he ordered the Kommandoführer to switch on the fans which were to disperse the gas. [...]

We had orders that immediately after the opening of the gas chamber we were to take away first the corpses that had tumbled out, followed by those lying behind the door, so as to clear a path. This was done by putting the loop of a leather strap round the wrist of a corpse and then dragging the body to the lift by the strap and thence conveying it upstairs to the crematorium. When some room had been made behind the door, the corpses were hosed down. This served to neutralize any gas crystals still lying about, but mainly it was intended to clean the dead bodies. For almost all of them were wet with sweat and urine, filthy with blood and excrement, while the legs of many women were streaked with menstrual blood.

As soon as Zyklon B crystals came into contact with air the deadly gas began to develop, spreading first at floor level and then rising to the ceiling. It was for this reason that the bottom layer of corpses always consisted of children as well as the old and the weak, while the tallest and strongest lay on top, with middle-aged men and women in between. No doubt the ones on top had climbed up there over the bodies already lying on the floor because they still had the strength to do so and perhaps also because they had realized that the deadly gas was spreading from the bottom upwards. The people in their heaps were intertwined some lying in each other's arms, others holding each other's hands; groups of them were leaning against the walls, pressed against each other like columns of basalt.

The carriers had great difficulty in prising the corpses apart, even though they were still warm and not yet rigid. Many had their mouths wide open, on their lips traces of whitish dried-up spittle. Many had turned blue, and many faces were disfigured almost beyond recognition from blows. [...]

During the removal of corpses from the gas chamber bearers had to wear gas-masks because the fans were unable to disperse the gas completely. In particular there were remnants of the lethal gas in between the dead bodies, and this was released during cleaning out operations."

Here is Nyiszli's German tale, as Müller could access it (1961, No. 4, p. 29):

"Das Cyclon entwickelt Gase, sobald es mit Luft in Berührung kommt. [...] Die modernen Saugventilatoren haben das Gas bald aus dem Raum entfernt. Nur zwischen den Toten ist es noch in kleinen Mengen vorhanden. Deshalb trägt das Sonderkommando, das jetzt mit Schläuchen hereinkommt, Gasmasken.

Ein grauenhaftes Bild bietet sich:

Die Leichen liegen nicht im Raum verstreut, sondern türmen sich hoch übereinander. Das ist leicht zu erklären: Das von draußen eingeworfene Cyclon entwickelt seine tödlichen Gase zunächst in Bodenhöhe. Die oberen Luftschichten erfaßt es erst nach und nach. Deshalb trampeln die Unglücklichen sich gegenseitig nieder, einer klettert über den anderen. Je höher sie sind, desto später erreicht sie das Gas. Welch furchtbarer Kampf um zwei Minuten Lebensverlängerung... [...]

Ineinander verkrallt, mit blutig zerkratzten Leibern, aus Nase und Mund blutend, liegen sie da. Ihre Köpfe sind blau angeschwollen und bis zur Unkenntlichkeit entstellt. [...]

Das Sonderkommando in seinen Gummistiefeln stellt sich also rings um den Leichenberg auf und bespritzt ihn mit starkem Wasserstrahl. Das muß sein, weil sich beim Gastod als letzte Reflexbewegung der Darm entleert. Jeder Tote ist beschmutzt.

Nach dem 'Baden' der Toten werden die verkrampften Leiber voneinander gelöst. Eine furchtbare Arbeit. Um die im Todeskampf zusammengeballten Fäuste werden Riemen geschnallt, an denen man die vom Wasser glitschigen Toten zum Fahrstuhl schleift."

And finally, my translation of this early German version of Nyiszli's account:

"The cyclone develops gases as soon as it comes into contact with air. [...] The modern suction fans soon removed the gas from the room. It is only present in small quantities between the dead. That's why the Sonderkommando that comes in with hoses is wearing gas masks.

The corpses are not scattered around the room, but are piled high on top of each other. This is easy to explain: The cyclone thrown in from outside initially develops its deadly gases at ground level. It gets into the upper layers of air only gradually. That is why the unfortunate people trample each other down, one climbing over the other. The higher they are, the later the gas reaches them. What a terrible fight for two minutes of life extension ... [...]

They lie there, clinging to each other, with bodies scratched bloody, bleeding from nose and mouth. Their heads are swollen blue and disfigured beyond recognition. [...]

The Sonderkommando in their rubber boots therefore position themselves around the mountain of corpses and sprays it with a strong jet of water. That has to be, because during the gassing death throes, the bowels empty out as a last reflex. Every dead person is soiled.

After 'bathing' the dead, the intertwined bodies are released from each other. A terrible job. Around the fists, clenched together in agony, straps are wrapped and are used to drag the dead, slippery from the water, to the elevator."

In this case it is utterly impossible that Müller had observed the same scenario as described by Nyiszli, because it was invented by the Hungarian physician based on the erroneous assumption that Zyklon B consisted of chlorine. In the translation plagiarized by Müller, Nyiszli speaks of "Cyclon, a form of chlorine" ("Cyclon, eine Form von Chlor"; ibid.), but the original Hungarian text reads: "Cyclon, vagy Chlór szemcsés formája," meaning "Cyclon, or chlorine in granular form" (Mattogno 2020a, p. 40). As I have explained in my study on Nyiszli (ibid., p. 219), chlorine has a density of 2.45 with respect to air, therefore it is heavier than air. Hence, during a hypothetical gassing using chlorine, it would at least theoretically create the scenario described by Nyiszli: it would first permeate the lower air layers and then gradually the rest of the "gas chamber" from bottom to top, like a container that gradually fills with a liquid. The density of gaseous hydrogen cyanide, on the other hand, is 0.97 relative to air, therefore it is slightly lighter than air, so that, if anything, it would theoretically create exactly the opposite scenario: it would first fill the higher air layers and then gradually fill the "gas chamber" from top to bottom. In practice, however, it would actually fill all the air layers at the same time, as the density difference is too small to cause any such behavior.⁵⁸

The scenario invented by Nyiszli presents another material impossibility. He staged the gassing of 3,000 people in Morgue #1 of Crematorium II, the alleged gas chamber. As I documented in a specific paper,⁵⁹ under such conditions – but also with a third of the claimed victims or less – the bodies of the victims would have obstructed the air-extraction openings of the alleged gas chamber, which were located at floor level, 20 on each side of the room, making the extraction of the toxic fumes and consequently any successful ventilation impossible. Therefore, after each gassing, when the door was opened, the hydrogen-cyanide vapors would have wafted throughout the entire basement of the crematorium and partly also the furnace room. For Nyiszli, however, the “modern suction fans soon removed the gas from the room,” which is pure nonsense.

Müller in turn also staged the scene in Crematorium II, but he does not explicitly say that 3000 victims were crammed into Morgue #1. However, he mentions this figure as the capacity of the alleged gas chamber, so he tacitly assumed it also in the plagiarism set out above (1979b, p. 60):

“Every detail had been devised with the sole aim of cramming up to 3000 people into one room in order to kill them with poison gas.”

He didn’t have the faintest idea how the ventilation system was designed, because in this regard he states about the “gas chamber” (ibid., 61):

“A ventilating plant was installed in the wall; this was switched on immediately after each gassing to disperse the gas and thus to expedite the removal of corpses.”

In fact, Morgue #1 of Crematoria II and III was ventilated by two blowers, one extracting the air, the other supplying fresh air, which both had the same power and capacity, and were installed in the attics of the crematoria, not in the morgue’s wall. In the study mentioned earlier, I thoroughly described the entire ventilation system of these crematoria.⁶⁰

The blue color of some corpses is a well-known but utterly false stereotype of post-war testimonies. It is well-established, however, that the most-frequent color of cyanide-poisoning victims is pink-red (Trunk, p. 40; Rudolf 2020, pp. 228-230).

Like the source he plagiarized, Müller was unaware of the existence of a waste incinerator (Müllverbrennungsofen) in Crematoria II and III,⁶¹ because he never mentions it, but above all because he reports that “prayer-books and religious works, and also other books” – which according to Nyiszli were burned by the “Dayan” on “the so-called Canada rubbish heap,” as mentioned earlier – were burned “in one of the furnaces of Crematorium III.”⁶²

The waste incinerator already appears in the first drawing of the new crematorium (future Crematoria II/III), Plan 932 of January 23, 1942. Pressac 1989, pp. 284f.

⁶² Müller 1979a, S. 105; the sanitized English translation turned that into “in a particular oven in crematorium 3,” 1979b, p. 66.

Müller’s description of the devices allegedly used to introduce Zyklon B into the claimed gas chambers of Crematoria II and III also reveals his plagiarism, although Müller added his own nonsense to it:

Müller (1979a, p. 96; 1979b, p. 60)	Nyiszli (1961, No. 4, p. 29)
“Die Zyklon-B-Gas-Kristalle wurden nämlich durch Öffnungen in der Betondecke eingeworfen, die in der Gaskammer in hohle Blechsäulen einmündeten. Diese waren in gleichmäßigen Abständen durchlöchert und in ihrem Innern verlief von oben nach unten eine Spirale, um für eine möglichst gleichmäßige Verteilung der gekörnten Kristalle zu sorgen.”	“In der Mitte des Saales stehen im Abstand von jeweils dreißig Metern Säulen . Sie reichen vom Boden bis zur Decke. Keine Stützsäulen, sondern Eisen blech -rohre, deren Wände überall durchlöchert sind.”
“The Zyclon B gas crystals were inserted through openings [in the concrete ceiling, which in the gas chamber led] into hollow pillars made of sheet metal. They were perforated at regular intervals and inside them a spiral ran from top to bottom in order to ensure as even a distribution of the granular crystals as possible.”	“In the middle of the hall there are columns at a distance of thirty meters. They go from floor to ceiling. No support columns, but sheet-iron pipes, the walls of which are perforated everywhere.”

It goes without saying that the “official” devices, as sanctioned by the Auschwitz Museum, were structured in a completely different way:

“The Zyklon B gas was introduced to the gas chambers through four specially built devices constructed in the camp machine shops. They were shaped like vertical rectangular pillars, 70 cm wide and about 3 m. high, made of two layers of wire mesh with a sliding core section.” (Piper 2000, p. 166)

Müller’s addition to the tale – the inner spiral – is foolish, because the sheet-metal enclosure of those columns would have prevented the spiral from evenly distributing the “granular crystals,” which instead would have simply piled up within seconds inside the columns on the floor at the end of the spiral. When plagiarizing Nyiszli’s gassing tale, Müller forgot the columns again and instead stated that “gas crystals” were “still lying about” (1979b, p. 117), meaning that they were scattered out on the floor of the “gas chamber” so much so that they had to be neutralized with jets of water.

Since Nyiszli did not indicate the number of these devices, neither did Müller, who claims to have seen them personally many times.

Already earlier I dwelt on the tale of the Zyklon-B “crystals”. Müller affirmed that they turned into gas on contact with air, a nonsense he also copied from Nyiszli’s narration. It is well known that the evaporation rate of hydrogen cyanide from the inert carrier material essentially depended on the ambient air temperature and humidity, and required no contact with anything.

Müller asserted that each crematorium had a single “gas chamber” of about 250 square meters which was characterized by an “unusually low ceiling” (1979b, p. 60), which may be a vague echo of Bendel’s statement that the alleged gas chambers were only some 1.5 meters high (Mattogno 2020a, pp. 310-312); but the room in question, Morgue #1, measured 30 m × 7 m and was 2.41 meters high (Pressac 1989, p. 286), and it does not appear that Müller was a giant of over two meters such as to consider a ceiling that high to be “unusually low”.

Nyiszli’s influence also appears in the “room next to the gas chamber” (Müller 1979b, p. 79) which did not exist, but which was invented by the Hungarian physician in the context of his tale of a girl who had survived a gassing (Nyiszli 1961, No. 7, p. 34):

“I carry her to the next room, where the gassing unit is changing for its work.”

4.3. Executions with a Blow to Nape of the Neck

Another plagiarism, less-striking but no-less-shameless, concerns the executions of prisoners with a blow to the nape of the neck. Müller devotes three full pages to the description of the execution of a group of prisoners which ends in this way (Müller 1979a, p. 115):

“At the end of the execution, some 30 naked bodies were lying behind the execution wall on the floor. [...]

At these executions 6-mm small-bore rifles were used, and the shots were fired from a distance of 3 to 5 cm.”

The English translation turned 30 victims into 50 (1979b, p. 73):

“When the execution was over, fifty naked bodies were lying on the ground behind the wall. [...]

At these executions 6mm small-bore guns were used and fired from a distance of about 3 to 5 centimetres.”

His source, Nyiszli, stated (Mattogno 2020a, p. 50):

“The entrance hole reveals that it originates from a 6-millimeter, so-called small-caliber weapon; there is no exit-wound hole. [...]

I am no longer surprised either that the small-caliber bullets did not cause immediate death for all the victims, even though the shots were fired from a distance of 3-4 centimeters, as the burns on the skin show, straight in the direction of the brain stem.”

Even the description of the victims was plagiarized (Müller 1979b, p. 73):

“A few were still breathing stertorously, their limbs moving feebly while they sought to raise their blood-stained heads; their eyes were wide open: the victims were not quite dead because the bullets had missed their mark by a fraction.”

And here is Nyiszli's original (Mattogno 2020a, pp. 49f.):

"Some among them are still alive, they make slow movements with their arms and legs and keep trying to lift their bloodied heads, eyes opened wide. I lift one of the still-moving heads, then a second one, then a third, [...] It appears the gun was off by 1-2 millimeters, and thus it did not cause immediate death."

Here too, the context categorically refutes that Müller saw the same scenes described by Nyiszli. For Müller, single Jews or small groups of Jews who had been captured while trying to escape from the ghettos of Sosnowice and Będzin, were sent to Birkenau to be shot in the nape of the neck, rather than being gassed like everyone else, although it is unclear why. The execution Müller described took place in the "execution room" or "shooting room" of Crematorium V⁶³ and concerned precisely "a small group of Jewish families" (ibid., p. 71), including children, made up, as quoted earlier, of some 30 people (or 50, in the English text).

For Nyiszli, on the other hand, the execution took place in Crematorium II, involved 70 regular camp inmates, and was common practice (Mattogno 2020a, p. 50):

"I ask one of the Sonderkommando where the seventy unfortunates came from. They are the selected from camp section C, he replies, every evening at seven a truck brings seventy over. They all get a shot to the back of the neck."

Müller wrote moreover (Müller 1979b, pp. 67f.):

"In 1941 I read in a fascist Slovak daily that the Third Reich no longer needed gold reserves to support its economy, since there was now a new and much fairer system, based on its citizens' enthusiasm for work and far superior to the fraudulent Jewish-plutocratic economic system. Two years later the hypocritical mendacity of these phrases was demonstrated before my very eyes. Towards the end of the summer of 1943 a workshop for melting gold was set up in crematorium 3."

In that workshop, evidently gold teeth extracted from gassing victims are said to have been processed. Nyiszli had made a similar statement already much earlier (Mattogno 2020a, p. 71):

"Their whole financial system is based on false foundations. Countless times they have trumpeted to the world that the foundational value of the National-Socialist Third Reich is not gold, but work! And yet, in a facility established specifically for this purpose, every day they smelt 30-40 kilos of gold from the teeth of Jews brought here and murdered."

⁶³ Müller 1979a, pp. 113f. In the English edition, an entire paragraph describing the prayers Müller wants to have heard coming from the "execution room" ("Hinrichtungsraum") is omitted here, and in the next paragraph, it uses the term "place of execution" rather than "shooting room" ("Erschießungsraum"); 1979b, p. 72.

However, this passage had been omitted from the 1961 German translation (Nyiszli 1961, No. 7, p. 34), so Müller was undoubtedly inspired by a common anecdotal source, but he could not plagiarize the quantity of tooth gold allegedly processed every day. Instead, he wrote that “frequently they melted down between 5 and 10 kilogrammes a day” (Müller 1979b, p. 68), a number he might have obtained with some bizarre calculation from the 2,000 kg of gold allegedly retrieved until October 1944, if we believe Kraus and Kulka (see quote starting on p. 82).

4.4. Further Plagiarisms and Contradictions

Müller also copied from Nyiszli the reference to Noma, or oral cancer, which affects the soft and bony tissues of the mouth especially in children. He claims to have seen in the crematorium the corpses of children from the Gypsy Camp who had been affected by this disease. The inmates of the “Sonderkommando” believed that these corpses had been mauled by rats, but the physicians explained to them that it was Noma (Müller 1979b, p. 149), a topic that, among the “Sonderkommando” witnesses, was mentioned exclusively by Nyiszli (1961, No. 3, p. 31).

The events of the evacuation from Birkenau and the transfer to Mauthausen run parallel in Müller’s and Nyiszli’s story, without the two ever encountering each other.⁶⁴

Both were in Crematorium V on the night when the inmates were gathered for evacuation,⁶⁵ Nyiszli and his three aides alone, four people in all, because the 30 inmates who ran the furnaces were not part of the “Sonderkommando,” hence they were staying in Auschwitz. Müller, on the other hand, claims to have been part of the group of 30 “Sonderkommando” inmates who were assigned to the crematorium. “Towards midnight” (“gegen Mitternacht”) Nyiszli was awakened with a start by loud explosions; the crematorium was not guarded, so he and his aides fled, crossed the Birkenau grove (“durchqueren den kleinen Birkenauer Wald”) and joined the mass of inmates. Müller instead saw “during the late afternoon” (“im Laufe des späten Nachmittags”) a Blockführer arrive who ordered the “Sonderkommando” to vacate the crematorium, and they all ran across the Birkenau grove (“liefen quer durch das Wäldchen”), and went to Camp Sector BIId, where the other 70 inmates of the demolition team were housed. Only then did they rejoin the large mass of about 20,000 inmates, who then marched to Loslau (today’s Wodzisław Śląski), from where they continued on to Mauthausen.

In addition to Nyiszli, Müller also used Czech’s “Auschwitz Chronicle” to create this story, in which he read precisely that

⁶⁵ The night from January 17-18 for Nyiszli, from January 18-19 for Müller.

“in the afternoon, a column of around 1,500 prisoners left Camp [Sector] BIId in Birkenau. This column also included the Sonderkommando with 30 inmates, the demolition team of the crematorium with 70 inmates, and the penal squad with around 400 inmates.”

These inmates then marched toward Wodzisław Śląski (Czech 1964b, pp. 99f.). Dragon, on the other hand, denied it all and asserted instead:⁶⁶

“All of us who remained alive were transferred and quartered at Crematorium No. III. I stayed in Crematorium No. III until November 1944. Subsequently the entire Sonderkommando was transferred to the BIId Camp. I was in Block 13. [...] I remained in Block 13 of the BIId Camp until the beginning of January 1945. Then I was transferred with all the Sonderkommando to Block 16, from where on January 18 we were sent with a transport to the Reich.”

Müller also copied from Nyiszli, with some embellishments, the nonsensical anecdote of the search for “Sonderkommando” inmates at Mauthausen, which the latter presented as follows (Nyiszli 1961, No. 11, p. 51):

“On the third day, two SS officers appear. Who of us has worked in the Auschwitz crematoria, they want to know.”

And here is Müller’s version (1979b, p. 167):

“On the third day after our arrival we had lined up for roll-call in the late afternoon, when out of the blue one of the SS-Untersführers gave the order: ‘All prisoners of the Auschwitz Sonderkommando, fall out!’”

This is clearly a nonsensical fabrication. The inmates were transferred with name lists, on which Filip Müller’s name also appears.⁶⁷ Over 5,700 prisoners who had left Auschwitz on January 18, 1945 arrived at Mauthausen on the 25th and were registered under numbers 116501-122225 (Het Neederlandsche..., p. 85). If we were to believe Nyiszli’s and Müller’s tale, we would have to assume that the SS, after exterminating the “Sonderkommando” inmates several times as “carriers of secrets” in Auschwitz, and after carefully erasing the traces of the alleged mass extermination at Birkenau, left the last 100 “Sonderkommando” inmates alive. Indeed, after the “last gassing,” which took place in November 1944 according to Müller,⁶⁸ these inmates had become utterly useless, in fact, a dangerous dead weight, and there was plenty of time to eliminate them. Inexplicably, however, the SS did not just leave them alive. During the evacuation, they allowed them to mingle with the other inmates, and only three days after the transport had arrived at Mauthausen, they made all the inmates line up, crazily shouting: “All prisoners of the Auschwitz Sonderkommando, fall out!” (implying: “So we can shoot them!”). And we are also to believe that the stupidity of the SS went so far as to being unable to pick out the “Sonderkommando” inmates from the name list that accompanied the deportees. In fact, when Auschwitz Inmate No. 29236 – Filip Müller, whose name is on that list – was registered at Mauthausen,⁶⁹ if he really had been wanted as a “carrier of secrets,” could have been identified easily, and could have been eliminated without the need for any roll call, just like all his other colleagues.

5. Plagiarized History of Birkenau: Kraus and Kulka

5.1. Kraus’s and Kulka’s Trial Declarations

In his book, Müller claims that he personally knew his countrymen Ota Kraus and Erich Kulka, the authors of the book Továrna na smrt, who recorded his statement as quoted in Subchapter 1.1. (Müller 1979a, p. 162):

“In great excitement I ran into the locksmith’s workshop around noon. There I met Otto Kraus, Laco Langfelder and Erich Schoen-Kulka, whose wife and son were also housed in the family camp. I had been friends with all of them for a long time, and each knew that he could rely on the other.”

The sanitized English edition has this compressed to (1979b, p. 102):

“In a state of great agitation I hurried to the repair shop during the lunch-break. There I met three fellow prisoners with whom I had long been on friendly terms. One of them, Erich Schoen, had his wife and son living in the Family Camp.”

Müller had learned of the upcoming liquidation of the Family Camp (Familienlager), and had rushed to tell his friends. During the interview with Lanzmann, Müller stated in this regard (2010, p. 102):

“Mü: Yes, a few times I thought about fleeing. I wanted to flee with my friends, Erich Kulka and Otto Kraus. We made a plan in the year, 1944, and we wanted to figure out how far to flee, but then this, this, our initiative became more difficult by the fact that Erich Kulka had a son, who was quite young and... he was about twelve or thirteen and he (might) survive Auschwitz, and because of this possibility, among other things, it got more difficult.”

Kraus and Kulka had been witnesses at the Höss Trial, where both testified during the 11th hearing. Kraus’s appearance was fleeting and irrelevant. He stated that he had spent five years in German concentration camps in Dachau, Sachsenhausen, Hamburg and two years in Birkenau. According to him, “all the witnesses of this extermination in Birkenau must have been exterminated, whereas the traces of these crimes were erased.” Regarding Birkenau, he only

mentioned briefly a Jewish transport from Theresienstadt in September 1943.⁷⁰

Kraus also participated in the Krakow trial against the Auschwitz camp garrison, and was interrogated during the 6th hearing. Here, the witness was a little more talkative. I summarize his statements about Birkenau:⁷¹

“The Brzezinka [Birkenau] camp was the extermination camp of all peoples. The Jews came first, then the Poles and Czechs had to follow.”

According to Kraus, 20% of the deportees were registered and sent to work, while the rest were killed.

“We made the lists ourselves at the camp, and according to our calculations, approximately 2 million citizens of the Polish Republic, 150,000 Czechs, 500,000 Hungarians, 250,000 Germans, 90,000 Dutch, 60,000 Belgians, 80,000 Greeks and several ten thousand Yugoslavs, Italians and others died in the gas chambers. This total amounts to three and a half million, mostly Jews. In addition, about 400,000 people who were political prisoners, so that the total number of deaths in Brzezinka amounts to 4,000,000.”

There is no need to comment on such numerical nonsense. When asked by Prosecutor Pečalski regarding the source of these figures, Kraus replied:

“I got these figures from people who worked in the so-called ‘Kanada’ and the ‘Sonderkommando’ and from the secretaries at the Political Department.”

The witness did not mention Filip Müller.

During the Warsaw trial, Kulka testified right after Kraus. He stated that he had been in Auschwitz from 1942 until the camp’s evacuation. The selection assigned 80% of the deportees to be gassed, and only 20% to work. In February 1943, a commission of senior figures from the Reich, including Eichmann and Pohl, arrived at the camp, which is pure fiction. The witness then described the gassing of the inmates lodged in the Family Camp: first, 1,000 men were selected who were sent to Schwarzharz, 2,000 women who were transferred to Hamburg and Stutthof, finally 80 boys aged 14-16 who were sent to a German factory. “All the rest, 7,000-8,000 [detainees], were liquidated on July 10, 12, 1943 [sic].” All these figures are completely made-up and without basis in fact (see Mattogno 2016, pp. 160-164), but that didn’t stop Danuta Czech from incorporating them uncritically in her Auschwitz Chronicle by quoting the book Továrna na smrt, with only the date being corrected, which became July 10 and 11, 1944 (Czech 1990, p. 662).

Kulka then testified about the so-called “Operation Höss” that took place at Birkenau from April to September 1944:

⁷⁰ Höss Trial, 11th hearing, March 22, 1947, pp. 1168-1173.

⁷¹ Trial of members of the Auschwitz camp garrison, 6th hearing, pp. 231-238.

“At the time, 40,000 [which should read 400,000, as mentioned a few pages later] Hungarian Jews arrived at Birkenau, who were exterminated under horrible circumstances. The crematoria cremated 20,000 people a day.”

He also referred to his book: “I refer to Kraus’s book The Death Factory, which gives exact data on all these figures,” that is, 392,000 registered inmates, of whom 266,000 were men and 110,000 were women, plus 16,000 Gypsies. The book Továrna na smrt, written by Kraus and himself under the name of Erich Schön, had been published the year before.

Later the witness stated:

“I was present at the construction of the crematoria as a blacksmith, a profession that I practiced in the camp. I therefore had access to all the camps [camp sectors] and to all technical installations. I saw how the Germans, with great alacrity, steadily increased the crematoria’s capacity, and often the entire medical commission, of technicians and scientists from Berlin gathered there, who studied the gassing, and they always gave indications on how to improve the extermination of people.”

70,000 Jews had allegedly arrived from Theresienstadt, and 150,000 from all over the Czech Republic. Here, too, we are in fairytale land.

From their depositions it becomes clear that Kraus and Kulka knew practically nothing about the crematoria and the alleged gas chambers of Birkenau at that time.

5.2. The Death Factory

In Továrna na smrt, Kraus and Kulka had tried to put together all the knowledge of the time, especially in the Czech-speaking world. It is to their credit that they were the first to published fairly precise plans of the Birkenau crematoria. In this regard they wrote the following (here quoted from the English translation Kraus/Kulka 1966, pp. 127-130):

“Crematoria with Gas Chambers

The new crematoria with their gas chambers – corpse-processing factories – were no longer old converted cottages but modern buildings, carefully devised, planned and constructed by SS officers.

The construction was started in the autumn of 1942. They were built by thousands of prisoners^[72] organized in building parties bearing the official titles: Arbeitskommando Krematorium I, II, III, IV. SS officers gave the Kapos directions in accordance with the plans drawn up at the enormous building office in Auschwitz I. The technical drawings for the furnaces were marked ‘Topf & Sons, Erfurt’; they were dated 1937, which makes it clear that the Nazis were preparing and planning this crime, down to the last detail, long before they unleashed the Second World War.^[73] The erection of the four Birkenau crematoria thus constitutes a culminating point in the Nazis' organized attempt to break all resistance by freedom-loving mankind.

Crematoria I and II were large and were equipped with underground gas chambers; Crematoria III and IV were smaller, not so well appointed, and the gas chambers were above ground. Crematoria I and II each had a single squat chimney, while Crematoria III and IV each had two chimneys.

The plans for these crematoria, reproduced in this book, come from the building office (Bauleitung) at Birkenau Camp whence they were removed by Vera Foltýnová, an architect who worked there. We sent these plans to Czechoslovakia in August, 1944, by Fabián Sukup because at that time we assumed that both the crematoria and we ourselves would be liquidated as witnesses to German crimes. The removal of inconvenient witnesses was a normal occurrence throughout the Third Reich, especially in the concentration camps.

At first sight the crematoria – one-storey buildings in German style, with steep roofs, barred windows and dormer windows – presented the appearance of large bakeries. The space around them was enclosed by high tension barbed wire and was always well kept. The roads were sprayed with sand, and well-tended flowers bloomed in the beds on the lawn. The underground gas chambers, projecting some 20 in. above ground level, formed a grassy terrace. A person coming to the crematoria for the first time could have no idea what these industrial-looking buildings were actually for.

Crematoria I and II were close to the camp itself and were visible from all sides. Crematoria III and IV, on the other hand, were hidden in a little wood; tall pine trees and birches concealed the tragedies that befell millions. This place was called Brzezinka, from which the name Birkenau is derived. Around the crematoria were long, high piles of wood which was used for burning corpses, mainly in the pits.

At Crematoria I and II there were two underground rooms. The larger of these was an undressing-room and was occasionally used as a mortuary; the other was a gas chamber. The whitewashed undressing-room had square concrete pillars, about 12 ft apart, down the middle. Along the walls and round the pillars there were benches, with coat-hooks surmounted by numbers. A pipe with a number of water taps ran the entire length of one of the walls. There were the usual notices in several languages: NO NOISE!, KEEP THIS PLACE CLEAN AND TIDY!, and arrows pointing to the doors bearing the words: DISINFECTION, BATHROOM. The gas chamber was somewhat shorter than the undressing-room and looked like a communal bathroom. The showers in the roof, of course, were not used for water. Water taps were placed along the walls. Between the concrete pillars were two iron pillars, 1 ft x 1 ft, covered in thickly plaited wire. These pillars passed through the concrete ceiling to the grassy terrace mentioned above; here they terminated in airtight trap-doors into which the SS men fed the cyclon gas. The purpose of the plaited wire was to prevent any interference with the cyclon crystals. These pillars were a later addition to the gas chambers and hence do not appear in the plan.

Each of the gas chambers at Crematoria I and II was capable of accommodating up to 2000 people at a time.

At the entrance to the gas chamber was a lift, behind double doors, for transporting the corpses to the furnace-rooms on the ground-floor, with their 15 three-stage furnaces.^[74] At the bottom stage air was driven in by electric fans, at the middle the fuel was burnt, and at the top the corpses were placed, two or three at a time, on the stout fire-clay grate. The furnaces had cast-iron doors which were opened by means of a pulley. ^[75]...

Crematoria III and IV, though smaller, worked faster than Crematoria I and II. Each had three gas chambers above ground, accommodating more than 2000 people at once, and eight furnaces.

The four crematoria together had eight gas chambers with a capacity of 8000 people; there were forty-six furnaces all told, each capable of burning at least three bodies in 20 minutes."

The Czech text in the 1957 edition of Továrna na smrt (Kraus/Kulka 1957a, pp. 143-156), of which the texts in Die Todesfabrik and The Death Factory are fairly accurate translations, is basically identical to the text of the first edition of 1946 (pp. 120-123; it merely has a few stylistic changes). This means that in the eleven years that elapsed between the two editions, the authors did not feel they had to add anything to their meager description and, strangely enough, made no reference to the results of the Warsaw and Krakow trials (they merely reported the sentences imposed on the 40 defendants in the second trial; 1957a, p. 277). They did not mention the testimony of any self-proclaimed "Sonderkommando" member such as Stanisław Jankowski, Henryk Mandelbaum, Szlama Dragon or Henryk Tauber.

In summary, when Kraus and Schön-Kulka wrote their book in 1946, the situation was as follows:

1. They did not know any eyewitnesses of the Birkenau "Sonderkommando," other than František Feldmann, whom I will discuss later. In 1947, Kraus said that he had had contact with inmates of the "Sonderkommando" who (along with other sources) had provided him the figures of the gassings and that "all the witnesses of this extermination in Birkenau," therefore most certainly the "Sonderkommando" inmates, "must have been exterminated."

⁷⁴ In the Czech edition "15 třístupňových pecí": the adjective means "three-step," "three-stage." I will discuss this purely imaginative description of these plants later.

⁷⁵ This only applied to the 8-muffle furnaces of Crematoria IV and V.

2. They published fairly precise plans of Crematoria II-III and IV-V,⁷⁶ which they had received from the prisoner Věra Fortýnová, who had stolen them from the planning office of the Central Construction Office.
3. They published two photographs of a three-dimensional model of Crematorium III⁷⁷ and also
4. a photograph of the Topf coke-fired triple-muffle furnace in the Buchenwald crematorium,⁷⁸ whose design was identical to that of the furnaces set up in Crematoria II and III at Birkenau.⁷⁹
5. They were longtime friends of Müller and had been interned with him in Birkenau.

Given these circumstances, can anyone seriously believe that the authors, who had at their disposal an authentic “Sonderkommando” member of Birkenau who had been a stoker, had worked in Crematoria II, III and V, could explain the floor plans and the models of the crematoria in great detail, and provide invaluable information on the gassing and cremation techniques – can anyone seriously believe, I repeat, that the authors would have been content with a trite statement from that person merely dealing with the Main Camp crematorium as quoted in Subchapter 1.1.? The question is patently rhetorical.

Müller’s statement published by Kraus and Kulka thus indisputably demonstrates that they knew at the time that Müller was not part of the “Sonderkommando” of Birkenau, even if they pretended to believe in his self-definition as a “member of the Auschwitz and Birkenau Sonderkommando.”

This is evident beyond a shadow of a doubt from how they presented his statement. This is inserted in a paragraph entitled “Zvláštní oddíl” (Sonderkommando), which I present here in full from the English translation published in 1966:⁸⁰

“THE SPECIAL SQUAD (SONDERKOMMANDO)

The Sonderkommando (or ‘special squad’) was a group of prisoners whose appointment was equivalent to a death sentence, since nobody was allowed to leave the squad and had to continue working until he died or was killed. The work he had to perform was the most abominable that could possibly be imagined – the preparations for the mass murder of innocent people, men, women and children. Sometimes he had even to help in the murder of his own parents, wife, brothers, or sisters, and then consign them to the furnaces.

Prisoners sent to work with the Sonderkommando were personally selected by Schwarzhuber, Commandant of Birkenau.

The Sonderkommando helped the SS men with the work of undressing the people before they went into the gas chamber. They had to transport the corpses to the furnaces, or lay them in heaps and burn them, and clear away the ash. They cleaned out the gas chambers, and arranged the clothing, footwear and other personal belongings of the dead.

At the outset the Sonderkommando was composed exclusively of Jews. Subsequently Russians were included, and the last Sonderkommando had five Polish political prisoners whose death sentences were commuted into sentences to work in this squad.

The prisoner-doctors in the Sonderkommando had the task of extracting gold teeth from the corpses. The SS examined the mouth of each corpse before it was burned, and if any gold tooth was found to have been overlooked, the doctor was punished with twenty-five strokes of the whip. The teeth were tossed into locked boxes through a hole; then they were cleaned and melted down into fire-clay cubes weighing 0.5 kg each by means of a petrol lamp. This work was done by two dental technicians, Katz and Feldmann, who were closed into a room under special guard.

In the autumn of 1944, František Feldmann, prisoner No. 36,661, who came from Trenčianské Teplice, told us that by that date they had melted down 2000 kg of gold. Every Tuesday a senior SS officer arrived with a vehicle to supervise the melting and take away the gold.

In accordance with orders from Berlin, the Sonderkommando was at all times kept strictly separate from the other prisoners who were forbidden to have any contact with it. The squad had its own doctor, and if any of its members fell ill they were examined in their respective blocks.

In Camp BIb the Sonderkommando lived in Blocks 22 and 23, and subsequently in Block 2. In Camp BIId they were accommodated in Block 13, and subsequently in Blocks 9 and 11. Finally they went to live in the attics of the crematoria.

Our contact with members of the squad was secret and fraught with danger. If we had been caught, it would have meant, at best, loss of our camp 'freedom' and relegation to the squad – or death!

The work assigned to the squad severely affected the mental health of its members. They became apathetic and insensitive, and the expression on their faces changed radically until they all appeared brutalized. When new prisoners detailed to join the squad learnt what they would have to do, they frequently broke down and refused to go. Alternatively they would walk voluntarily into the gas chamber or past the SS guards so as to get themselves shot.

The Sonderkommando had plenty of food, cigarettes and other necessities, for the victims of the gas chambers left a rich legacy behind them. The SS made no objection to their having liquor. Altogether there were up to 800 men in the squad, the number varying according to the number of convoys expected.

⁸¹ In the Czech text: "do šamotových krychlí," "into fireclay cubes," evidently crucibles of fireclay.

SS Moll, who was the Commandant for all the crematoria, gave short shrift to any prisoners who attempted to commit suicide. He would throw them live into the furnace. In one case he held the man half in the furnace and half out; then he left the furnace door ajar and threatened the others that the same thing would happen to them if they did not do as they were told. On another occasion he poured petrol on a prisoner's clothes, lit it and whipped the man round the crematorium yard until he ended up on the high tension barbed wire.

If he was in a good mood – as was normal with him when he was drunk with the joy of murder – Moll would shoot at the lighted end of a cigarette in a prisoner's mouth. A wizard with the gun, he used even to shoot behind him with the aid of a mirror. He was quite indifferent whether his victims were Jews, Poles, Russians or even Germans. He was also responsible for carrying out the death sentence on his own people in the execution-room at the crematorium – SS men, soldiers from the front and civilian employees. Some executions were performed by poisonous injections administered in the dissecting room.

The first Sonderkommando was composed of Slovak prisoners who had an exceptionally vile task: to dig a mass grave for the rotting corpses gassed in the early primitive building, and burn them. They tried to escape from this desperate situation by taking flight, but their plans were betrayed.

On January 10th, 1943, they were told they were to leave Birkenau to go on a convoy, but when they reached Auschwitz I they were shot and burnt. Sick members of the squad, unable to go to Auschwitz on foot, together with personnel from the block, were shot at Birkenau by Rapportführer Palitsch, outside Block 2 in Camp BIb.

Shortly after Germany occupied Italy, in the summer of 1943, a group of 2000 interned American Jews was brought to Birkenau. They had been told that they were going to be sent to Switzerland to be exchanged for German prisoners, but instead they were sent to the gas chamber.

The overseer at the crematorium where the women were gassed was the infamous Rapportführer Schillinger. Among the group was a dancer named Horowitz. When Schillinger ordered her to take off her brassière, she suddenly snatched up her dress, threw it in the man's face, seized his pistol and shot him in the stomach. She also wounded SS Emerich. Pandemonium broke out, in the course of which some of the SS threw away their rifles and fled. Ordered by the SS officers, prisoners of the Sonderkommando grabbed hold of the arms and drove the women back into the gas chamber. For this deed they were rewarded with better food rations.

The dramatic end of this convoy was the climax of a long story. The group consisted of extremely wealthy Polish Jews, led by a business magnate called Mazur. All had been issued with false American passports which had been obtained through the SS by the dancer mentioned above. Millions of dollars were paid out in this attempt to save their lives. Furnished with American passports, the group did in fact leave for Hamburg. They even embarked on a ship and stayed on it for some time. But the ship never left the harbour. The SS played out the game to the bitter end, using the period of enforced waiting in the harbour to obtain documentary letters from the 'Americans' for propaganda purposes. Meanwhile they continued to blackmail the relatives of their victims. Finally, when they had tapped all the available financial sources, they allowed the travellers to get under way. But the journey did not take them to America. Instead they all, without exception, went to Auschwitz – straight to the gas chamber.

This story of but one of the many convoys is typical evidence as to the real reasons for the Nazi campaigns against the Jews: money and property. The greater the wealth of their victims, the more the Nazis were attracted – and they stopped at nothing.

In the summer of 1944, ash from the crematoria was taken to the River Vistula, about 6 km from the camp. One of the Greek Jews engaged on this work hit an SS man on the head with a spade three times, shouting: 'That's for Mother! That's for Dad! And that's for my brother!' He grabbed hold of the man's rifle, swam across the Vistula and escaped. But he was caught, brought back to the camp, and tortured to death.

In May, 1944, 150 members of the Sonderkommando were sent to Lublin. Schwarzhuber, Commandant of Birkenau, told them that they were going there for work. However, as we subsequently learnt from prisoners who came to Birkenau from Lublin, they were all shot.

The last gassing took place on the night of the 28/29th October, 1944. It was a convoy of Czech Jews from Terezín. Gassing was officially brought to an end on November 3rd, 1944, and work was started on the demolition of Crematoria I and II. All the technical equipment – water piping, furnaces, gas expellers, motors and so on – were dismantled, loaded on to trucks and sent to Gross Rosen concentration camp.

The prisoners in the Sonderkommando were sent to Mauthausen concentration camp for 'liquidation'. Among them was the dentist Feldmann. At Birkenau only seventy people were left behind for maintenance work on Crematorium IV which henceforth was only used for burning persons who died a natural death. The personnel at Crematorium IV were to have been liquidated with the demolition of the crematorium before the camp was evacuated in January, 1945. But in this the camp authorities were forestalled. While the crematorium itself was destroyed by the SS Sprengkommando, members of the Sonderkommando contrived to get mixed up with the other prisoners, and many of them escaped on the journey from Birkenau after the evacuation.

Filip Müller, prisoner No. 29,136, from Sered nad Váhem, who claims to be 'the oldest member of the Auschwitz and Birkenau Sonderkommando and the only one to have been through everything', states as follows: [...]"

From this story, which is full of fictional and absurd anecdotes, it is clear that the authors had met only one member of the “Sonderkommando” during their stay in Birkenau: František Feldmann, who actually had the number 36661.⁸²

When writing this section, Kraus and Kulka did not make use of Müller’s testimony or alleged knowledge at all, but on the contrary it was Müller who used their text to enrich his own statements. From them he took, for example, the names of the two dental technicians involved in the melting of gold teeth, Franz (= František) Feldmann and Paul Katz,⁸³ the number of 70 survivors of the “Sonderkommando” (1979b, p. 162), the idea of attempted suicide in the “gas chamber,” that of the transfer of inmates from the “Sonderkommando” to Lublin to be shot there, Schillinger’s fantastic anecdote (see Mattogno 2020b, pp. 312-316), which is inflated in Müller’s book with gooey rhetoric to cover four pages.⁸⁴

Since it is completely inconceivable that Müller had intentionally withheld accounts of his activity in the Birkenau “Sonderkommando” from his publishing friends, which is very important for their book’s narrative, and because it is just as inconceivable that Kraus and Kulka knew about Müller’s purported activity in the Birkenau “Sonderkommando,” but withheld it from their readers, the only possible conclusion must be that Kraus and Kulka knew that their Müller had not been part of this “Sonderkommando.”

This is confirmed by even-more-solid evidence. For instance, Kraus and Kulka believed that the triple-muffle furnaces of Crematoria II and III had three superimposed levels: the lower one to feed combustion air into the furnace by blowers, the middle one was the fuel-combustion chamber, and the upper one was the cremation chamber or muffle for the corpses, equipped with a refractory-clay grate. This description is incorrect and confusing. As I have illustrated in a schematic drawing (see DOCUMENT 5), the three muffles of the triple-muffle furnaces each had one cremation chamber or muffle, and underneath it, separated by the refractory-clay grate, an ash chamber which also served as an afterburner chamber. The combustion air from the blower entered the muffles through openings set inside the apex of the muffle vault. The two lateral muffles were equipped with a gas generator each, with a hearth, which was located lower than the two aforementioned chambers, but behind rather than underneath them.⁸⁵ The photograph of the Topf triple-muffle furnace at the Buchenwald Camp published by Kraus and Kulka only shows the front side with the muffle doors and the ash-extraction doors underneath, from which one could imagine a two-level structure, but certainly not three.

⁸² He appears in the list of new arrivals from the Lublin Camp on May 28, 1942 (“Zugaenge am 28. Mai 1942 ueberstellt aus dem K.L. Lublin”). APM, Photo 423.

⁸³ Müller 1979a, pp. 107, 263; omitted in the sanitized English edition, 1979b, pp. 68, 162.

⁸⁴ Müller 1979a, pp. 137-141; just over two in the English edition: 1979b, pp. 87-89.

⁸⁵ For a very detailed and accurate description of the triple-muffle furnace see Mattogno/Deana, Vol. I, pp. 265-279; Vol. III, Photos 111-205, pp. 82-131.

And even though Müller – according to his own statement – had been a stoker of the double- and the triple-muffle furnaces, but had also worked in Crematoria II and III for a while, each of which had five triple-muffle furnaces, he did not point out this mistake to his friends.

In the 1957 edition of Kraus's and Kulka's book, the authors reproduced the plans of the crematoria,⁸⁶ a photo of a model of Crematorium III,⁸⁷ and also a photograph of the furnace room of Crematorium II as taken in January 1943,⁸⁸ but they left both their confused description of the triple-muffle furnace and Müller's statement unchanged.

It is clear that he had nothing to add to what he had declared in 1946, and Kraus and Kulka, for their part, had nothing to ask him about it.

However and as mentioned earlier, if Müller indeed believed (or merely claimed) himself to be the only surviving member of the "Sonderkommando," he could have – and above all should have – provided the most-detailed and -authoritative explanations of the documents published by Kraus and Kulka, but precisely the plans of the crematoria provide the most indubitable proof of Müller's bad faith and of his lies, as I will document later.

Returning to the initial dilemma, if the tale told by Müller were true, he would have provided Kraus and Kulka with a much-more-substantial statement in 1946, which would have been centered on his "experiences" in Birkenau's "Sonderkommando"; conversely, having such an "eyewitness" on hand who was also their personal friend, the two authors would not have been satisfied with the superficial story he told them, but would have demanded from him a precise description of the structure and functioning of the Birkenau crematoria.

All this confirms again that as early as 1946 they knew that Müller had not been a member of the Birkenau "Sonderkommando".

Kulka also testified during the 71st hearing in the Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial, which took place on July 30, 1964. He made two references to Müller, the first of which is in relation to the alleged gassing of the Family Camp (Fritz Bauer ..., pp. 13543):

"The trucks drove out of the camp and drove not in the direction of the crematoria, but in that direction, and here we saw them drive. It was only afterwards that we were informed by old prisoners and by the kapos who took part there, and by one of the stokers of the crematorium named Filip Müller, that these people had actually been gassed and that the trucks were going in this direction to the crematoria or probably – I don't know, there was a street here – returned here to these crematoria."

The second time Kulka mentioned Müller – in connection with the camp's locksmith workshop where some inmates gathered in the evening – he stated merely (ibid., pp. 13566f.):

"Among them [was] the stoker from the crematorium, Filip Müller, who always gave us reports on what was going on in the crematorium."

In light of the above, these statements constituted blatant perjury.

5.3. The Trial Testimonies by Wetzler and Vrba

In this subchapter, I take up and complete what I have laid out in another study from a different perspective (Mattogno 2021, pp. 217-243).

On April 7, 1944, two Slovakian Jews, Rudolf Vrba (interned under the name Walter Rosenberg on June 30, 1942, Registration Number 44070) and Alfred Wetzler (interned on April 13, 1942 with Registration Number 29162) escaped from Birkenau. The two fugitives succeeded in making their way to Slovakia, where their statements on Auschwitz were transcribed in two reports in the second half of April (on this see Aynat). As far as is known, they appeared for the first time in a German-language document written at Geneva on May 17, 1944 with a title translating to "Factual Report on Auschwitz and Birkenau."⁸⁹ In November 1944, this report was published in Washington by the U.S. president's War Refugee Board with the title The Extermination Camps of Auschwitz (Oswiecim) and Birkenau in Upper Silesia, together with two other reports, one by Jerzy Wesołowski, alias Tabeau, who had escaped from Auschwitz on November 19, 1943, the other by Czesław Mordowicz and Arnošt Rosin, who had escaped from Birkenau on May 27, 1944. Among other things, Wetzler and Vrba provided a detailed description of Crematoria II/III, accompanied by an extremely imaginative drawing (see DOCUMENT 6) that stands in total contrast to the real plan (see DOCUMENT 7).

I summarize the fundamental errors it presents:

1. the furnace room had five furnaces instead of nine;
2. each furnace had three muffles instead of four; therefore, the total number of muffles was 15 rather than 36;
3. the furnaces were arranged in a straight line along the longitudinal axis of the furnace room and not grouped in a semi-circle around the chimney;
4. the room later referred to as the victims' undressing room (Morgue #2) was located in the basement instead of the ground floor;

⁸⁹ "Tatsachenbericht über Auschwitz und Birkenau", FDRL, WRB, Box no. 61. The report was disseminated by the Weltzentrale des Hechalutz at Geneva.

5. the room referred to as the gas chamber (Morgue #1) was not located on the ground floor, a little bit lower than the undressing room, but in the basement and on the same level as Morgue #2;
6. the room referred to as the gas chamber was linked to the furnace room by a freight elevator rather than by rails.

In my above-mentioned study, I reconstructed the flow of information among the various resistance organizations in Auschwitz, and I documented that they were in constant contact with the Birkenau “Sonderkommando,” which was the alleged source for much of the data contained in Wetzler’s and Vrba’s report. And this is where Müller comes into play.

Rudolf Vrba mentioned Müller in an article published in the early 1960s for the first time (Vrba 1961):

“Philip Miller [sic], a Slovak friend who worked in the crematorium, told me that the Nazis would have so many victims on their hands that they would have to resort again to their old idea of throwing Jews – dead and alive – into mass, blazing graves.”

A few years later, in the well-known book he wrote in collaboration with Allan Bestic, Vrba provided some other details: in Birkenau, in 1944, he got in touch with Müller, “who became one of [his] most precious sources of information” (Vrba/Bestic, p. 175) and provided further information to Vrba while discussing the situation in the camp with him in early 1944 (ibid., p. 197).

Not wanting to miss out on this opportunity of increased notoriety, Müller embroidered Vrba’s cue in his 1979 book:

“While they were making their way to the Family Camp, I went to Block 9 where Alfred Wetzler, another friend of mine, was block clerk. He and I had been at school together.”

They had known each other since childhood, having attended high school together in Trnava (Müller 1979b, p. 103). Wetzler “had decided to flee with Walter Rosenberg, who later called himself Rudolf Vrba” (1979a, p. 163). In the published English translation, Vrba’s name had been excised (1979b, p. 103):

“At that time he and another prisoner [Rudolf Vrba] had already made up their minds to escape and were busy with their preparations.”

On April 7, the two inmates fled (ibid., p. 120), and Müller describes with great emphasis his precious contribution (ibid., pp. 193-195):

“I had handed to Alfred a plan of the crematoria and gas chambers as well as a list of names of the SS men who were on duty there. In addition I had given to both of them notes I had been making for some time of almost all transports gassed in crematoria 4 and 5. I had described to them in full detail the process of extermination so that they would be able to report to the outside world exactly how the victims had their last pitiful belongings taken away from them; how they were tricked into entering the gas chambers; how after the gassings their teeth were wrenched out and the women's hair cut off; how the dead were searched for hidden valuables; how their spectacles, artificial limbs and dentures were collected; and everything else that took place. In the course of many long talks I had described to them both the tragedy which was constantly being enacted behind the crematorium walls.

The most important piece of evidence which I gave them to take on their journey was one of those labels which were stuck on the tins containing Zyklon B poison gas. [...]

Two days before his escape I handed the label to Alfred Wetzler to enable him to produce it as another piece of evidence of the systematic extermination of Jews.” (My emphases)

Müller had therefore entrusted Wetzler with a “plan of the crematoria and gas chambers” and had explained exactly to him and to Vrba in “many long talks” the killing procedure: how is it possible then that Wetzler and Vrba presented a completely false and fanciful description of Crematorium II/III a short while later?

Here we must consider that Müller claims that in 1943 he had worked for five to six weeks in Crematorium II (according to one of his contradictory statements). Therefore, he must have known this place perfectly and certainly could not have given the two fugitives a plan corresponding to the one that appears in the Wetzler-Vrba report, that is, a grossly inaccurate plan. Furthermore, since he had been assigned to Crematorium V since the summer of 1943, it is not clear why he did not also give Wetzler a plan of Crematorium IV/V, but this is a secondary problem here. The primary one is: why did Wetzler and Vrba publish a fake map of the crematorium despite having received an accurate one?

In his book, Müller preferred to ignore this embarrassing question. In fact, he exacerbated it: not only did he avoid any reference to the Wetzler-Vrba report and its false plan/description of Crematorium II/III, but he presented quite precise plans of Crematorium II/III (see DOCUMENT 8) and of Crematorium IV/V (see DOCUMENT 9) which, however, he had taken from the book by Kraus and Kulka (see DOCUMENTS 10f.).

Since Müller says nothing about the provenance of these plans, the reader is led to believe that they were his work and that at least one of the two was the one he allegedly delivered to Wetzler in 1944.

In addition to the plan, he claimed that he had also entrusted Wetzler with the label of a can of Zyklon B, but this is also false. In fact, in his report written together with Vrba, Wetzler wrote:⁹⁰

⁹⁰ Ibid., pp. 16f.; “The Extermination Camps of Auschwitz (Oswiecim) and Birkenau in Upper Silesia.” p. 13.

“Die Dosen tragen die Aufschrift: ‘Cyklon’ zur ‘Schädlingsbekämpfung’ und werden in einer Hamburger Fabrik erzeugt. Es ist anzunehmen, dass es sich um ein Cyanpräparat handelt, welches sich bei einer gewissen Temperatur vergast.”

“[...] tin cans labelled ‘CYKLON’ ‘For use against vermin’ [zur ‘Schädlingsbekämpfung’] which are manufactured [erzeugt] by a Hamburg concern. It is presumed that this is a ‘CYANIDE’ mixture of some sort [ein Cyanpräparat] which turns into gas at a certain temperature.”

However, on the label of the cans, the word “Schädlingsbekämpfung” only appeared in the distributor’s name: “Tesch u. Stabenow. Internationale Gesellschaft für Schädlingsbekämpfung m.b.H.” whereas the word “Cyanpräparat,” was in fact printed on the labels “Giftgas! Cyanpräparat!” (“Poison Gas! Cyanide Preparation!”)

It is therefore clear that Wetzler and Vrba, when they wrote or dictated their report, did not have a label of a Zyklon-B can at their disposal.

Müller also claimed to have revealed the secrets of Auschwitz to Mordowicz and Rosin (Müller 1979b, p. 131):

“Two more Jewish prisoners, Czeslaw Mordowicz and Arnost Rosin, managed to escape towards the end of May. Once again I supplied them with details including those of the extermination of Hungarian Jews which was then in full swing. Perhaps they would succeed in rousing world opinion.”

But as I have pointed out elsewhere (Mattoigno 2021, pp. 329-335), their report is a dull chronicle of alleged events with no information on the claimed extermination techniques, and does not contain any of the “details” that Müller claims to have revealed to them.

In the just-cited study, I have already highlighted the contradictions, implausibilities and absurdities with respect to the 1944 Wetzler-Vrba Report and the further false claims contained in the various subsequent statements by Alfred Wetzler and Rudolf Vrba made after 1945. Here it is also necessary to examine their depositions at the Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial, since Filip Müller was also called as a witness during this trial. In the perspective of this study, three main issues are important:

1. What was the origin of the information contained in the Wetzler-Vrba Report?
2. Why is this information false?
3. What was the relationship between these two inmates and Filip Müller during their stay at the camp?

Wetzler testified during the 108th hearing on November 5, 1964. He mentioned Filip Müller only once and in an insignificant context compared to the alleged origin of the information contained in the 1944 report (Fritz Bauer..., p. 23746):

“I heard from the prisoners who worked there [in Crematorium I] that he [SS Oberscharführer Josef Klehr] also [+ committed] manipulations at the gas-sings. I know that from the inmate who came to Auschwitz with me and who was employed in the ‘Sonderkommando’, if you can say that, Filip Müller. He was in the transport with which I came to Auschwitz in 1942, and survived the crematorium. I can't say anything specifically, so we just deduced it that way.”

During the hearing, however, the Wetzler-Vrba Report was discussed at length (Fritz Bauer..., 23813-23826):

“Assistant Prosecutor Raabe: To Slovakia. Did you, together with Mr. Vrba, prepare a report on Auschwitz after you escaped?”

Witness Alfred Wetzler: I have it with me. I have it with me. [...]

Assistant Prosecutor Raabe [interrupts]: I have to say a word about it, excuse me, may I finish speaking, please. I have to say a word about this: this report is a historical document of extraordinary importance. This is probably the first report that came out of Auschwitz by an inmate. And it seems to me that this report also went to Hungary at the time and contributed to the fact that several hundred thousand Jews probably did not come to Auschwitz. This report has been submitted to the Pope and has been presented to various European governments. [...]

Assistant Prosecutor Raabe: I just briefly indicated the significance of this report. And now I would first like to put the question to the witness: Is this the original of this report, Witness?

Presiding Judge: Is this the original report or is it a reprint?

Witness Alfred Wetzler: This is a photocopy from Washington. [...]

Presiding Judge: Yes, and where is the original report? [...]

Witness Alfred Wetzler: Stayed with President Truman at the time, in Washington.

Presiding Judge: Yes.

Witness Alfred Wetzler: And the first original is in Hungary, it was written twice. The first time as a warning for the Hungarian Jews, on April 27, 44, hence three days after crossing the border. And that is already the widely spread document. Two more refugees came after us from Auschwitz on May 27, 44.

Presiding Judge: Was that written before the end of the war?

Witness Alfred Wetzler: Yes, on April 27, 44.

Presiding Judge: I also mean this book that you have here. You [spoke of] two versions: one that you wrote first and the other that was written later.

Witness Alfred Wetzler: It was all still during the war. [...] One was written on April 27, 44, and the papal nuncio [received] the second message on July 7, 44.

Prosecutor Kaul: This report – if I may support what my colleague is saying – was published in America during the war and some of it became known. It was the first-ever news in the cultivated world about these events in Auschwitz, and in this respect, it has a special meaning, especially with regard to the authenticity of the information in it – I know it from America, I was interned there at that time.

Presiding Judge: Yes. So, what do you want now, Counsel Raabe? That he should give us this report?

Assistant Prosecutor Raabe: That this report will be handed over, if you are able to do so and can do without this copy. And I reserve the right to request a read-out in due course.

Presiding Judge: Well, give me the book, maybe, yes, so that we can Witness Alfred Wetzler [interrupts]: But it's in English.

Presiding Judge: In English? Well, give it to me. Yes, but who wrote it then? Do you understand so much English that you can write a book in English?

Witness Alfred Wetzler: I wrote it in German.

Presiding Judge: In German?

Witness Alfred Wetzler: Yes, 44, because I met a Swiss journalist. And he asked me not to write it in Slovak. So, with my weak German I [wrote] it 44, but these are not novels, these are factographies that I wrote in 44, and that I wrote already back then about the selections of Bedzin and Sosnowice and of the 'Sonderkommando' that [was] liquidated in 42. And I today still can't say it any differently than what it was then. And that was a document of which historiography still in 44 – when it was then also in the Nuremberg trial...

Assistant Prosecutor Raabe: Mr. Chairman, I may say another word about that. According to my information, this report went through a Rabbi Weissmandel from Pressburg, was smuggled to Budapest during the Hungary Action, and was translated by Hungarian Jews in Budapest in no time at all and secretly sent to all the governments of the free world so that these governments could appeal to the Horthy government, among others, so that the German deportations are stopped. And as far as I know a German translation of this report – perhaps a reverse translation or the original, I cannot say that now – this report contains precise details about the Auschwitz Camp and is in the Judge Perseke [interrupts]: Where then is the original?

Presiding Judge: Yes, so, Counsel Raabe, what I would like to say first: This witness wrote a book in German.

Assistant Prosecutor Raabe: Yes.

Presiding Judge: What I have here is a book in English. It certainly could not have come from him.

Assistant Prosecutor Raabe: I said

Presiding Judge [interrupts]: It is possible that it is a translation of his book.

Assistant Prosecutor Raabe: Yes.

Presiding Judge: It is possible. Whether it is a translation, whether the translation is correct and complete, that I do not know.

Judge Hotz: The witness doesn't know either.

Presiding judge: Not even the witness knows that. [...]

Associate Judge Hummerich: Did this Rosenberg, or as he was correctly called, Vrba, did he participate in the book, or did you do it all by yourself?

Witness Alfred Wetzler: He took part because he came from Lublin in June 42. And he wrote the whole Lublin anabasis. He wrote the anabasis because he was working on the ramp. [...]

Assistant Prosecutor Raabe: Witness, do you still have a German copy of your report from that time, perhaps not here?

Witness Alfred Wetzler: I repeat, on April 27th I did not write a book in German, but a 60-page protocol. It went to Switzerland, to Turkey. The papal nuncio, Doctor Giuseppe Burzio, who is still alive today, transferred it himself. I don't know what his rank is today, he lives in the Vatican, Doctor Giuseppe Burzio. Ako sa volá? [What's his name?] So, this message went to Hungary as a warning about the preparations for the transports.

Presiding Judge: Yes, and where is the book now? Or this writing of 60 pages? Where did it go?

Witness Alfred Wetzler: They have used it; it is certainly in Hungarian archives. The Swiss 'Basler Nachrichten' and the 'Neue Zürcher Zeitung' also wrote about this report.

Presiding Judge: Yes, the newspapers reported. I want to know where your original got to. Do you know that?

Witness Alfred Wetzler: Well, as I said, we handed it over to the Hungarian Jews, then it was handed over to the papal nuncio, and they carried it around the world. I was in an illegal status; I couldn't have kept it to myself.

Presiding Judge: Witness, you don't understand what I want to know. I want to know if you can tell me where those original 60 pages that you wrote went to. Where they are now, where they are today! Don't you know?

Witness Alfred Wetzler: Historians have to assess that. They will find it, the historians. They quote from Presiding Judge [interrupts]: You mean in an archive somewhere?

Witness Alfred Wetzler: Yes, they quote it, where it is used in which literature.

Assistant Prosecutor Raabe: Mr. Chairman, might I recommend?

Presiding Judge: Yes.

Assistant Prosecutor Raabe: I will be happy to do my best, and I believe I know the way to get a certified photocopy or the original.

Presiding Judge: There you go.

Assistant Prosecutor Raabe: But it might make things easier – if the path I have in mind is not feasible – that you already keep this copy in the court files, and that one might contact the publisher and get it from there. I think that would be a viable option. I will gladly try to do that.

Public Prosecutor Kügler: May I [ask] a question in connection with this? Do you understand the English language? [...]

Witness Alfred Wetzler: No.

Public Prosecutor Kügler: No. The witness Vrba, who is therefore the co-author of this report, stated during the preliminary investigation – he lives in England, he speaks perfect English – that this translation corresponds to the original. He will be able to be asked about it here if the original cannot be obtained. I therefore ask to keep the book with the court so that it can be presented to the witness Vrba.

Witness Alfred Wetzler: I have one more sentence to say: that I myself published my book in the year 45 and also 46. I have it here in my hotel. I can submit it. This is the Slovak translation of the factography that I handed over in the year 44. The book is called 'The Hell of Four Million Corpses'. I published versions in 44 and 46 in Slovakia in Bratislava.

Presiding Judge [interrupting]: Yes, do you want to leave these copies for us?

Witness Alfred Wetzler: I can leave both of them.

Presiding Judge: You can both leave?

Witness Alfred Wetzler: Yes."

Vrba testified during the 117th hearing, on November 30, 1964. Here too I report first of all the exchange on the 1944 report (ibid., pp. 26366-26369):

"Presiding Judge: Do you still have a transcript of this report?

Witness Rudolf Vrba: The transcript of this report is here. [Pause] I only have the copy in English translation, of course. That was a complete report on everything I saw in Auschwitz. And after my escape from Auschwitz, I wanted to warn the world where possible about what was going on. So, first and foremost I had in mind to prevent the voluntary evacuation of the Hungarians of Jewish descent, who had no idea that the crematoria are already prepared for them. In order to make clear what was in store for them, it was of course necessary to compile complete statistics on Auschwitz. And then we compiled this together with Wetzler. So, the statistics were made that way. The Things were pretty incredible back then, and we got separated and subjected to interrogation...

Presiding Judge: Subjected.

Witness Rudolf Vrba: Subjected, where we said the same thing, independent of one another. These facts were then summarized [at the end of the] minutes. The protocol is here and consists of a statistic of the victims in Auschwitz, which according to our calculations amounted to 1,750,000 people in April 1944. I got this report from the White House library, a copy of it, just a year ago. The copy is in my hands here, and I can tell it is the original text, in English translation. Along with a letter, also written by the American institutions, that states that the information contained in this report is credible, despite all of the incredible things it contained at the time.^[91] I forwarded the report along with Wetzler to the papal nuncio, and it was then forwarded to the western governments.

Presiding Judge: And how did you manage to compile these statistics?

Witness Rudolf Vrba: Yes. I contemplated the idea of an escape from the first moment, and especially when I saw the ramp. Well, of course I had to rely on my memory. But I think I have a good memory. And despite the fact that it seems so unbelievable to memorize a series of numbers, I used mnemonic techniques. Let's say I can't name 300 streets in Frankfurt today. But anyone who lives in Frankfurt and starts to think about how one street goes into another, can name 300 streets. For me, every transport was not about the numbers, but about the people who were inside. From each transport there were one, two, five, or ten survivors, or almost from every transport. I found my friends in almost every transport. I could remember the transport according to the people who came in this or that transport. And just as I can remember my friends' phone numbers without looking in the book today, I was able to remember the transports back then. Because every transport – however gray it may look to have seen 300 or 250 transports – with every transport, something happened. It looked in a certain way. And I could remember that, and I worked on that thing, I checked the thing. I've talked to other people. I talked to people from the 'Sonderkommando' and with people from the registration department, and constantly corrected the numbers in order to get to the right number. And according to my calculations, in April 1944, one and three quarters of a million people had been killed, including women and children, who at that time represented at least 60 to 70 percent of the victims.

⁹¹ That is, the information was credible despite its incredibility.

Presiding Judge: How many were there by April?

Witness Rudolf Vrba: 1,750,000."

"Prosecutor Vogel: You mentioned a number of victims earlier, 1,750,000 at the time of your flight. Do the statistics on which this information is based only cover your own observations during your stay? Or does that also include the number of people who died there before your own arrival at Auschwitz?

Witness Rudolf Vrba: Before I came to Auschwitz, the number of victims was rather small, i.e., relatively small. You understand me, I don't mean to say that 100,000 victims is a small number. But [compared to] what has come [afterwards], the 100,000 was just the humble beginning. And I knew about this number from conversations with the inmates who were there. But that number before my arrival wouldn't fundamentally change my statistics.

Public Prosecutor Vogel: So, it is not included in this number?

Witness Rudolf Vrba: Yes, it is taken into account.

Public Prosecutor Vogel: Has it been taken into account?

Witness Rudolf Vrba: Is taken into account." (ibid., pp. 26381f.)

Vrba never mentioned Filip Müller even once during his testimony in Frankfurt. He only made a vague reference to "people from the 'Sonderkommando,'" but only in relation to the statistics of the alleged victims.

The Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial was a unique and unrepeatable opportunity to shed full light upon the origin of the information in the Wetzler-Vrba Report, given that all the characters of this affair were gathered there, but the court did not even raise the question, and no witness made the slightest remark about it.

The debate on the Wetzler-Vrba Report immediately took a misleading direction, because it focused on the authenticity and location of the original, completely neglecting the veracity of its contents, which was assumed a priori on the ridiculous basis of an endorsement letter by utterly undefined “American institutions”.

Wetzler dwelt on the origin of the report. He himself claims to have written a first version of 60 pages in German while in Slovakia, on April 27, 1944, then a second version, also in German, although he had rather confused ideas about it; he had written it for a Swiss journalist, no one knows where, and it was sent to the apostolic nuncio in Pressburg (Bratislava) on July 7, 1944.

However, these statements are false. It is now known that around April 22-23, 1944, Wetzler and Vrba met in the Slovakian town of Žilina with Engineer Oskar Karmil-Krasnansky, to whom they told their story. Karmil-Krasnansky then wrote a 40-page protocol in German which was typed a few days later in Bratislava by Mrs. Ida (Tova) Steiner. This text was then copied (a 29-page copy was sent to the Vatican by Monsignor Giuseppe Burzio on May 22, 1944) and translated in whole or in part into Hungarian, English and Polish (Mattogno 2021, pp. 221f.).

A second version of the report, however, was not written by Wetzler. His claim to have drafted “a protocol of over 60 pages” was another foolish lie, because this was roughly the number (effectively 59) of the pages of the “War Refugee Board Report,” which also includes the reports by Czesław Mordowicz and Arnošt Rosin, and that of the “Polish major” (Jerzy Wesołowski/Tabeau). In that report, the text of the Wetzler-Vrba Report covers only 40 pages, including drawings.⁹²

Vrba, on the other hand, drew the court’s attention especially to the statistics of the alleged victims. In this regard, I have already noted that the figure of 1,750,000 that appears in the report’s statistical list has no relation to the transports mentioned in the report’s text. If we sum up the gassing victims mentioned in the text, the total amounts to about 992,700 victims. But if we compare those with the victims claimed by Danuta Czech, about 826,000 are completely invented (Mattogno 2021, pp. 223f.). This is another blatant lie, and, it can be added, moreover a silly one, as Vrba claimed “to have seen 300 or 250 transports” which, in the context of the declaration, are clearly all transports he has seen. But in this case, if considering that 70% of all deportees were allegedly killed on arrival, and the rest put to work, then 1,750,000 gassing victims correspond to 2,500,000 deportees. At 300 transports, this would amount to $(2,500,000 \div 300 =)$ over 8,300 people per train! Conversely, assuming an average load of 2,000 people per train, there would have been $(2,500,000 \div 2,000 =)$ 1,250 transports!

Similarly invented is the figure of 100,000 murdered prior to Vrba’s arrival at Auschwitz in April 1942. According to the Auschwitz Chronicle, however, no more than 10,000 prisoners were allegedly killed in this period, mostly Jews from the Upper Silesian ghettos, although their deportation to Auschwitz is not attested to by any document (Mattogno 2016d, p. 35).

As an exonerating circumstance for the Frankfurt judges, it can be said that at their time the general climate was that of the legend of the four-million Auschwitz death toll, and orthodox holocaust historians were to some degree bedeviled by the only slightly less absurd figures put into Rudolf Höss's mouth by the British (see Mattogno 2020b).

On the other hand, the fact that the court did not show the slightest initiative to verify the veracity of the Wetzler-Vrba Report is not in the least excusable, a verification that it could have easily carried out, given that it was in contact with the Auschwitz Museum, and that Danuta Czech was also summoned as a witness.

From what I have stated above, it is indubitable that the description of the crematoria and gas chambers that appears in the Wetzler-Vrba Report did not come and could not have come from members of any actual "Sonderkommando," least of all from Müller, but was entirely a part of the legends invented and spread by the camp's resistance movements.

In this regard, a further, important confirmation is to hand. It is a sheet with three drawings of Crematorium II showing, from top to bottom, the basement, the west facade and the ground floor (see DOCUMENT 12). Comparison with the surviving plans of the Birkenau crematoria shows that the drawings in question were copied from the series of plans of Crematorium II, bearing the number 2197 and published by Jean-Claude Pressac, which were drawn by the Central Construction Office of Auschwitz on March 19, 1943 to be attached to the handover process (Übergabeverhandlung) of the plant from the Central Construction Office to the camp administration. DOCUMENT 13 presents the west facade and the ground floor (Erdgeschoss; Pressac 1989, p. 306), DOCUMENT 14 also the basement part (Kellergeschoss; ibid., p. 312), which appears in a specific drawing whose reproduction unfortunately is of poor quality (ibid., p. 308). However, J.-C. Pressac managed to read the original document and to transcribe the related captions (ibid., p. 309).

From the above it appears that the three drawings reproduced in the Appendix as DOCUMENT 12 were compiled by an inmate who worked at the Baubüro, the design department of the Central Construction Office. In February 1943, 96 inmates were employed there, including two Jews: Mordcha Gothein (Registration Number 64034) and Ernst Kohn (Registration Number 71134). These inmates, among other things, were the actual draftsmen of some plans of the crematoria, such as No. 1300 of June 18, 1942 of Crematorium II (Inmate No. 17133), No. 2136 of February 22, 1943 of Crematorium III (Inmate No. 538, Leo Sawka), Plan No. 2036 of January 11, 1943 of Crematorium IV/V (Inmate No. 127, Josef Sikora) and Plan No. 1241 of Crematorium I dated April 10, 1942 (Inmate No. 20033, Stefan Swiszcowski).

Kohn drew precisely the series of plans No. 2197 from March 19, 1943 mentioned earlier. It was likely that either he or a colleague of his drew the drawings in question. The date is unknown. In the book where they are reproduced, the sheet with these drawings is placed as an appendix to a report, presented as “The Relief Committee for Concentration-Camp Inmates informed on May 25, 1944 about the Murder of the Jews from Hungary” (Rudorff, Doc. 115, pp. 398-402).

This report, which I have already dealt with in a previous study (Mattogno 2021, pp. 187-191), is the “Extraordinary Appendix to the Periodic Report for the Period between May 5 and 25, 1944,” titled “Oswiecim. ‘Action Hees’” (sic).

Leaving aside the many absurdities it contains (the arrival of eight trains during the day and five at night with 48-50 railway cars and 100 deportees per car, amounting to an average of 4,900 people per train and 63,700 per day; the presence on the Birkenau railway ramp of a heap of suitcases arranged neatly of about 18,000 cubic meters; the impending deportation of 1,200,000 Hungarian Jews to Auschwitz), the description of the alleged extermination is in clear contrast with both the drawings in question, and with that of the Wetzler-Vrba Report:⁹³

“The [people] unloaded [off a] transports which the two gasworks [obie gazownie] are unable to dispose of camp out in a little wood nearby, or in ditches, guarded by ‘Posten’ [Postów, sentries] with submachine guns. The waiting time for death can be up to two days, because there are bottlenecks. Between the railroad ramp and the gaswork [gazownia] along the road, day and night [there is] an uninterrupted procession of persons walking towards the gassing installation [ku gazowni] as it gradually empties of already ‘processed’ bodies [...].

An orderly mountain of suitcases 300 meters long and 20 meters high up to one story is piled up at the ramp that the trucks, [even if] constantly going [to load them], are unable to take to the warehouses. [...]

Before entering the gas chamber [do komory gazowej], everybody hands over the money and valuables they have with them to the... depositary [depozytu]. They must then undress completely, handing over [oddają] all their clothes, which are then searched to find any valuables sewn inside the linings. They then enter the ‘bath,’ that is, the gas chamber, in groups of 1,000 persons. They are no longer given hand towels and soap, as before – there isn’t enough time.

The two gas chambers [obie komory gazowe] work without letup, but are unable to dispose of the rest [of the deportees]. Between the gassing of one group [and another], the only down time is that required for ventilation. On the other side [of the gas chamber], where it is certainly not visible to those entering the chamber, there are huge piles of bodies. There is not enough time to burn them. [...]”

Summarizing and explaining, according to the report there were four crematoria, but the gassings were carried out in two “gassing installations,” whose locations are never given, hence it is unknown where they were. Obviously, these could not have been the two Birkenau “bunkers,” because at that time only “Bunker 2” (or 2/5 or 2/V) was presumably in operation, “Bunker 1” having been demolished in March-April 1943. The choice of the term “gasworks” (“gazownia”) is rather revealing, since at that time the term indicated an industrial facility for the production of illumination and combustible gas (city gas), while the resistance members intended to refer to a presumed “gassing installation.” The crematoria, which were evidently in no way linked to the “gasworks,” were only used for corpse cremation and were backed up in this task by a fantastical “brick kiln” (“cegielnia”) – of which orthodox historiography reports nothing whatsoever – and by “pyres” (“stosy”). There were two gas chambers, so each “gazownia” had one. The setting of the gassings, although indeterminate, undoubtedly excludes the crematoria, because the corpses were piled up on the other side of the gas chamber. That is, however, where the victims had their hair shorn off, teeth containing precious metals extracted, and the bodies inspected.

The sheet containing the drawings (DOCUMENT 12) bears the heading “Plan of the crematorium and gas chamber” (“Plan krematorium i komory gazowej”), which is typed, while all the captions on the drawings are handwritten. The heading is clearly a later addition, which moreover contrasts with the captions (See the captions in DOCUMENT 12).

In particular, in the drawing of the basement showing the two basement morgues are both called “piwnica trupów,” hence precisely “corpse basement,” instead of “komora gazowa” (chamber gas) and “rozbieralnia” (undressing room), and in the drawing of Morgue #1, the four claimed introduction openings for Zyklon B are also missing.

Although we don’t know when these drawings were made, it is certain that at the time the drafter knew nothing of any mass extermination in Crematorium II, and those who had the drawings in their hands later did not know more than the drafter either, because they limited themselves to adding the heading mentioned, without giving any further explanation.

It is known that the Auschwitz resistance movement had affiliates in all the offices and in all the labor units of the camp, including those working in the crematoria. It could therefore have received information and plans/drawings both from the “Sonderkommando” members and from the inmate employees of the design office of the Central Construction Office. Despite this availability of true first-hand information, the resistance movement – by disseminating the Wetzler-Vrba Report and also the one summarized above covering the period of May 5-25, 1944 – invented and spread stories of the most-vulgar black propaganda, with an utterly false description of Crematoria II/III which was in total conflict with the drawings here analyzed.

Filip Müller's various claims that he gave Wetzler "a plan of the crematoria and gas chambers" and a detailed oral description of the "extermination procedure" are therefore shameless lies.

6. The Cremation Furnaces at Birkenau

6.1. Müller's Task

As seen earlier, Müller was a stoker (Heizer, furnace operator) at the Main Camp's crematorium, but he claims to have clumsily set them on fire, which is a nonsensical tale. He then informs us (Müller 1979b, p. 50):

"During the first few months of 1943 it served simultaneously as a training centre for a new team of stokers. They were to be employed in the crematoria of Birkenau which were then being built. About twenty Jewish and three Polish prisoners were instructed in the duties of a crematorium worker by Kapo Mietek."

However, during the Lanzmann interview, he said the opposite (2010, p. 108):

"La: You, for example, you were a fireman?"

Mü: Fireman.

La: How long was the training for such work?"

Mü: Yes, well, there was, there was no training. To do this activity or any activity in the crematorium, especially in the extermination sites, you needed neither a specialization nor anything close to it."

The story of the training course at the Main Camp's crematorium has already been told by Tauber, who claims to have stayed there from the beginning of February to March 4, 1943:⁹⁴

"Our group, which totaled 22 Jews from Block XI and 4 Poles assigned to our group, was called 'Kommando Krematorium II.' We did not understand this denomination at the time, but then we were persuaded that we had been sent to Crematorium I for a month's practice to prepare for work in Crematorium II."

Hence, Müller and Tauber found themselves together for a month at the Main Camp's crematorium, but they ignored each other in their respective statements.

It is not clear why a similar training course was not also undertaken for the 8-muffle furnace of Crematoriums IV and V, which had a rather different structure, operation and management than that of the double- and triple-muffle furnace of Crematorium I and II/III, respectively.

⁹⁴ Höss Trial, Vol. 11, pp. 126f.

However, if we take Müller's word for it, it can be assumed that Müller at least observed the furnaces of Crematorium II and became a stoker in Crematorium V (according to his deposition during the 97th hearing of the Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial and his interview with Lanzmann, 2010, p. 50). He had thus become an expert in cremation furnaces and cremation at Birkenau. All that remains is to examine his pertinent statements.

6.2. Crematorium II

When he testified during the Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial, Müller said practically nothing about the Birkenau cremation furnaces, and it is not even known what he knew about them back then. Nyiszli reported that Crematorium II/III had 15 separate furnaces, each in a single structure (Mattogno 2020a, pp. 38, 195f.). In his book, Müller wrote that there were "Five ovens, each with three combustion chambers" in Crematorium II, but a few lines later, Nyiszli's suggestive powers took over Müller's imagination once more (Müller 1979b, p. 59):

"Its fifteen huge ovens, working non-stop, could cremate more than 3,000 corpses daily."

The question of the furnaces' cremation capacity caused Müller quite some chagrin. Nyiszli, in his boundless megalomania, had written the following about that (Mattogno 2020a, p. 43; emphases added):

"The bodies of the dead are reduced to ashes in 20 minutes. The crematorium works with 15 furnaces. This means the cremation of 5,000 people a day. Four crematoria are in operation at the same capacity. Altogether 20,000 people pass each day through the gas chambers and from there into the cremation furnaces. The souls of twenty-thousand innocent people fly off through the gigantic chimneys."

Incredibly, he believed that the four Birkenau crematoria each possessed 15 individual furnaces, in total 60! In the German translation "Auschwitz. Tagebuch eines Lagerarztes", the translator or editor did not dare to repeat all this nonsense, and the above passage was modified (meaning falsified) as follows (Nyiszli 1961, No. 4, p. 29; emphases added):

"There are fifteen furnaces in a crematorium. This means that several thousand people can be burned every day. The crematoria often operated in day-and-night shifts. A total of 10,000 people can be transported from the gas chambers to the cremation furnaces every day."

From Nyiszli's thermotechnically absurd data – the cremation of three corpses at once in one muffle within 20 minutes, plagiarized by Müller in reference to the Main Camp crematorium⁹⁵ – results a theoretical capacity of Crematorium II/III of 3,240 corpses within 24 hours. The capacity of 3,000 corpses Müller claimed was perhaps derived from a grossly approximate calculation, but we also have to consider the related statements by Jankowski, another primary source for Müller’s plagiarism:⁹⁶

“Crematoria II and III had 15 furnaces [muffles] each with a daily capacity of 5,000, and Crematoria IV and V had 8 furnaces [muffles] each, which cremated a total of about 3,000 corpses every day. Altogether in these four furnaces [i.e. crematoria] about 8,000 corpses could be cremated a day.”

Having opted for the cremation capacity given in the aforementioned false translation of Nyiszli’s claims – 10,000 corpses per day – Müller was forced to increase Jankowski’s data proportionally:

- Crematorium II/III: from 2,500 to 3,000; together from 5,000 to 6,000
- Crematorium IV/V: from 1,500 to 2,000; together from 3,000 to 4,000.

However, in 1946 he had asserted that Crematorium IV (=V) could burn “only about 1500 people every twenty-four hours” (Kraus-Kulka Statement).

What did the stoker Müller know about the cremation furnaces? Virtually nothing. About the triple-muffle furnaces, he wrote (Müller 1979b, p. 59):

“Outwardly the fifteen arched openings did not significantly differ from those at the Auschwitz crematorium. The one important innovation consisted of two rollers, each with a diameter of 15 centimetres,^[97] fixed to the edge of each oven. This made it easier for the metal platform to be pushed inside the oven.”

This is the pair of guide wheels (Laufrollen) located in front of the muffles, which ran on a folding frame that was welded to the anchor bars of the furnaces with a holding iron bar (Befestigungs-Eisen). It is clearly visible in the photograph of the Buchenwald crematorium published by Kraus-Kulka (see DOCUMENT 15). As noted earlier, this device was nothing new at all, as it was also installed on the double-muffle furnaces of the Main Camp’s crematorium. Without these wheels, it would have been impossible to introduce the corpse-introduction device into the muffle without seriously damaging the refractory-clay grate.

The most-striking difference between the two furnace models, in addition to the obvious fact that the triple-muffle furnace model had one more muffle, was the gas generator: as explained earlier, the double-muffle furnaces had two gas generators in a single-wall structure as wide as the furnace itself, whereas the triple-muffle furnaces were equipped with two single gas genera-

⁹⁵ Although the duration of 20 minutes was a very-widespread tale, also adopted by Kraus and Kulka, as seen earlier.

⁹⁷ According to Topf’s shipping notice (Versandanzeige) to the Zentralbauleitung dated September 8, 1942 relating to an 8-muffle cremation furnace, the guide wheels had a diameter of 6 centimeters (60 mm). RGVA, 502-1-313, pp. 143f.

tors installed behind the two lateral muffles, while the furnace masonry behind the central muffle was flat.⁹⁸

In a generic context (without reference to any gassing) Müller writes (1979b, p. 82):

“Every oven had been fired since morning. We were ordered to keep the fires going which meant feeding them with two wheelbarrowfuls of coke every half hour.”

The triple-muffle furnace had two gas generators, each with a grate capacity of 35 kg of coke per hour,⁹⁹ as I will explain below.

The context makes it clear that Müller meant two wheelbarrows for each gas generator, since two wheelbarrows in ten gas generators making little sense. A wheelbarrow of coke corresponded to about 60 kg,¹⁰⁰ so that each gas generator would have been overloaded with 240 kg of coke per hour, hence almost seven times more coke than it could consume in an hour.

Müller says nothing about the structure and functioning of the triple-muffle furnaces, and it is clear that he had no knowledge about them. He evidently was unaware of the most-elementary facts, such as this type of furnace having precisely two gas generators placed behind the two lateral muffles, three interconnected muffles, a single blower that simultaneously fed cold air into all three muffles, and a single smoke damper. This self-proclaimed stoker did not even know the proper technical terms relating to cremation furnaces, that is, the names of the tools he claims to have worked with for many months on end.

In his book, Müller dropped the absurd story of the flame-spewing chimneys, which was so dear to many witnesses not just of the immediate post-war era. Instead, they merely emitted smoke and fumes (Müller 1979b, pp. 65, 107), although there is one reference to flames reaching the open air through the chimneys (ibid., p. 95):

“The raging flames rushed into the open air through two underground conduits which connected the ovens with the massive chimneys.”

To Lanzmann’s question whether the chimney of Crematorium II smoked, Müller replied:

“No, not always. Even when the chimney, that is, when the crematorium was in use, the smoke was not always so strong, that people would guess what was going on.” (Lanzmann 2010, p. 39)

Shortly after, however, he contradicted himself in a blatant way, asserting that the inmates of the Family Camp “often saw the flames from the chimney of the crematoria” (ibid., p. 62).

6.3. Crematorium V

Müller claims to have worked in this facility for a long time as a stoker, so he had to know perfectly the furnaces installed there. He said the following during the interview with Lanzmann (2010, p. 50):

La: Yes, you were a fireman.

Mü: Yes, in Crematorium 5.

La: Yes, and what exactly was your job?

Mü: Well, the job of this fireman consisted of... he had to (remove) the corpses... that is to keep the ovens clean, to remove the ashes of the corpses...

La: With what?

Mü: With a... it was a big scraper. It was always like this, that the ovens were... there were three corpses per oven.

La: Three corpses?

Mü: Yes.

La: Together.

Mü: Together. And now let's say if there were eight ovens in Crematorium 5, you can easily imagine, there are three new... every 20 minutes, that is, you have...

La: The burning time was 20 minutes...

Mü: The incineration time was about 20 minutes.

La: That's quite long, isn't it?

Mü: Yes, and so that, if you add it up, with eight ovens, there were 24 in 20 minutes, so that in one hour, you could incinerate 72 people."

As noted earlier, these claims are thermotechnically absurd. Furthermore, these data show a maximum capacity of (72 corpses × 24 hr/day =) 1,728 corpses within 24 hours, but Müller attributed to Crematoria IV and V a capacity of 2,000 corpses in 24 hours, which, as I will explain later, had no relationship with his fantasies about a cremation technique he called “express work”.

He describes the 8-muffle cremation furnace and its operation as follows (Müller 1979b, pp. 95f.):

“In the middle [of the furnace room] stood two big rectangular oven complexes, each of which had four burning chambers. Between the ovens were the generators which lit the fire and kept it going. The coke fuel was brought in in wheelbarrows. The raging flames rushed into the open air through two underground conduits which connected the ovens with the massive chimneys. The force and heat of the flames were so great that the whole room rumbled and trembled. A couple of sweaty, soot-blackened prisoners armed with metal scrapers fitted with wooden handles were busy raking out a whitish glowing substance from the bottom of one of the ovens. It had gathered in grooves which were let into the concrete floor under the flux-holes of the oven. When it had cooled somewhat it was grey-white. It was the ashes of human beings who had been alive yesterday and had left the world after an agonizing martyrdom, without anyone taking any notice.

While the ash was being raked out of one lot of ovens, the ventilators of the one next to it were being switched on and the preparations made for a new batch. Indeed a largish number of corpses were lying on the wet concrete floor. [...]

In front of each oven lay a metal trough, in the front of and under which a squared timber had been pushed diagonally, and behind there were two poles like those of a stretcher. As always, a bucket of water was poured over the trough first, then two prisoners laid three corpses on it while, with a loud rattling, the oven door was cranked up like a metal curtain. One in front and one behind, pairs of prisoners lifted up the stretcher and put it on the rollers in front of the entrance [muffle door], and pushed it into the oven. When it was pulled out an iron fork was pushed against the corpses so that they stayed inside the oven. When the oven door had been cranked down again the cremation began.”

The description is mostly correct, but some elements are described in a somewhat confused way, while others invented.

The structure of the loading stretcher is almost incomprehensible. As I have explained elsewhere,¹⁰¹ this device called Trage or Tragbahre (stretcher), Einführtrage (introduction stretcher) or Leichentrage (corpse stretcher) consisted of two parallel side rails consisting of steel tubes 3 cm in diameter and about 350 cm long, on whose front half, the one that was introduced into the muffle, a slightly concave steel sheet 190 cm long and 38 cm wide was welded. Onto this metal sheet, the corpse was placed. The rear parts of the two side rails, which made up the handles, were further apart from each other for better handling (49 cm). At the front half, the distance between the two side rails was the same as the guide rollers (Führungsrollen), so that they could rest and roll exactly on them.

Müller calls the concave steel sheet a “Trog” (“trough”); as for the pieces of “squared timber” (“Vierkantholz”) placed underneath it, he does not explain that it was used to lift the stretcher at the front in order to place it onto the rollers.

The technique of introducing the stretcher into the muffle is more or less correct, but loading the muffle with three corpses at once is absurd, as I have visually demonstrated elsewhere.³⁰ On the other hand, the 1945 Polish photographs of the ruins of Crematorium V, which were also accessible to Müller, clearly show the introduction stretcher, a loading roller and the stokers' tools, including a U-shaped and a V-shaped iron tool (Müller's "iron fork") and an ash scraper.¹⁰² Another, close-up photo shows the stretcher resting on rollers welded to an anchoring bar of the furnace. Below it one can see the openings of the ash chambers of two muffles, with the lids of the combustion-air ducts to the right of each ash-door opening.¹⁰³ In front of the opening of the right ash-door one can see the collection pit for ashes extracted from the ash chamber, similar to the pits of the triple-muffle furnace.¹⁰⁴ In the foreground are lying several pieces of squared timber, presumably those used to lift the stretcher and place it on the roller.

The bottom of the ash chamber was not made of concrete, but of refractory bricks, and it also had no grooves, which would have made it difficult to extract the ash accumulated inside with the scraper, which looked like a small hoe, but with a much-wider and -lower blade.

The doors of the 8-muffle furnace were called Muffelabsperrschieber (muffle closing dampers). They weighed 46 kg each, and ran vertically inside a wall structure located above each pair of muffles at the front of the furnaces (Pressac called them "guillotines"). They were operated by means of pulleys fixed to the ceiling beams, wire ropes and counterweights (Mattogno 2019, pp. 237f.).

Müller mentions the ventilators of the 8-muffle furnaces also elsewhere (also as "fans," Müller 1979b, pp. 94, 95, 98f.) and explains their purpose as follows (ibid., p. 136):

"While in the crematorium ovens, once the corpses were thoroughly alight, it was possible to maintain a lasting red heat with the help of fans, in the pits the fire would burn only as long as the air could circulate freely in between the bodies."

However, unlike the 3-muffle furnaces, the 8-muffle furnaces were not at all equipped with blowers (Druckluftanlagen), since they were of a very-much-simplified design,¹⁰⁵ so that the "ventilators" or "fans" mentioned by Müller are pure fantasy, like their alleged purpose – to keep the muffles red-hot. They merely fed cold(!) combustion air into the muffle, as explained earlier. This portentous lie alone proves that Müller never worked as a stoker of an 8-muffle furnace of the Auschwitz type.

He also describes the instructions allegedly given by Oberscharführer Peter Voss for increasing the cremation capacity of the furnaces in the context of the alleged gassings of the Family Camp (ibid., p. 98):

¹⁰⁵ Ibid., Vol. I, pp. 279-286 (structure, components and operation of the 8-muffle furnace).

“To get the stiff’s burnt by tomorrow morning is no problem. All you have to do is to see that every other load consists of two men and one woman from the transport, together with a Mussulman and a child.”^[106] For every other load use only good material from the transport, two men, one woman and a child. After every two loadings empty out the ashes to prevent the channels from getting blocked.’ Then he continued menacingly: ‘I hold you responsible for seeing to it that every twelve minutes the loads are stoked, and don’t forget to switch on the fans. Today it’s working flat out, understood?’”

In 1944, Voss was allegedly Kommandoführer of the Crematorium IV “Sonderkommando” (Lasik, p. 302), therefore he should have known the crematoria well, but the naive instructions given above betray a total ignorance of these facilities. As I have explained extensively elsewhere, the triple- and 8-muffle furnaces were designed for the cremation of only one corpse at a time in each muffle, and their geometry reflected this. Therefore, the simultaneous cremation of several corpses in one muffle would not have increased the capacity of the furnaces, which results both from previous experience and from thermotechnical facts.¹⁰⁷

Another gross nonsense is the provision to extract from the furnaces the ashes – evidently those of the cremated corpses – after every other load, that is after having cremated ($5 + 4 =$) nine corpses, two of which are said to have been children, in order to prevent “the channels” from getting blocked. What “channels”? The only “channels” emanating from the triple- and 8-muffle furnaces were the smoke ducts connecting the furnaces with the chimney. In the triple-muffle furnaces, the smoke duct started from two lateral openings in the center muffle’s ash chamber, where theoretically huge amounts of ashes could have obstructed it (see DOCUMENT 5a), but in the 8-muffle furnace, which is what Müller is talking about here, the ducts started from openings in the outside walls of the four outside muffles, where no ash could ever block them.¹⁰⁸ The ashes instead fell through the openings between the bars of the refractory-clay grate into the underlying ash chamber, from which they were extracted with a scraper through a special ash-extraction door. So how could the ashes end up in the “channels”?

On the final directive (the operations to be performed every 12 minutes) I will dwell below.

Müller then developed this thermotechnical delusion extensively. The nonsense he utters is so great that it is necessary to quote the text in full, despite its length (Müller 1979b, pp. 98-100):

¹⁰⁶ It is unclear what Müller meant; it seems that he considered freshly arrived deportees to be better “fuel” than the bodies of (emaciated) camp inmates.

“Under the direction of the Kapos, the bearers began sorting the dead into four stacks. The largest consisted mainly of strong men, the next in size of women, then came children, and lastly a stack of dead Mussulmans, emaciated and nothing but skin and bones. This technique was called ‘express work’, a designation thought up by the Kommandoführers and originating from experiments carried out in crematorium 5 in the autumn of 1943. The purpose of these experiments was to find a way of saving coke. On a few occasions groups of SS men and civilians visited the crematorium to watch the experiments. From conversations between Voss and Gorges we gathered that the civilians were technicians employed by the firm of Topf and Sons of Erfurt who had manufactured and installed the cremation ovens.

In the course of these experiments corpses were selected according to different criteria and then cremated. Thus the corpses of two Mussulmans were cremated together with those of two children or the bodies of two well-nourished men together with that of an emaciated woman, each load consisting of three, or sometimes, four bodies. Members of these groups were especially interested in the amount of coke required to burn corpses of any particular category, and in the time it took to cremate them. During these macabre experiments different kinds of coke were used and the results carefully recorded.

Afterwards, all corpses were divided into the above-mentioned four categories, the criterion being the amount of coke required to reduce them to ashes. Thus it was decreed that the most economical and fuel-saving procedure would be to burn the bodies of a well-nourished man and an emaciated woman, or vice versa, together with that of a child, because, as the experiments had established, in this combination, once they had caught fire, the dead would continue to burn without any further coke being required.

As the number of people being gassed grew apace, the four crematoria in Birkenau, even though they were working round the clock with two shifts, could no longer cope with their workload. According to the makers’ instructions the ovens required cooling down at regular intervals, repairs needed to be done and the channels leading to the chimneys to be cleaned out. These unavoidable interruptions resulted in the ‘quota’ of no more than three corpses to each oven load being kept to only very rarely.

The decision as to whether it was to be ‘express’ or ‘normal’ work was taken by the Kommandoführers. If outsiders or perhaps even the Lagerkommandant arrived at the crematorium for an inspection we switched over to normal work immediately. [...]

Once the visitors had gone ‘express work’ continued at the usual pace, significantly raising the output of the ovens.”

To begin with, the expressions “express work” and “normal work” were invented by Müller and are not confirmed by any documents.

The alleged cremation experiments in Crematorium V in the autumn of 1943 are another fable, as are the arrival of SS commissions and civilians. As for the “technicians employed by the firm of Topf and Sons of Erfurt,” it is known that the creator of the triple- and 8-muffle furnaces was the engineer Kurt Prüfer, who was also responsible for their installation in Birkenau. In this capacity, he went to Auschwitz several times. His last visit in 1943 took place in late summer of 1943, in September (see Mattogno 2014, pp. 30-34). To properly assess Müller's various claims, a brief excursus is necessary.

As soon as Crematorium II came into operation in the last third of March 1943, the three forced-draft blowers of the chimney overheated and were irreparably damaged. Eng. Prüfer and his colleague Karl Schultz, who had designed the combustion-air blower for the triple-muffle furnace, were summoned to Auschwitz on March 24 and 25 in order to discuss what to do. It was decided to remove the forced-draft systems. This work was carried out by the Topf fitter Heinrich Messing between May 17 and 19. But the Central Construction Office had already noticed earlier that the damage was even more serious: it involved the refractory lining of the chimney and the smoke ducts, which had collapsed or was damaged and had to be rebuilt. The entire affair, which I have extensively exposed in another study, dragged on for months and produced many documents. I summarize the essential points.¹⁰⁹

The damage to the chimney and the flue ducts occurred in the latter half of March but was discovered only in the following month, as the Central Construction Office requested Prüfer to send a new project for the chimney lining at that time. Work on the demolition of the damaged refractory lining began a few days after the arrival of Robert Koehler's letter of May 21, probably on May 24, after Bischoff's telephone conversation with Prüfer; it stopped on 1st June, but it was not possible to carry out further repairs, because the new design of the chimney lining had not yet been received. This design project was assigned to Koehler Co. whose personnel were surely present at Auschwitz on May 29, and it is probable that Koehler took part in the demolition job. In the Topf letter of July 23 it is said that Crematorium II had been out of service for six weeks, hence since June 11, but any cremation activity surely ended earlier than that, because one cannot imagine any incinerations being carried out with workers present inside the chimney; therefore, cremations must have stopped around May 24. The crematorium was possibly used normally until the damage was discovered, but, keeping in mind the Central Construction Office's experience with the Main Camp's crematorium, it is difficult to believe that operation would have been at full load later on. In fact, between April 24 and 30, 1943 all windows of the furnace hall of Crematorium II as well as those of the adjoining rooms were being painted. Repair work on the chimney lining began after June 19 – when Koehler had not yet received Prüfer's new design – and was essentially concluded on July 17, 1943, but it was still necessary to repair the flue ducts. Work probably ended only in late August, because on August 30 the Central Construction Office asked the Supplies Administration

¹⁰⁹ Ibid., Vol. I, pp. 238-243.

(Materialverwaltung) for the supply to Crematorium II of various paint products for use by the inmate paint shop.

On September 10, 1943, Prüfer went to Auschwitz to discuss the question of liability for the damage to the chimney and smoke ducts and their payment.

The story of the Topf experimental commission is also refuted by the invoices that this company sent to Auschwitz, which attest to all the work performed by it at the camp.¹¹⁰

It can therefore be asserted with certainty that cremation experiments were never carried out in the Birkenau crematoria in order to establish the coke consumption and the durations of cremations.

Müller, as I remind the reader, testified during the Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial that he had been transferred to Crematorium II in the early summer of 1943 and remained there until the end of the summer, after which he was sent to Crematorium V. In contradiction to this, he wrote in his book (Müller 1979b, p. 65):

“A few days later our team was ordered to work in crematorium 3 which from the outside looked exactly like crematorium 2.”

This is clearly a mere artifice enabling Müller to claim that he was an “eye”-witness also regarding events unfolding in Crematorium III.

The fact is that, when Müller claims to have arrived at Crematorium II in late June/early July 1943, this facility was completely out of operation, as the extensive repair work on chimney and smoke ducts was still in progress, but he knew nothing of this when concocting his story.

Resuming the examination of his account, the purpose of the experiments allegedly was to ascertain the coke consumption and the durations of cremation with various types of corpses. It must be remembered that at the claimed time Müller claims to have been a stoker in Crematorium V, which means that he personally must have been involved in carrying out these claimed experiments. That this is a mere literary fiction is confirmed by the fact that he says absolutely nothing about the results of these purported experiments: how much coke did a cremation during the “normal work” regimen require? How much during the “express work” regimen? How much “to burn corpses of any particular category”?

Regarding the durations of cremations, he only generically mentions the absurd duration of 20 minutes, which should be that obtained during the “normal work” regimen. About the “express work” regimen, he limits himself to saying that it was “significantly raising the output of the ovens,” but he gives no numbers.

It is not even clear whether the cremation capacity he attributes to Crematoria II/III (3,000 corpses per day) and Crematoria IV/V (2,000 corpses per day), and therefore whether his claimed total of 10,000 per day was reached under “normal” or “express” conditions. In fact, in this regard, he becomes entangled in an inextricable contradiction. From his data for the first pair of crematoria (three corpses in a muffle within 20 minutes) results a cremation capacity of 3,240 corpses within 24 hours against the 3,000 he declared, and for the second pair of crematoria results a capacity of 1,728 corpses in 24 hours, against his number of 2,000. Hence, for Crematoria II/III, the calculated capacity is larger than his claimed average, making it look like this was the result of an “express work” regimen, whereas for Crematoria IV/V it is smaller, making it look like the result of a “normal work” regimen. Be that as it may, the difference between these two regimens is not very significant. Apparently, Müller based it more on combustibility than on the number of corpses per batch, because he considers the cremation of four corpses together in one muffle to be exceptional.

For Müller the experiments were limited exclusively to the type of corpses to be cremated. He knew nothing of the main methods to influence the speed and efficiency of a cremation – and this is no small thing for a stoker. In fact, he never mentions the elementary activities of the stoker, for example, the adjustment of the chimney damper to increase or decrease the draft, the regulation of the fire in the gas generator by appropriately adjusting its air supply, the regulation of the air flow in the muffles by means of the air-channel closures.

Experiments officially requested from the Topf company by the camp administration would have made sense only if the furnaces had been equipped with the necessary technical devices necessary to monitor and interpret numerous parameters, that is, at least of:

1. an electric pyrometer to measure and record the muffle temperature,
2. a device to measure the chimney draft;
3. a device to measure the hearth draft;
4. a combined CO/CO₂ gas tester to both ensure economical combustion and detect smoke development;
5. various thermometers to measure the temperatures in the ash chamber, the smoke duct and of the combustion air fed into the muffle.

By way of comparison, see the real cremation experiments performed in the crematorium of Dessau between 1926 and 1927 by German Eng. Richard Kessler (Mattoigno/Deana, Vol. I, pp. 61-73).

In his extensive ignorance, Müller considered cremation an automatic process that required external interventions at specific times rather than depending on the course of the process, which could vary from corpse to corpse. In fact, claims that instructed to “poke” (what? The coke? The corpses? Both?) every 12 minutes and turn on the fans. Since the air blowers, where they existed (the double- and triple-muffle furnaces), were used to feed cold air to the corpse inside the muffle, poking the coke would probably help kindling the combustion inside the hearth a little – although this benefit is basically canceled out by the simultaneous entry of cold air through the open hearth door – but turning on the air blower simultaneously would definitely cool down the muffle, hence slow down the cremation!

Here, however, Müller speaks of the 8-muffle furnace, which was devoid of any “fans” (blower).

And what does every 12 minutes mean anyway? If Müller meant 12 minutes from the introduction of the corpses into the muffles, there would have been nothing to “poke,” because the evaporation of the water contained in the corpses would have only just begun. “Poking” the coke on the hearth grate, on the other hand, would have been of little use, because given a defined hearth capacity and a full load of coke in it, the amount of heat and combustion gases produced by the hearth depended on the amount of air fed through the hearth, hence on the chimney’s draft and on the proper adjustment of the hearth’s air-channel closure, not on getting poked. Such a 12-minute interval is also completely inconclusive, because 12 minutes is not a factor of 20 minutes, the claimed cremation time. Anything poked every 12 minutes would have happened at different phases of each subsequent cremation.

Müller’s assertion that, “once they had caught fire, the dead would continue to burn,” applied to all types of corpses, as long as the temperature inside the muffle did not drop below 800°C, which is necessary for the combustion of proteins (ibid., p. 31). But the continuation of his sentence – “without any further coke being required” – is simply wrong, because even after the entire refractory mass of these furnaces had reached operating temperature, they could not function without further heat input, by merely feeding on the bodies themselves. In fact, the initial endothermic, meaning heat-absorbing, phase of cremation required a very large quantity of heat, as shown by the experiences conducted with civilian furnaces.¹¹¹ Müller’s idea that, once the furnaces had reached thermal equilibrium, cremation proceeded by itself without further consumption of any fuel, is therefore a technical absurdity. Jankowski also insisted on this legend, specifically with regard to the 8-muffle furnace in Crematorium V (see Chapter 8):

“In each opening of the furnace, three corpses were introduced with stretchers that moved on rollers. When the furnaces were properly heated, the corpses burned by themselves for weeks on end.”

I have discussed this particular absurdity in depth in another study, to which I refer (Mattoigno 2020c, Chapter 18, pp. 171-179).

Returning to Müller, the different combustibility of various types of corpses was a fact known since the 1930s. Since 1931, Eng. Friedrich Hellwig had found that, out of 100 corpses, 65 burned normally, 25 with difficulty, and 10 with great difficulty (Mattogno/Deana, Vol. I, p. 106).

¹¹¹ Ibid., Section 1, Chapters IV, V and VII, pp. 58-93, 105-122.

In 1933, Eng. Hans Keller wrote (ibid., p. 91):

“There are corpses which burn easily and thus require a short time for the cremation. But there are other corpses that do not want to burn, requiring three hours and even longer. This variability shows up also in the composition of the gas and in the temperature. Corpses burning easily will initially produce up to 16%, even 17% of CO₂; with corpses that are difficult to burn, this value goes down to 4%.”

Subsequent experiments conducted by the same engineer in the early 1940s showed that body fat was one of the main elements of the combustibility of corpses (ibid., pp. 71-73; Mattogno 2020c, pp. 174f.).

In Birkenau, the proportion of corpses that burned badly had to be prevalent for obvious reasons: Jews deported from Europe’s ghettos and collection camps were usually undernourished, and camp inmates who died of diseases were often very emaciated. Therefore, a cremation duration of 20 minutes – so widespread in anecdotal tales about Auschwitz – is even more of an utter absurdity.

Although cremation experiments were not carried out in the Birkenau crematoria, it is still possible to imagine that some elementary knowledge of thermotechnics and the experience acquired led the stokers to carry out a rational distribution of the corpses in the furnace muffles – not several adult corpses in a single muffle, though – for instance by combining emaciated bodies with more-or-less-normal bodies in alternating, interconnected muffles. In fact, both in the triple-muffle and in the 8-muffle furnaces, all the muffles were interconnected. In the triple-muffle furnace, the gases produced by the two gas generators entered the outer muffles, and from these, through special openings in the dividing walls, they flowed into the central muffle, from where they passed into the smoke duct and into the chimney. In the 8-muffle furnace, each of the four gas generators fed a pair of interconnected muffles. The combustion products of the gas generator entered the first, outside muffle, from which they passed into the second muffle, then exited through the smoke duct. Given this structure, even if we limit the issue exclusively to the combustibility of the corpses, it was not irrelevant to introduce a certain type of corpse into the first and a different type into the second (or third) muffle. The choice could therefore only concern the placement of an emaciated corpse and a more-or-less-normal one in alternating muffles, but Müller displayed no knowledge of this.

All this confirms that his narration is a senseless, invented tale with no basis in reality.

7. The Extermination of the Hungarian Jews and the Cremation Pits

7.1. The Repair Work of April 1944

On March 18, 1944, Hitler met the Hungarian regent Miklós Horthy at Schloss Klessheim, near Salzburg. As a result of this meeting, Horthy agreed to make available to the Third Reich 100,000 Jewish workers and their families (Braham 1963, p. 363). The figure was then doubled: on May 9, Hitler ordered 10,000 troops to be withdrawn from Sevastopol in order to guard the approximately 200,000 Jews. These Jews were to be sent to various concentration camps of the Reich, where those fit for labor among them would be employed in the “interceptor construction program” (NO-5689), a desperate German attempt to turn the tide of the war by regaining air superiority in Europe. In these agreements lie the origin and purpose of the deportation of the Hungarian Jews, which clearly had no exterminating purpose.

A letter of May 4, 1944 by Edmund Veessenmeyer, the plenipotentiary of the Reich in Hungary, already mentioned a plan to deport 310,000 Jews (NG-2262). From May 17, Hungarian Jews began to pour into Auschwitz, and deportations continued until July 11. The number of Jews deported from Hungary eventually amounted to 437,402, but no more than 398,400 of them reached Auschwitz, even though the actual number is probably closer to about 321,000. It is documented that at least 107,200 of them were declared fit for labor. Since it is known that 30-33% of the deportees belonged to this category, the total number of Hungarian Jews arriving at the Auschwitz Camp would be around the lower number just mentioned. Of these 107,200 deportees, about 28,000 were registered in Auschwitz, while the remaining 79,200 were transferred to other camps through the Birkenau transit camp (see Mattoigno 2007).

In the imaginative narrative of the Auschwitz resistance groups, this deportation essentially aimed at extermination, so they invented frantic preparation activities by the SS at Auschwitz. Müller jumped on this propaganda bandwagon and told it this way (1979b, p. 124):

“In addition to several prisoner teams civilian workers from a factory in Upper Silesia were called in to overhaul the crematoria. Cracks in the brickwork of the ovens were filled with a special fire clay paste; the cast-iron doors were painted black and the door hinges oiled. New grates were fitted in the generators, while the six chimneys underwent a thorough inspection and repair, as did the electric fans. The walls of the four changing rooms and the eight gas chambers were given a fresh coat of paint.

Quite obviously all these efforts were intended to put the places of extermination into peak condition to guarantee smooth and continuous operation. What mystified us not a little, however, was the beautification of crematorium 5, where everything in sight was whitewashed.”

According to Müller, these repair works were carried out between April 7 (ibid., p. 120) and before the end of the month, when rumors spread of the imminent arrival of Hungarian Jews (ibid., p. 124).

The documents show the following, however (Mattogno/Deana, Vol. I, p. 245). On April 13, 1944, the Central Construction Office ordered the locksmith workshop of the DAW (Deutsche Ausüstungswerke; an SS-owned handicraft business) to “overhaul 20 furnace doors and 10 scrapers at Crematoria II and III.” The job was completed on October 17, 1944. In early May, damage to the brickwork was discovered, certainly in the smoke ducts or the chimneys, because on May 9, the head of construction of Concentration Camp II (Birkenau) asked the camp headquarters for a “permit for entry to Crematoria I-IV” to be issued for the Koehler Co., because that firm had been ordered to execute “urgent repairs on [the] crematoria.” At the end of the month, more damage struck the furnaces. On May 31, the crematoria administration at Birkenau ordered DAW to repair two muffle doors and five closures, plus other minor jobs. The repair work was done between 20 June and 20 July. A later order, dated 7 June 1944, concerned “required repairs on Crematoria 1-4 between 8 June and 20 July 1944.” The job ended on September 6, 1944.

Thus, in April 1944 there was only one repair concerning furnace doors, which Müller knew nothing about, who claimed only that those doors were merely painted. All the other jobs he mentioned are completely invented: filling cracks, installing new grates (muffles or hearths?), inspecting the chimneys, overhauling the fans. The subsequent damage to chimneys and/or smoke ducts is equally unknown to Müller, starting with that which occurred in early May, even before the arrival of the Hungarian Jews.

The last phrase in the above quotation from Müller’s book – “everything in sight was whitewashed” – is an abridged, sanitized translation of the original German sentence, which reads (1979a, p. 197):

“For not only were the firebricks of the two furnace complexes painted there, but also the joints between the bricks on the walls were painted white.”

This statement is in direct conflict with his self-proclaimed status as a former stoker, therefore a cremation expert by practice, because it makes no sense that “firebricks” (“Schamottziegel”) of the 8-muffle furnace were painted, because this type of bricks was obviously inside the furnaces (in the muffles, ash chamber and gas generators), while the external layer, paintable at will, consisted of ordinary bricks. Nor does it make sense that “the joints between the bricks on the walls were painted white” as well, which presupposes the presence of exposed bricks. As is clear from the building description attached to the handover negotiation of Crematorium V of March 19, 1943, however, the interior walls of that facility were “plastered and whitewashed brick masonry”.¹¹²

7.2. The Gassings

Müller emphatically summarizes the tally of the alleged extermination of the Hungarian Jews (1979b, p. 143):

“Since the previous night 10,000 people had perished in the three gas chambers of crematorium 5 alone, while on the site of bunker 5 with its four gas chambers corpses were burnt in four pits. In addition, in crematoria 2, 3 and 4^[113] with a total of five gas chambers and thirty-eight ovens work went on at full speed. Taking this kind of ‘plant capacity’ into consideration it will be readily understood how it was possible to exterminate about 400,000 Hungarian Jews within a few weeks.”

Müller is silent that there was a transit camp in Birkenau through which, as mentioned earlier, at least 79,200 unregistered Hungarian Jews passed, to which another 28,000 registered deportees must be added, which means that, from an orthodox point of view, at least 107,200 deportees were spared the “gas chamber.” In 1979, the 1964 edition of the “Kalendarium” of Auschwitz was still unchallenged, in which Danuta Czech ignored the Birkenau transit camp, and considered all Hungarian Jews deported to Auschwitz who had not been registered as having been gassed. Since just over 29,100 had been registered (Mattogno 2007, p. 4), the balance of gassed people was assumed to have been (437,402 – 29,100 =) about 408,300, or approximately 400,000, a figure also influenced by the statements of former Camp Commandant Rudolf Höss, who had mentioned this figure.¹¹⁴

It is clear that any true “eyewitness” of the “Sonderkommando” could not have omitted such an important fact in good faith.

The expression used by Müller – “Since the previous night” – indicates that he was talking about an entire day of 24 hours of activity; therefore, about 10,000 people had been gassed in Crematorium V within 24 hours.

There is a parallel passage in his book, German edition, that provides further details (1979a, p. 215):

“Since the previous evening, three transports had disappeared in the gas chambers of Crematorium V at an interval of about four hours and were gassed. After the screaming, moaning and groaning had ceased, the gas chambers were vented for a few minutes. Then the SS men drove in inmate units to remove the bodies.”

¹¹² RGVA, 502-2-54, p. 26.

¹¹³ But at that time, this crematorium was not operational, if we follow Müller: 60-70% of the “Sonderkommando” inmates were housed there “because Crematorium 4 had been put out of operation, that is, it wasn’t functioning” (Lanzmann 2010, p. 82).

¹¹⁴ PS-3868. Affidavit by Höss of April 5, 1946; Mattogno 2020b, p. 65.

The sanitized English edition cuts that paragraph short to just one sentence (1979b, p. 135):

“Since last night three transports had disappeared into the gas chambers of crematorium 5.”

“A few minutes” of ventilation is ridiculous, because Crematoria IV and V did not have any mechanical ventilation systems, and the structure of the facility made any passive ventilation very difficult. Under such circumstances, even the ventilation time prescribed by the contemporary German “Guidelines for the Use of Prussic Acid (Zyklon) for Destruction of Vermin (Disinfestation)” – 20 hours¹¹⁵ – would have been insufficient to remove all toxic fumes, so a ventilation time of just a few minutes is utter nonsense. (The question is explored further in Chapter 9.)

In such conditions, driving “Sonderkommando” inmates into the gas chambers would have been catastrophic, especially since they allegedly did not wear any gas masks. I noted earlier that Müller describes the smell and taste of hydrogen cyanide, which assumes he was not wearing a gas mask. In this regard he explained to Lanzmann (2010, p. 111):

“La: They had no gas masks?”

Mü: Yes, at times there were gas... the gas masks, but the filters, which were used, weren’t appropriate for this situation, so that breathing in the, in the gas masks was impossible.

La: Impossible?

Mü: Yes, very minimal. Yes, restricted to just a very short time.”

The gassing of a transport within four hours is a fiction even from the orthodox perspective. Müller explains: “During the day-shift there were, on average, 140 prisoners working in and round crematoria 4 and 5,” which were broken down as follows:

- 25 corpse “bearers” cleared the gas chambers and carried the bodies to the pits;
- 10 “dental mechanics and barbers” extracted gold teeth from corpses and cut women’s hair;
- 25 corpse “bearers” arranged the corpses in the cremation pits in three layers;
- 15 “stokers” carried out the cremation;
- 35 inmates made up the “ash team” responsible for removing the ashes from the pits and transporting them to the “ash depot” and pulverizing the bone residues.

¹¹⁵ NI-9912. Translation of the document in Rudolf 2016, pp. 117-124, here p. 123.

The remaining 30 inmates were divided into two teams: “a smaller group” took care of the victims’ clothes, the others “worked in crematorium 4, where operations went on ‘normally’” (Müller 1979b, pp. 136f.).

In practice, if these three batches of gassed deportees contained the 10,000 deportees mentioned in the quotation at the beginning of this subchapter, then within four hours over 3,300 deportees had to enter the gas chambers, be gassed and subsequently their bodies taken away by 25 inmates outside the crematorium, to the cremation pits at a distance of at least 10-20 meters, as I will clarify in the following subchapter. Each one would have to drag 133 corpses, and this operation alone, even if it had taken only two minutes back and forth, would have lasted more than four hours. The claimed workforce was simply inadequate.

In the passage I quoted above, Müller states that in Crematorium V “three transports” were gassed, but he also says that “each transport had up to 5,000, 5,000 people on it.” (Lanzmann 2010, p. 47). If that was so, three transports would have amounted to 15,000 people, not 10,000. According to his indirectly claimed percentage of deportees alleged gassed (400,000 out of about 437,000 deportees in total), which is 91.5%, the actual number of victims to be processed from these three transports would have been about 13,700.

7.3. Cremation Pits and Air Photos of Birkenau

Müller relates that in early May 1944, as part of the preparations for the claimed gassing of the Hungarian Jews (Müller 1979b, pp. 125f.):

“Soon after his arrival Moll ordered the excavation of five pits behind crematorium 5, not far from the three gas chambers.”

On this issue too, two of Müller’s colleagues, Tauber and Dragon, had testified in a similar vein. Tauber had mentioned the cremation pits already in his interrogation by the Soviets of February 27, 1945, albeit vaguely and claiming that there were four of them rather than the canonical five:¹¹⁶

“In the summer of 1944, many people were exterminated; for the extermination, 4 crematoria and 4 large fires [больших костра] were operating, French and Hungarian members of the resistance were exterminated.”

The legend of members of the French Resistance being exterminated in Auschwitz was in vogue in 1945. The Jewish historian Filip Friedman wrote that 670,000 [sic!] “‘Terrorists,’ meaning patriots and partisans from France” were transported to Auschwitz and murdered in the summer of 1944 (Friedman, p. 74), and in 1956, Jan Sehn still spoke of “members of the French resistance movement” who were allegedly sent to Auschwitz during the months of May to August 1944 (Sehn, p. 118).

¹¹⁶ GARF, 7021-108-13, p. 33.

In a subsequent interrogation, Tauber did not know much more about the cremation pits, and only corrected the number and eliminated any reference to the French partisans.¹¹⁷

“In May 1944, the SS ordered us to dig five pits in the courtyard of Crematorium V, in the area between the drainage ditch and the crematorium building, in which the corpses of the gassed people were cremated who had come with the Hungarian mass transports.”

Dragon, on the other hand, had a more-vivid fantasy, as he also indicated the size and cremation capacity of the pits:¹¹⁸

“However, because the crematoria were not very productive, pits were dug next to Crematorium V for the cremation of the gassed Hungarians. There were 3 larger and 2 smaller graves.”

“At the beginning of May 1944, transports of Hungarian Jews began to be gassed and cremated in Crematorium V. The corpses of the gassed of some of the first transports were cremated in the furnaces of Crematorium IV, because at the time the chimneys of Crematorium V were out of order. Eventually the Hungarian Jews were burned in pits dug for this purpose near the building of Crematorium No. V. Five pits 25 meters long, 6 meters wide and 3 meters deep were dug. About 5,000 people were burned in the pits a day.”

Hence, the pits were all the same size after all. He evidently did not remember having declared shortly before that three of them were of a larger, and two of a smaller size.

Müller was liberally inspired by his colleagues. According to him, the first two pits were 40-50 meters long, 8 meters wide and 2 meters deep, hence with an average surface of $(45 \text{ m} \times 8 \text{ m} =) 360 \text{ m}^2$, and a volume of $(360 \text{ m}^2 \times 2 \text{ m} =) 720 \text{ m}^3$. Towards the middle of May, Moll is said to have had another three pits dug in the courtyard of Crematorium V, and another four in the vicinity of “bunker 5” (Müller 1979b, pp. 132f.). Müller does not indicate their dimensions, but he told Lanzmann that the five pits at Crematorium V measured about 40 meters long, 8 meters wide and over 2.5 meters deep. They were located 10-20 meters away from the building, and in each one, 1,200-1,400 corpses could be burned within 24 hours. Regarding the pits at “bunker 5,” he claimed that 1,400 corpses could be cremated in each of them within 24 hours (Lanzmann 2010, pp. 51f.). This confirms that, for Müller, all of the nine claimed pits had similar, standardized dimensions, so we can start with these data (I use the depth given in his book, 2 m): total area of the five pits near Crematorium V $(360 \text{ m}^2 \times 5 =) 1,800 \text{ m}^2$, total volume $(1,800 \text{ m}^2 \times 2 \text{ m} =) 3,600 \text{ m}^3$; for the four pits near “bunker 5”: $(360 \text{ m}^2 \times 4 =) 1,440 \text{ m}^2$, $(1,440 \text{ m}^2 \times 2 =) 2,880 \text{ m}^3$.

¹¹⁸ Ibid., pp. 108f.

In a separate study dedicated to the claimed 1944 outdoor cremations in Birkenau (Mattogno 2016a, pp. 57-79), I documented that in the various air photos taken by U.S. and British reconnaissance aircraft during the period of the claimed peak of Jewish extermination (May 31, June 26, July 8, August 20, 23 and 25 and September 13), there is not the slightest trace of cremation pits, smoking or non-smoking, in the vicinity of the alleged “Bunker V.” In the northern Courtyard of Crematorium V, on the other hand, there is only one smoking surface, but it is very small, of about 50 m². As for the images, I refer to the respective photo documents in that study, but here it is worth reproducing a section enlargement of the photo showing the area of the Birkenau Camp, taken by an aircraft of the Royal Air Force on August 23, 1943 (see DOCUMENT 17), which shows the only smoking site of the entire camp (see DOCUMENT 18). To give an idea of the size, the building that can be seen partly on the left, entirely in DOCUMENT 16, was Crematorium V, 12.85 meters wide and 67.50 meters long, hence with a surface area of 867.3 m². Therefore, if Müller’s claims were true, there would have been a total area of cremation pits measuring 1,800 m² in the northern courtyard of Crematorium V, which is more than twice the area covered by Crematorium V. To this, we would have to add the space between those pits required to tend the fires (move corpses, firewood and cremation remains), and the space required to store the immense amounts of firewood needed. Here I won’t go deeper into this topic.

Müller does not resist the temptation to tell another atrocious anecdote that was part of the legend spread about Auschwitz. Among Moll’s pastimes was this (Müller 1979b, p. 141):

“Like a meat inspector he would stride about the changing room, selecting a couple of naked young women and hustling them to one of the pits where corpses were being burnt. Faced with the sight of this pit of hell the women were distracted. They stood at the edge of the pit, rooted to the spot, gazing fixedly at the gruesome scene at their feet. Moll who was watching them closely got a tremendous kick out of their terror. In the end he shot them from behind so that they fell forward into the burning pit.”

Why would Moll have picked out two deportees and kill them separately in a cremation pit? It would be a rather childish sadism. In fact, this story uses a theme of another camp legend: the mass shooting of deportees with a blow to the nape of the neck at the edge of the cremation pits. The most-prominent and fervent “eyewitness” and supporter of this legend was Nyiszli, who told this tale in exhaustive detail in Chapter XIII of his 1946 book (Mattogno 2020a, pp. 57-60). When this absurd story was later abandoned, it left exactly the anecdote in question as a “sadistic” residue. It was turned into “art” by another self-proclaimed “Sonderkommando” member, David Olère, in a painting from 1945 (Olère, p. 79; see DOCUMENT 19), and it is clear that Müller’s story is a simple commentary on the scene painted by Olère: precisely two women on the edge of a burning pit, one of whom looks away from it; behind them, Moll, with gun in hand, is about to kill them. The scene is purely imaginary. In reality, the women on the edge of the pit would have burned alive due to the fire's intense heat, without any intervention by Moll needed, who himself would have gotten seriously burned as well.

However, this picture is important because it locates the cremation pit in relation to Crematorium V, which can be seen in the background. The longest side of the pit is parallel to the crematorium, meaning it follows the east-west direction.

The aforementioned air photo irrefutably shows that the story of the five cremation pits is a patenthetic lie. In this context, it is important to underline that a colleague of Müller, Jankowski, gave a testimony in this regard, which is in direct conflict with Müller's claim:¹¹⁹

"The cremation pits, of enormous capacity, were located west of the gas chambers of Crematorium V, at a distance of a few tens of meters. There were two pits, and each could hold about 2000 corpses. The corpses were placed on layers of wood, alternatingly corpses of men and women, because they burned better that way. Corpses of children were also burned there. The cremation pits operated at the same time as the furnaces. Outflows [= drainage channels] of human fat had been dug in the pits, but I could not verify that the fat was collecting in them – the corpses simply burned completely."

The attached drawing (see DOCUMENT 20) gives the pits' dimensions (20 m × 2 m × 2 m) and their location. In DOCUMENT 21, I have scaled Müller's five pits, with the minimum dimensions of 40 m × 8 m, in an arrangement compatible with the available space, as well as Jankowski's two pits, which would have existed in the same place and at the same time. The contradiction could not be more glaring: in the northern courtyard of Crematorium V, there were five pits with minimum dimensions of 40 m × 8 m × 2.5 m (320 m², 800 m³), which a maximum capacity of 1,400 corpses within 24 hours, if we follow Müller; for Jankowski, however, there were only two pits, measuring 20 m × 2 m × 2 m (40 m², 80 m³). Although Jankowski's pit had only 10% of the volume of the pits claimed by Müller, its cremation capacity was inexplicably 40% larger!

There is another drawing, by an unknown author, which also has as its subject Crematorium V (Dąlek/Świebocka, Drawing 18; see DOCUMENT 22). That it is precisely this facility is evident from the fact that it is surrounded by trees (Crematorium IV was located in an open space). The building, seen from the west, is drawn quite correctly: it shows the lower annex which contained the supposed gas chambers, and the structure of the crematorium proper with its two high chimneys (although the three dormers on the roof did not exist, and the doors and windows are very rough). This drawing depicts another theme of the camp's black propaganda: a column of Jews is escorted to the crematorium, approaching the building from the west (the editors commented it with: "Do gazu," "Into the gas"), but west of Crematorium V there was only the camp fence. There is no cremation pit in this drawing.

7.4. The Cement Platform

Within the context of the imaginary cremation pits, Müller adds another fable, which he lays out as follows (1979b, p. 133):

"In this connection Moll had thought up a new technique to expedite the removal of ashes. He ordered an area next to the pits adjoining crematorium 5 and measuring about 60 metres by 15 metres to be concreted; on this surface the ashes were crushed to a fine powder before their final disposal."

This also refers to May 1944. Such a platform, which had to have a minimum thickness of some 10 cm for the claimed function, would have had an area of 900 m² and a volume of at least 90 m³. Even if it had been ordered by Moll himself, the Central Construction Office necessarily would have been in charge of implementing it. According to the bureaucratic practice in force at the time (see Mattogno 2015, 2016b, pp. 23-28) – leaving out Office Group C (Construction) of the SS Economic and Administrative Main Office, which issued the relevant construction orders –, at the local level every construction project of any type initially required to define an official construction site, identified by a number and a name (e.g. Crematorium II was BW 30 – Krematorium). For its realization, any and all construction sites required various documents: location sketch (Lageskizze), project description (Baubeschreibung), cost estimate (Kostenvoranschlag), floor plan (Lageplan), explanatory report (Erläuterungsbericht), handover negotiation to the camp administration (Übergabeverhandlung), notification of completion (Meldung der Fertigstellung).

The execution of the work, which was carried out by the Central Construction Office through the various labor units of its workshops, also required the completion of other paperwork: request to the supply's administration (Anforderung an die Materialverwaltung), the project assignment (Auftrag), labor cards (Arbeitskarten), receipts (Empfangsschein) and the delivery slips (Lieferschein). The prisoners' work was accounted for by the camp administration and billed to the Central Construction Office with an invoice (Rechnung). For almost all known projects ever built by and at the Auschwitz Camp, at least some of these documents have survived.

That said, there is not the slightest hint in connection with Müller's concrete platform in the Central Construction Office documentation, and it does not appear in the list of construction projects either.

The air photos of Birkenau, starting with the very-clear American ones of May 31, 1944 show no trace of this platform (see Mattogno 2016a, Docs. 18 + 23, pp. 162, 167). Furthermore, no orthodox Holocaust “expert” who has analyzed these photographs (Dino A. Brugioni and Robert G. Poirier, Mark van Alstine, Carroll Lucas, Nevin Bryant; ibid., pp. 50-57) reported to have identified it.

The claim that such a platform existed is therefore unfounded and moreover refuted by air photos. In other words, it is simply a fairy tale, but in this specific case it is also another case of plagiarism. In fact, in the typewritten transcription of Höss’s handwritten declaration of March 14, 1946 we read:¹²⁰

“After cleaning out the pits, the remaining ashes were crushed. This happened on a cement slab where inmates pulverized the remaining bones with wooden pounders.”

This alone suffices to put to rest definitively the tall tale of the cremation pits, but Müller seasons it with such enormous nonsense that it is an affront to intelligence. Nevertheless, his claptrap is usually accepted as sacrosanct truth by orthodox Holocaust historians, and this is precisely what makes the following discussion necessary.

7.5. Excavation and Transportation of Excavated Soil

As we have seen before, the five phantom pits in the courtyard of Crematorium V are said to have had a total volume of 3,600 m³. It is known by experience that the volume of soil increases by 10-25% when excavated (Colombo, p. 237). Therefore, the actual volume of the excavated soil was at least 3,960 m³, assuming the minimum expansion value. What happened to this soil? Müller explains it more than once (1979b, p. 127):

“The soil which we had dug out was loaded on to wheelbarrows and, under the watchful eyes of our tormentors, wheeled away at the double.”

“Even removing the soil, which had become even heavier due to the rain, became more exhausting and time-consuming.” (1979a, p. 207; omitted from the English edition, 1979b, p. 130)

“Together with a few others, I had to use wheelbarrows to remove the rest of the excavated soil that was still lying around the edge of the pits.” (1979a, p. 209; cut short in the English edition, 1979b, p. 131, to “I [...] was ordered to remove earth in wheelbarrows instead.”)

The place where the soil was deposited is never indicated by Müller, but it had to be so far from the pits as not to hinder the necessary cremation operations for which they were dug.

¹²⁰ Mattogno 2020b, pp. 29, 255. The document is best known in its English translation: NO-1210.

The “Explanatory Report on the Preliminary Project of the New Construction of the Waffen-SS Prisoner-of-War Camp, Auschwitz, Upper Silesia,” states that the soil of the Birkenau area, beneath the topsoil, consisted of chalky clay with small amounts of sand and gravel.¹²¹ The specific weight of dry clayey soil ranges from 1,700 to 2,000 kg per cubic meter (Colombo, p. 65). Under the minimum value, the 3,960 cubic meters of soil that needed to be hauled away weighed some 6,732,000 kg. Since the Birkenau Camp was located on swampy meadows, the soil by force must have been wet, hence its weight must have been considerably higher. Assuming a load of 60 kg of soil per wheelbarrow (which exceeds 90 kg with the weight of the wheelbarrow),¹²² at least 112,000 trips would have been required to remove this quantity of soil. Müller does not specify how many inmates were involved in this work, but states that by the middle of May the “Sonderkommando” consisted of 450 inmates (1979b, p. 132). In fact, on May 15, 1944, the strength of the crematoria staff (“Heizer Krematorium”) was 318 inmates, guarded by 4 guards(!), of whom 157 worked in Crematoria IV and V,¹²³ probably 78 in one and 79 in the other.

By way of comparison, the company Ing. Richard Strauch of Krakow, in its response to a tender for drainage works in Construction Section II of Birkenau which it sent to the Central Construction Office on October 1, 1942, calculated the following times for each inmate:

1. Loosen and put on the edge [of the canal] 1 cubic meter of shovable soil: 0.95 hours
2. Load 1 cubic meter of soil onto a dump truck: 0.84 hours
3. transport 1 cubic meter of soil by dump truck up to a distance of 50 m and tip over: 0.16 hours.

In total: 1.95 hours per cubic meter.¹²⁴

For the 3,960 cubic meters of soil mentioned above, when hypothetically employing the aforementioned 79 detainees for 10 hours a day, these operations, which supposedly started in early May 1944, would have required $(3,960 \text{ m}^3 \times 1.95 \text{ hrs/m}^3 \div [10 \text{ hrs/day} \times 79 \text{ inmates}]) \approx 10$ days. Here, however, a dump truck was envisaged for transporting the soil, while the case narrated by Müller, as I have already pointed out, would have required 112,000 wheelbarrow trips. This means that roughly half the work force would have done nothing else but hauling soil from the pits to wherever it was deposited.

¹²² The Italian wheelbarrow weighed about 32 kg empty and had a capacity of about 0.04 m³ (about 70 kg of clayey earth), resulting in a total weight of over 100 kg; the German wheelbarrow weighed about 53 kg empty and had a capacity of about 0.07 m³ (= ca. 120 kg). Ianino, p. 47.

¹²⁴ RGVA, 502-1-167, p. 74.

Taking this into account basically doubles the time it would have taken to excavate these pits, thus lasting toward the end of May 1944.

Since the first Hungarian Jewish deportees arrived in Auschwitz on May 17, 1944, the timing of the preparations for the alleged extermination is completely upset.

Furthermore, there is not the slightest documentary trace of these gigantic works. In particular, there is no sign in the air photos of the nearly 4,000 cubic meters of excavated soil piled up near the alleged cremation pits.

7.6. The Pit's Structure and the "Recovery of Human Fat"

Among the resistance-propaganda nonsense that Müller retold, the tall tale about the recovery of human fat in the cremation pits is undoubtedly the grossest. Since I have dealt extensively with this topic in a specific article (Mattoigno 2014a), I will repeat here only the essential points.

Müller's related statements are quite lengthy, so I summarize how his imaginary cremation pits were structured. As mentioned earlier, their dimensions were 40-50 m × 8 m × 2 m. From the center, two channels 25-30 centimeters wide which "sloped slightly" ran transversely towards the two edges of the pit and ended in two "collecting pans," one on each side, dug at the bottom of the pit (1979b, pp. 130-132). The arrangement of the pyre was as follows: a layer of "old railway sleepers, wooden beams, planks, and sawdust," covered with dry fir branches, then, above it, a layer of 400 corpses, placed side-by-side in four rows; then two more similar layers, so that the pyre contained 1,200 corpses (1979b, p. 137). The last layer "protruded about half a meter out of the pit," which evidently meant that the pyre rose half a meter above the surrounding terrain (1979a, p. 219; omitted from the English edition; 1979b, p. 137). Cremation lasted five or six hours (1979b, p. 138). The claimed five graves therefore had a cremation capacity of $(1,200 \times 5 =) 6,000$ corpses in five to six hours.

Here Müller imaginatively reworked the fairy tales bandied about already in 1945, expressed by colleague Tauber in the following manner:¹²⁵

"At first wood was placed in the pit, then 400 corpses alternating with branches, they were sprinkled with gasoline and set on fire. Then the remaining corpses [coming] from the gas chambers were thrown into it, from time to time the fat of the corpses was poured back. A pyre burned for about 48 hours."

Müller does not indicate the dimensions of the two fat "collecting pans," so we must turn to the only witness who provides them, precisely Tauber:¹²⁵

¹²⁵ GARF, 7021-108-8, p. 11.

“The pyres for burning the corpses were placed in pits, at the bottom of which, for the entire length of the excavation, there was a channel for the access of air. From this channel, there led a branch to a hole 2 x 2 x 4 m deep.”

With these data, half of the cremation pit was 22.5 meters long (based on the average length of 45 m), 2 meters of which were occupied by the collection pit. If we assume a slope of some 6% for the fat-collection channel,¹²⁶ it descended to a depth of $(20.5 \text{ m} \times 0.06 =)$ approximately 1.2 meters from the bottom of the cremation pit, and the bottom of the fat-collection pit was 2 meters below the pit's bottom, hence 80 cm deep from where the collection channels entered it. I illustrated the structure of a (mirror) half of this pit in DOCUMENT 23.

The average body-fat content in normal men (average weight 70 kg) and women (average weight 60 kg) aged 25, 40 and 55 amounts to approximately 16.8 kg.¹²⁷ The people allegedly gassed, however, came from ghettos or collection camps where food was notoriously scarce. In the Minnesota Starvation Experiment, which was performed between November 1944 and December 1945, 36 volunteers subjected to it lost 67% of their total body fat (Mattoigno/Kues/Graf, p. 1265). For the presumed gassing victims, half of that loss can be assumed, hence a loss of 33.5% of body fat or approximately $(16.8 \text{ kg} \times 0.335 =)$ 5.6 kg, corresponding to $(16.8 - 5.6 =)$ 11.2 kg of remaining body fat. Pressac and van Pelt agreed that the average weight of the claimed gassing victims was 60 kg,¹²⁸ quite in line with the average weight indicated above (65 kg).¹²⁹ This results in a total quantity of fat of $(1,200 \text{ corpses} \times 11.2 \text{ kg/body} =)$ 13,440 kg.

The specific weight of animal fat is 0.903 (Gabba, p. 406), therefore 13,440 kg of fat correspond to approximately 14,880 liters.

In an empty cremation pit, this fat theoretically would have been uniformly distributed at the rate of $(14,880 \text{ L} \div (41 \text{ m}^{130} \times 8 \text{ m})) =$ some 45 liters per square meter, corresponding to a uniform layer of 4.5 centimeters. Due to the viscosity of liquid fat, if such an amount were poured evenly into a concrete container of identical size as the cremation pit here discussed, only a small part of it would flow into the outflow channel, and only if the bottom were slanted on both sides towards the channel.

¹²⁶ For the slope we can take that of the edges of old roads with a parabolic shape to let the rainwater flow off laterally. Their slope ranged from 3% to 6% (Colombo, p. 200). However, liquid fat has a higher viscosity than water. As far as human fat is concerned, it is difficult to find reliable data, but it is known that ox fat, at 100°C, has a viscosity coefficient 17 times higher than that of water at 20°C (Gabba, p. 405). Therefore, even the maximum value of 6% may have been insufficient, which I assume in this hypothetical case (with greater slopes the depth of the collection wells increases in proportion).

¹²⁹ But the value should be lower due to the presumed presence of at least 1/3 of children.

¹³⁰ Pit according to DOCUMENT 21: length 45 meter minus the two side walls $(2 + 2) = 41 \text{ m}$.

But according to Müller, the bottom of the pit was flat, so only that part of the liquid fat which had flowed directly into the channel would have collected in it, i.e. ($41 \text{ m} \times 0.275 \text{ m} \times 45 \text{ l/m}^2 =$) about 507 liters, about 253.5 liters per collecting well. If this measured 2×2 meters, therefore four square meters, the liquid fat would have filled it only up to a height of ($0.2535 \text{ m}^3 \div 4 \text{ m}^2 =$) about 6 centimeters: how then would it have been possible to scoop it out with a bucket?

The dry wood required for the cremation of a 60-kg body amounts to around 160 kg, equivalent to about 304 kg of green wood.¹³¹ Therefore, the fat had to flow through ($1,200 \text{ bodies} \times 160 \text{ kg/body} =$) 192,000 kg of wood and, due to its high viscosity coefficient, would have largely adhered to it, therefore the quantity that would have poured into the two collection wells would have been enormously less than the 507 liters calculated above.

According to the manual of Eng. John H. Perry, the autoignition temperature of pork fat is 343°C (Perry, p. 1584). Other authors speak of a temperature of 355°C (DeHaan/Brien/Large, p. 235). At and above that temperature, fat will ignite by itself and will keep burning without the need for any ignition. But the flash point of fat is actually as low as 184°C (Perry, p. 1584). This means that, at and above this temperature, liquid fat emits vapors in such quantities that its mixture with air ignites in case of an ignition source, such as a spark, embers or an open flame. The autoignition temperature of dry wood, in comparison, is normally around $220\text{--}250^\circ\text{C}$ (Giacalone, p. 1268) or 270°C (Richardson, p. 41). On the other hand, the minimum temperature required to form sufficient combustible gases from a corpse so the corpse actually ignites and burns is about 600°C . Below this temperature, the corpse will only carbonize (Kessler, p. 137). It is therefore impossible that liquid human fat collects at the bottom of a pit filled with a blazing wood fire hot enough to consume corpses. Any fat at the surface of a human corpse placed in a fire will ignite and burn off completely and instantly where it surfaces, without ever having the chance of reaching the bottom of the pit. But even if any drop of fat would ever fall to the bottom – which would be filled with red-hot glowing embers – it would burn off swiftly rather than flow anywhere.

No-less-absurd is Müller's account of how this fat was scooped up by inmates (1979b, p. 136):

“As the heap of bodies settled, no air was able to get in from outside. This meant that we stokers had constantly to pour oil or wood alcohol on the burning corpses, in addition to human fat, large quantities of which had collected and was boiling in the two collecting pans on either side of the pit. The sizzling fat was scooped out with buckets on a long curved rod and poured all over the pit causing flames to leap up amid much crackling and hissing.”

Here the following remarks apply:

¹³¹ Mattogno/Kues/Graf, p. 1291 (in reference to a normal body of 57 kg).

1. Considering that the fire consisted of three superimposed layers of wood and corpses inside a pit two meters deep, it is clear that pouring oil, methanol and human fat onto the pyre's surface would not have solved the problem of the lack of combustion air in the center layer and even less in the bottom layer of the pyre.
2. These fuels would have already ignited on top of the first layer of wood and corpses, without giving a sensible heat input to the interior of the pyre.
3. It must be kept in mind that we are dealing here with a cremation pit of at least 328 m², in which 1,200 corpses with 192 tons of dry wood were burning at a temperature of at least 600°C. How was it possible to get anywhere close enough to the edge of such a pit in order to throw a bucket of fuel into it, which would have caught fire already inside the bucket when merely approaching such an inferno? (This is particularly true for wood alcohol.)
4. The boiling fat was allegedly collected with "a long curved rod"; since the pit was two meters deep, and the collection pit was even deeper (the bucket had to be immersed into the liquid fat), plus adding at least one and a half meters of handle so that a man operating it could do this while standing up, these rods had to be at least 4 meters long. If a bucket full of grease was attached to their end, it could have been lifted out only by holding the rod vertically, as illustrated in DOCUMENT 23. This means that it would have been impossible to lift the bucket up from a distance. In practice, the fat-recovery worker would have remained for a few minutes at the very edge of the collection pit, merely two meters away from an 8-meter-wide wall of blazing flames. He would have been fatally burned.

In summary:

1. The cremation pits did not exist.
2. Even if they had existed, the recovery of human fat would have been impossible.

7.7. Further Cremation-Pit Fantasies

In this context, Müller inserts further fantasies, some plagiarized, some invented by himself.

From Höss's statements he draws two other elements. First of all, with a slight retouch, the duration of the combustion in the pits (ibid., p. 138):

"The process of incineration took five to six hours."

The only experimental data comparable with such an alleged mass cremation result from the burning of animal carcasses during the bovine spongiform encephalopathy epidemic (BSE) that struck England between 1986 and 2001, when in multiple places hundreds of animals were burned together on very long pyres. From the pyres described in detail it appears that the burning capacity of these fires was 8 kg of offal per square meter of fire in one hour (Mattoigno/Kues/Graf, p. 1295). From this it can be deduced that a possible mass cremation of 1,200 corpses (72,000 kg), if considering a surface area of the pyre of $(41 \text{ m}^{132} \times 8 \text{ m} =) 328 \text{ m}^2$, would have required $([72,000 \text{ kg} \div [8 \text{ kg/m}^2 \times 328 \text{ m}^2] =)$ about 27 hours, or more than a day. It is therefore way longer than the five to six hours fantasized by Müller.

Model 4b of the coal-fired Kori Furnace for the destruction of slaughterhouse refuse (animal carcasses), the largest built by that company in the early Twentieth Century, took 13.5 hours to incinerate 900 kg of offal on a grate with the dimension $0.92 \text{ m} \times 2.9 \text{ m} = 2.66$ square meters.¹³³ This corresponds to $[(900 \text{ kg} \div 13.5 \text{ hrs}) \div 2.66 \text{ m}^2 =]$ 25 kg offal per hour and square meter. Müller's cremation pit would have had a capacity of $[(1,200 \times 60 \text{ kg} \div 6 \text{ hrs}) \div (328 \text{ m}^2) =]$ 36.6 kg/hour per square meter, an astounding efficiency for a mere camp-fire-style pyre compared to a high-tech furnace!

Moreover, Tauber mentioned a much-more-realistic cremation duration of 48 hours in his deposition quoted earlier.

Müller also copied the following story from Höss (1979b, p. 137):

"Not infrequently the stoker team was reduced to half its number because fires could not be lit at night on account of black-out regulations."

And here is what Höss wrote about that (Höss 1959, p. 215):

"Because of enemy air attacks, no further cremations were permitted during the night after 1944" (In the original "ab 1944," meaning after the beginning of 1944)

In fact, Auschwitz Garrison Order No. 55 of December 15, 1943 ordained (Frei et al., p. 380):

"As intensified air-raid-protection measures have come into effect for the Auschwitz region, an immediate total blackout is herewith ordered."

This measure was therefore already in place five months prior to the arrival of the Hungarian Jews at Auschwitz, and since December 1943, it was impossible to conduct open-air incineration during the night.

On the other hand, since a cremation as described by Müller would have lasted some 27 hours (or even 48 hours according to Tauber), the fire and the embers would have kept burning and glowing all night long. To follow the just-quoted important garrison order, it would have been necessary to extinguish this huge blaze at sunset using the local fire fighters, only to face the impossible challenge the next morning of having to re-ignite the wet pile of half-burned wood and corpses!

In this context, Müller adds (German edition, 1979a, p. 224):

¹³² Minus the four meters occupied by the two grease-collection wells.

¹³³ Mattoigno/Deana, Vol. I, pp. 314-316; Vol. II, Doc. 260, p. 419.

“Another labor unit, to which I was also assigned several times back then, drove in trucks to the surrounding forests two or three times a week under strict watch in order to fetch fir branches and brushwood.”

The abbreviated English edition states here merely (1979b, p. 139):

“Another team with which I worked was taken by truck to the woods where, under heavy guard, they had to collect fir branches and brushwood.”

But such an activity is purely imaginary. There is not the slightest documentary evidence to support it. Such an idea is also naive, because it assumes that the surrounding woods were under the jurisdiction of the camp authorities, while in fact they were under the jurisdiction of the local forest and timber office (Forst- und Holzwirtschaftsamt). In 1943, there were three auxiliary camps of Auschwitz – Altdorf, Radostowicz and Kobier – that had a forest unit cutting wood under the watch of the forestry office of Pless (Pszczyna).¹³⁴

In January 1943, the Auschwitz Central Construction Office also turned to the forestry and timber office in Breslau for the supply of timber.¹³⁵

Müller also wrote the following insane anecdote, in which the main villain is Moll, as always (German edition, 1979a, pp. 228f.):

“Another way of satisfying his [Moll’s] perverse lust for murder was by killing small children, which he tossed alive into the boiling human fat at the front sides of the pits.”

The English text leaves out the word “perverse” that characterizes the writer of this episode more than anything else (1979b, p. 142):

“Another thing he [Moll] was fond of doing was to kill babies by flinging them live into the boiling human fat on either side of the pits.”

This, too, is an atrocity fable propagated by the Auschwitz resistance movement in various versions from 1943. Here is Jankowski’s version of it. If we follow him, then the gas chambers were used only for groups of deportees of more than 200 people. If there were fewer than 200, they were shot and cremated in the pits.¹³⁶

“It happened that, during the shooting in the pit, some inmates defended themselves, or the children cried, so Oberscharführer Moll threw these living children into the fire of the pits.”

In another study, I document how the black propaganda spread about outdoor cremations of corpses evolved through various stages, passing from the burning of semi-conscious people to people burned alive, in order to finally reach its atrocious climax of living children thrown directly into the fire (Mattogno 2021, Chapter 2.3., pp. 119-217). Müller topped this off by adding “boiling fat” to this tale, thus adding delusion to perversion.

PART 2:

The False Testimonies of Eight More Witnesses

8. The False Testimony of Dov Paisikovic

8.1. The First Deposition (1963)

Dov Paisikovic had his first written statement recorded in Vienna on October 17, 1963, almost twenty years after the alleged events. He had been induced to do so due to the climate that had been established at the time of the Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial, the investigative phase of which was almost over by then. In fact, on October 24, 1963, Paisikovic was interrogated prior to the trial, and not even a year later, on October 8, 1964, he testified in the courtroom at the 98th hearing (Fritz Bauer..., pp. 20933-21049). A few months earlier, however, on August 10, he wrote a long report which was archived by Tadeusz Szymański, back then curator of the Auschwitz Museum.¹³⁷

First of all, I report the complete translation of his first statement, which was published without any commentary in a French translation by Léon Poliakov in 1964 (Poliakov, pp. 159-171). The main points of the other statements will be examined in the context of the critical analysis that follows. And now the text:¹³⁸

“Vienna, October 17, 1963

My name is Dow Paisikovic, born April 1, 1924 in Racowec (CSR), currently living in Chedera, Israel. In May 1944, I was transported to Auschwitz Concentration Camp from Munkacs (ghetto), where I received the Inmate Number A-3076, which was tattooed on my left forearm.

Our transport was subjected to a selection at the ramp. About 60% were selected for the gas chambers, the rest we [sic] came into the camp. My mother and 5 siblings were sent straight to the gas chamber. During the selection we knew what this separation was done for. My father and I came with the other people fit for labor to the Birkenau Camp C [BIIC], where we had to carry stones senselessly.

On the third day, SS Hauptscharführer Moll in civilian clothes, accompanied by other SS men, came to our camp sector, we all had to line up, and Moll chose the strongest of us, exactly 250 men in total. We were led to the vicinity of Crematoria III and IV, where we were received by armed SS. We had to line up, and 100 of our men were counted and led to Crematorium III. The others had to march on to the so-called Bunker V (a farmhouse where gassings were carried out as well). There we were received by SS Hauptscharführer Moll, who had come there on a motorcycle in a white uniform. He received us with the words: 'You will have something to eat here, but you have to work'. We were led to the other side of Bunker V; while we couldn't see anything special on the front of this bunker, we saw on the back what this bunker was used for. There was a mountain of naked corpses there; the corpses were bloated, and we were ordered to drag the corpses to a pit that was about 6 meters wide and 50 meters long and in which there were already burning corpses. We struggled to carry the bodies to the place ordered. But that was too slow for the SS. We were severely beaten, and an SS man ordered us: 'One man drags one corpse.' Since we did not know how to carry out this order, we were beaten again, and then the SS man showed us that we had to grab the corpse with the curvature of a stick by the neck, and pull it over. We had to do this work until 6 p.m. There was a half-hour break at noon. Food was brought to us, but none of us wanted to eat. Then we had to line up again. We were taken to Birkenau Camp Sector d [BIId], Block 13 – an isolated block. That evening, we were tattooed with our inmate numbers.

The next day we had to march out again, the one group of 100 to Crematorium III, and we 150 to Bunker V. Our work remained the same. It stayed that way for eight days. Some of us threw themselves into the fire during these days, because we couldn't take it anymore. If I were to estimate the number of them today, I would put them at 8 – 9. Among them was a rabbi.

Every day an SS guard came with about 5-6 prisoners who had to do the same work at Crematorium I and II, in order to fetch the food there for the Sonderkommando in Camp Sector d. On the eighth evening, the block elder of the Sonderkommando from Block 13 ordered me to go along with the group of inmates with food to Crematorium II, since one inmate from this work unit was not there, and the number of those who marched out had to be the same as those who marched back in. That is how I came to the Sonderkommando in Crematorium I by chance. A unit of 100 prisoners was there, in Crematorium II one of 83. The chief capo for both units (Crematorium I and II) was a Pole with the first name Mietek. In Crematorium I, there were two non-Jewish Russians in the Sonderkommando, and ten non-Jewish Russians in the Sonderkommando Crematorium II. All the others in the two units were Jews mainly from Poland, Czechoslovakia and Hungary, as well as a Dutch Jew.

The Sonderkommandos slept in the crematoria themselves, namely a level above the furnaces.

Our unit, Sonderkommando II, was again divided into day and night shifts of equal strength. In the morning we lined up for roll call in the courtyard, were taken to work, and the night shift was led into the courtyard, counted, and could then go to sleep.

My first job in the unit was as follows: Capo Kaminski, a Jew from Poland, gave me the order to dig a pit about 2 m long, 1 m wide and 1 m deep in the courtyard of Crematorium I. The bones from the crematorium furnaces were then poured into this hole. When this work was done, I was assigned to carry corpses. The gassing usually took about 3 to 4 minutes. Then the ventilation system was turned on for about a quarter of an hour. Then the foreman opened the door to [the] gas chamber – always under the supervision of an SS man, and we had to haul the bodies to the electric elevator. About 15 bodies could be transported with the elevator at the same time. We had to bring the corpses by hand. 6 men were assigned to this work. In most cases, some of those who were lying on the floor next to the door were still alive. The SS man then shot them. From the positions of the corpses, it was usually clear that terrible death throes must have taken place. The bodies were often torn open; it has repeatedly happened that women gave birth in the gas chamber. Usually, there were 3,000 victims in the gas chamber. The room was so crowded that those killed by the gas could not fall down. Clearing 3,000 bodies from the gas chambers took about 6 hours. Since the crematorium's 15 furnaces needed about 12 hours to burn these corpses, they were stacked up in the room in front of the furnaces. Another group of our Sonderkommando did that. When we had cleared the gas chamber downstairs, our group had to clean the gas chamber with two hoses to make room for the next gassing. Then we had to go upstairs to the crematorium furnaces and help bring the bodies to the furnaces. Two groups of inmates, with four men each, had to work on the furnaces as such. One group had 7 furnaces to operate, the other 8. These groups had to push the corpses into the furnaces, and ensure with a long hook that they were properly cremated. Since it was very hot in the furnaces, these groups did not get any other work to do; they could cool off during work breaks. Otherwise, all they had to do was take away the ashes and bones that had fallen through the grate. The ashes were brought to the Vistula River by inmates accompanied by the SS. The transport took place in trucks.

The bodies were consumed within about 4 minutes. While corpses were lying in the fire, other inmates had to shear the hair of the corpses prepared for cremation in front of the furnaces (only for female corpses), and two inmate dentists had to collect gold teeth and gold rings. They did that with pliers. A large window was set into the wall of the vestibule in front of the furnaces. Two or three SS men who were in the room on the other side of the window could constantly monitor our work from there.

If the furnaces could not keep up with the cremation of the corpses, the transports slated for gassing were taken to Bunker V, where gassing was practically unlimited because the corpses were thrown there into the burning pits.

When I had been in Crematorium I for a few days, Mietek became chief capo of the Sonderkommando in Crematoria I and II, Kaminski became capo of the Sonderkommando Crematorium I, and Lemke (I don't know the surname) capo of the Sonderkommando Crematorium II. Kaminski and Lemke were Jews from Bialistock [sic] with the inmate number of the series 83,000. Lemke took me into his command in Crematorium II, where my father was as well. I stayed in this detachment [until] the evacuation (January 18, 1945).

In all Sonderkommandos (at Crematoria I – V and near Bunker V), there were a total of 912 prisoners at the time our group was assigned to replenish this unit. The other prisoners of the Sonderkommando who were already there when our group was assigned to this commando had inmate numbers between 80,000 and 83,000; one group, Jews from Krakow, had inmate numbers of 123,000. I don't know for sure whether the others were selected for the Sonderkommando immediately after they were admitted to the concentration camp or whether they were previously in other units. Individual prisoners had been in the Sonderkommando for a long time: Capo Mietek, who, as far as I can remember, had a number around 5,000, and had been assigned to the Sonderkommando coming from the penal unit; two gold workers – one was called Feldmann and came from Czechoslovakia, I don't remember the name of the other – who had the task of casting the collected gold. (This happened in a special room inside Crematorium II, where all the gold was collected from all crematoria, and cast into large cubes under the supervision of the SS.) Every Friday, the gold was collected by a high-ranking SS officer. Furthermore, the Czech Jew Filip Müller had been in the Sonderkommando as long as Mietek. He came from a Theresienstadt transport, and was able to survive the selections in the Sonderkommando because an SS man who came from the Sudeten area protected him. Müller could have become capo in the Sonderkommando, but he refused to. Furthermore, a Jew from Paris who was called 'Oler' had been in the Sonderkommando already for a long time. He was a painter, and during the time I knew the Sonderkommando, he only painted pictures for SS men. He was exempted from any other work of the Sonderkommando.

We knew that – apart from the exceptions mentioned – the inmates of the former Sonderkommando had been gassed. These gassings were carried out in groups, just as the groups were initially assigned to the Sonderkommando. One group in the Sonderkommando came from the Majdanek Concentration Camp near Lublin. These prisoners were already there in a Sonderkommando that had to do the same kind of work.

Since it was also the task of our unit to search and collect the effects of the gassed people hanging in the dressing rooms, we had the opportunity to get a lot of food, alcohol, gold and foreign currencies. The SS tolerated that we nourished ourselves and drank from this. This way we keep our strength. Nevertheless, every day we fetched the camp soup and the rations from Camp Sector d, so that the connection with Birkenau Camp would not be disrupted. I was mostly with the group that got the food from the camp kitchen in Sector da [BIId]. On that path, we were guarded by an old SS man most of the time who was hard of hearing and was the only one who had never hit us, and who always looked away when something happened that he shouldn't have seen. That way we could throw the bread we had fetched and which we didn't need to the prisoners in other camp sectors who were waiting for it already. Above all, we drank a lot of alcohol. That was a prerequisite for us to be able to carry out our work.

In the Sonderkommando of each crematorium there was a group trying to prepare for resistance. These groups had contact with each other and with resistance groups in Birkenau and also in the Auschwitz Main Camp. I belonged to that movement. We smuggled gold and foreign currencies to our comrades in the camp, who used these valuables to better organize the ability to resist. I remember three brothers from Bialistock who were particularly active in this regard in the Sonderkommando of Crematorium III. The Russians in our unit – they were senior officers – were also very active. From our transport from Hungary, only my father and I knew about this resistance organization. After a certain time, my father was assigned to be the gatekeeper at Crematorium II. Our transport was the third in a long line of transports of Jews from Hungary. (Back then, the Carpathian Ukraine, from which I come, was a part of Hungary.)

During this time, there were daily transports from Hungary, in between also transports from other countries and Muselmen [emaciated inmates] from the camp. There was rarely a day when no gassing took place. Then we had to clean the whole crematorium. Because the SS gave us orders to prepare (firing up the furnaces, etc.), we always knew when a transport was expected. After the end of the major Hungarian transports, the next major campaign was transports from the Lodz Ghetto. Every day, two such transports came from Lodz – as I remember in August 1944.

When the so-called Hungary Action was over, the Hungarian Jews who had been assigned to the Sonderkommando at the time were liquidated. My father and I escaped this extermination operation only because we were assigned to Sonderkommando II; the others from our transport were at Bunker V and Crematoria III and IV. The inmates were brought to the Auschwitz Main Camp, where they were gassed. The corpses were brought to Crematorium II during the night, and were burned by the SS themselves, while our entire unit was not allowed to leave the room. We recognized this from the fact that we had to take away the inmate's clothes. We knew the clothes and the inmate numbers. After the Łódź extermination action, inmates of the Sonderkommando were again liquidated, most of those who had to work at Bunker V, and a smaller part of the Sonderkommando Crematorium III and IV. The extermination process was the same. These were about 200 inmates in total. During the entire time that I was in the Sonderkommando (from May 1944 until the evacuation in January 1945), no new prisoners joined the Sonderkommando.

The crematoria were built so solidly that I am not aware of any failure of furnaces or entire crematoria during my time there. The corpse elevator failed several times, because the load was very high. SS officers from the construction office were in the crematoria frequently for inspections.

A Hungarian prisoner doctor had to carry out dissections in a room. This was done under the supervision of an SS doctor whose name I no longer remember. There was a dissecting table in this room. Above all, malformed people (e.g. hunchbacks) and twins were dissected. I remember with certainty that the physician Dr. Schumann was present at dissections as well and supervised them. The inmates selected by the SS for dissections were not murdered in the gas chambers but by injections. Blood and various organs were also taken from such inmates, which were to be delivered to field hospitals.

We had been planning an uprising for a long time. The center of this organization was in our Crematorium II. The Russians were in charge, as were the capos Kaminski and Lemke. When the extermination operations were stopped entirely in the autumn of 1944 on orders from Berlin, and we were given the task of covering up the traces of the extermination operations, it was clear to us that our extermination was approaching. Our uprising should preempt this. The plan was that, on a day when no transport came and therefore there was no SS reinforcement at the crematoria, our group – which regularly fetched the food from Camp Sector da [BIId] and brought it to the Sonderkommandos in the various crematoria – brought cans of gasoline to the individual crematoria instead of the camp soup. Only Crematorium I should not be supplied with gasoline, since they did not need it there. At that time, there was no longer a Sonderkommando at Bunker V, as the extermination work had already been stopped completely there. The gasoline was prepared by the resistance organization in Camp Sector d. On a Sunday at the beginning of October – I think it was October 6th or 7th – the uprising was supposed to take place. On that day, the inmates who were assigned to fetch food were chosen in such a way that only those who had been informed of the plan were included – they all came from Crematorium II. I was among them, too. We delivered the gasoline cans disguised as soup to Crematoria IV and III, and when we passed by Canada to our Crematorium II, we heard gunfire from the direction of Crematoria III and IV, and saw fire. The plan had been for the uprising to begin by lighting a fire in our Crematorium II. Due to the early start, this plan was foiled. The SS immediately gave the alarm, and all inmates from the Sonderkommando in Crematorium II had to line up. SS Oberscharführer Steinberg, who was the boss of Crematorium II, counted us, and when he realized that the number was correct, we all were locked up in the dissection room. Crematorium III was on fire, and the prisoners of the Sonderkommandos Crematorium III and IV cut the [fence] wires and fled, if they had not been shot on the spot. In Crematorium I, the prisoners of the Sonderkommando also cut the electrically charged fencing with prepared insulated scissors and fled. It was planned that the wire fencing of the women's camp should also be cut in order to enable a mass escape there as well. Due to the premature outbreak of the uprising, however, this was no longer possible. The SS managed to capture all fugitives. In the evening of that day, a group of SS officers came to our crematorium and demanded that 20 men step forward to start working. Since, despite all assurances to the contrary, we were of the opinion that they wanted to divide us up into groups and thus liquidate us more easily, we refused to leave the dissecting room. Then the SS called in reinforcements, and force 20 prisoners to work. We soon saw that smoke was rising from Crematorium I. So, we knew that these 20 comrades had actually been brought to work. Their job was to cremate the corpses of those shot while trying to escape. This way, all prisoners of the Sonderkommando of Crematoria I, III and IV were murdered. From our unit in Crematorium II, only one inmate was murdered who had slashed an SS man's bicycle tire so that he could not use his bicycle. The SS man – he was called the 'Red' – beat this prisoner to death.

From this point on, Crematoria I, III and IV were closed. Crematoria III and IV were wrecked and had become unusable due to the uprising; Crematorium I was undamaged. No gassings occurred in any crematorium anymore. We had to burn the corpses that came from the camp; smaller groups of inmates and civilians destined for death were shot in our crematorium from that time on. These shootings took place upstairs, and were usually carried out by an SS Unterscharführer Holländer with a silencer rifle and a shot in the nape of the neck. Holländer was known to us beforehand because of his particular cruelty. He beat those who were supposed to be gassed, threw children against the wall, etc. The Holländer were always friendly to us inmates of the Sonderkommando. Holländer was about medium height, skinny, had an elongated face, brownish hair, and was probably from the area near Yugoslavia. He was about 32 years old.

82 inmates of the Sonderkommando – we from the Sonderkommando Krematorium II – lived until the evacuation from Auschwitz. During the evacuation on January 18, 1945, the SS was already disorganized. We took advantage of this and walked to Camp d. When we were running there, many of us were shot; how many I don't know because I hurried to get to the camp. All prisoners from Camp Sector d were brought to the Auschwitz Main Camp. During the night, the SS looked for the inmates there – those who worked in the crematoria and knew us from the Sonderkommando – those inmates who were from the Sonderkommando. Of course, none of us stepped forward. Whoever they discovered was shot on the spot. My father and I hid underneath a bed. Otherwise, I only know that Filip Müller and Bernhard Sakal (who now lives in Israel and comes from Bialistock) were also able to save themselves.

In Sonderkommando II there was also a certain Leon the cook, a Polish Jew who had lived in Paris. He was exempted from the general work of the Sonderkommando, as he had to cook for the SS. Only when there was a lot of work did he have to work on the corpses, like all of us. We were very good friends, and that is how I found out that Leon was already making notes when I came to the Sonderkommando. He kept a kind of diary and recorded the crimes of the SS and the names of individual SS criminals. He also collected documents, plans, etc. that were found in the effects of the murdered and seemed important to him. None of us read these notes, but I knew about them. On the Wednesday before the uprising, I buried all these documents in a place that I carefully memorized. The papers were in a large glass container (about 3 liters capacity) that was greased and hermetically sealed. Then we put this glass container in a concrete box that we had cast. The inside of the concrete box was lubricated with grease, the box was concreted over. We also added hair from corpses, teeth, etc., but basically not an object of value, so that someone who later finds this box does not loot it because of such valuables. The Rabbi von Maków and Salmen Rosenthal [sic] also made notes that were buried elsewhere. I do not know the place where they buried the documents.

Finally, I want to describe the procedure of a gassing operation. We saw from the windows how the arriving transports were selected at the ramp. Those who were selected for labor were led through between Camp Sectors c and d, those destined for gassing were led to the FKL [women's concentration camp]. Those of them who could walk were led to the crematoria (or Bunker V) where this transport was supposed to be murdered. Those who could not walk were loaded onto trucks and taken to the same crematorium. There the truck was tipped, and the sick people were thrown down. An ambulance with the Red Cross brought the gas cans to the crematorium. Everyone was taken to the undressing room, and the SS ordered them to undress. They were told to wash themselves. There was a number on each coat hook, and they were impressed upon to remember the number. Anyone who still had parcels with them had to put them down in front of the undressing room. Cars then carried this luggage to Canada. The women with the children always came first. When they had undressed, the SS led them into the gas chamber. They were told to wait for the water to come. Then the men had to undress and also go into the gas chamber. Everyone had to tie their shoes together and take them along. Before everyone got into the gas chamber, they had to hand over their shoes to two inmates in the corner. Most of them didn't know what was happening to them. Sometimes they did know what their fate was, however. These often prayed. We were forbidden to talk to the transports. As soon as the women were undressed and in the gas chamber, a unit of ours had to carry the clothes out and take them to Canada in trucks; the men found an empty, clean undressing room. For those who could not undress themselves, inmates of our unit had to help get undressed. There was always an SS man with two prisoners. Only those inmates were assigned to this work who the SS considered particularly reliable. Several SS officers were also present at every gassing operation. In our crematorium, the gas was thrown in either by Holländer or the 'Red' – who took turns with each shift. When doing this, they wore gas masks. The gas often did not arrive on time. Then the victims had to wait a long time in the gas chamber. You could hear them screaming from far away. The gassing process took much longer if the gas chamber was not completely filled. There were also often particularly sadistic excesses on the part of the SS. For example, children were shot in the arms of their mothers while still in front of the gas chamber, or they were thrown against the wall. If one of those who arrived said a word against the SS, he was shot on the spot in front of everyone else. Usually, such excesses occurred when senior officers were present. If the gas chamber was overcrowded, children who could no longer get inside were often thrown over the heads of those standing inside. SS men did that. As a result of the overcrowding, victims were often trampled to death in the gas chamber before they were gassed. We have been told repeatedly by the SS that they will not leave any witnesses.

This description corresponds completely to the truth and is made to the best of my knowledge and conscience.

8.2. Arrival at Birkenau and Assignment to the “Sonderkommando”

Paisikovic was deported from the Munkács Ghetto in May 1944 with a transport of 3,000 people, which “was the third in a long line of transports of Jews from Hungary,” and on the third day he was registered with Inmate Number A-3076. However, this fact is in conflict with Danuta Czech’s data, according to which the numbers A-2846 to A-3095 were assigned to 250 deportees from the Dutch camp of Westerbork (Czech 1990, p. 630). The “List of Jewish Transports,” which is Czech’s primary source, contains a strange omission precisely for the aforementioned numbers, which means that we actually don’t know who received these numbers.¹³⁹ Czech assigned them to the transport that left Westerbork on May 19, 1944 with 453 deportees,¹⁴⁰ because in the aforementioned list, the arrival of 100 detainees from Westerbork is recorded for May 21, who were registered with the numbers A-5242 through A-5341.¹⁴¹ Czech’s assumption is obviously wrong and even arbitrary, because for the five transports of male deportees which arrived from May 19 to 21, the list does not indicate the origin of these transports.

The omission mentioned above, however, concerns the May 21, when the numbers A-2546 to A-2845 and A-3096 to A-3099 were assigned, while the numbers A-2846 to A-3095 are simply missing. The number A-3076 was therefore assigned on May 21, but Paisikovic had arrived in Auschwitz three days earlier, therefore on May 18. In May 1944, transports left the Munkács Ghetto on May 14, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20 and 21 (Braham 1981, p. 514). Since the journey lasted 2 to 3 days, Paisikovic’s transport was most-likely that of May 16. He worked at “Bunker V” or “Bunker 5” for eight days, or, contradictorily, for two weeks,¹⁴² therefore from May 21 to May 28 or June 3, so the alleged events he describes refer to exactly the same period as given by Müller.

The curious thing is that Paisikovic mentioned Müller – in not-very-flattering terms – while Müller never mentioned Paisikovic.

In the Vienna statement, the latter declared:

“Furthermore, the Czech Jew Filip Müller had been in the Sonderkommando as long as Mietek. He came from a Theresienstadt transport, and was able to survive the selections in the Sonderkommando because an SS man who came from the Sudeten area protected him. Müller could have become capo in the Sonderkommando, but he refused to.”

Subsequently he spoke again of Müller, but in an increasingly laconic way. At the Auschwitz trial he said (Fritz Bauer..., pp. 20976f.):

“Presiding Judge: [...] Did you also meet Filip Müller at this ‘Sonderkommando’?”

Witness Dov Paisikovic: Yes.

Presiding Judge: And when was he there?

Witness Dov Paisikovic: In the summer.

Presiding Judge: Nineteen hundred?

Witness Dov Paisikovic: 44.”

The statement for the Auschwitz Museum also contains a fleeting hint: “the Slovak Filip Miller or Müller worked in the cremation of corpses” (p. 98).

8.3. “Bunker V”

In his statement for the Auschwitz Museum, Paisikovic dwelt extensively on “Bunker 5.” In another study dedicated to this alleged gassing installation, I found that none of the witnesses who spoke about it could explain the change in its designation, from “Bunker 2” to “Bunker V” or “Bunker 5,” but neither can orthodox historians (Mattogno 2016b, pp. 112). Piper, for example, completely ignores it: for him, “Bunker 2 functioned until the autumn of 1944” (Piper 2000, p. 143), and he always keeps this name. In this regard, Paisikovic limited himself to stating (p. 90):

“I don’t know why this was called “Bunker 5” and if there was any other lower or higher number.”

Müller was even more laconic: according to him, in May 1944, “Bunker II, now called Bunker V,” was put back into operation.¹⁴³

The origin of this term fully confirms its fable-like character: According to one of the many fictions concocted by the resistance, Crematoria IV and V were each equipped with four “gas chambers” senselessly¹⁴⁴ called “Bunker I, Bunker II, Bunker III, Bunker IV.” Logically, the next such facility could only be called “Bunker V,” which was initially referring to an outdoor-cremation fire, then to a presumed gassing installation (Mattogno 2020b, pp. 225-229). Even Dragon, speaking of Crematoria IV and V, asserted that “undressing rooms and gassing chambers /Bunker/ [komory do gazowania /bunkry/] were ¹⁴³ Müller 1979a, p. 197; the sanitized English edition hides this switch of names by only saying “the whitewashed farmhouse [...] which was now called Bunker V”; 1979b, p. 124.

¹⁴⁴ These “gas chambers” were on the ground floor of very insubstantial buildings, so it was absurd to call them “bunker”; this is obviously also true for the “peasant house” allegedly transformed into a homicidal gassing facility.

at the ground level.”¹⁴⁵ Mandelbaum instead attributed the term to the alleged gas chambers of Crematoria II/III (see Subchapter 10.4.).

Paisikovic provided a detailed description of that claimed facility illustrated by four drawings, which I published and analyzed in another study (Mattoigno 2016b, Docs. 15f., pp. 228f.):

“It was a farmhouse consisting of 3 rooms. As we approached the house, I saw three windows and three doors. The doors were very strong and had bolts, which attracted my attention, and they had nothing in common with the normal doors of a farmhouse. The house was thatched with straw. On the other side of the house there were doors as well. As far as I can remember there were also three doors on that side. The rooms had a concrete floor. When I was made to stop – just like the others – in front of that house, a Hauptscharführer arrived – I later learned that his name was Moll. He moved around on a heavy motorcycle. Moll told us in no uncertain terms that we had to work here, but would also get food. Moll took us to the back of the house, where we saw the hell of Auschwitz that no normal human being could imagine: there was an enormous pile of corpses stacked up like hay.

Moll started to scream at us to get us to work. He told us to take the corpses from the pile to a trench that had already been dug. Four of us took one corpse, two by the arms and two by the legs. When we came near the trench, which was 30 meters long and 10 meters wide, we noticed that on the bottom there was wood, logs. Near us I saw another trench that was already on fire; the one to which we were taking the corpses had just been dug. At that moment an SS man pounced on us and started to hit us, yelling that each of us should take one corpse. He showed us many walking sticks with the handle bent into an arc and showed us how we should work: he put the curved part under the neck of a corpse and dragged it across the ground behind his back. We now had to do the work like that.” (pp. 87f.)

As noted earlier, the air photos of Birkenau showing the area of the alleged “Bunker V,” in particular those of May 31, 1944, do not show any cremation pits, nor any trace of excavated earth, nor of crowds of people or mountains of corpses; no trucks, no firewood piled up, no signs of activity of any kind, in particular no smoke at all; on the contrary, the access road to the small house renamed “Bunker V,” at the point where it entered the courtyard, was blocked by a thick hedge (Mattoigno 2016a, Docs. 20, 22, pp. 164, 166).

Paisikovic’s statements are therefore blatant lies. Furthermore, his description is in stark contrast to Müller’s, which refers to the same period.

Müller in fact states that “Bunker V” had four “gas chambers” and four cremation pits (Müller 1979b, p. 143) of 40-50 m × 8 m; for Paisikovic, however, there were three “gas chambers” and two cremation pits measuring 30 m × 10 m, or 30 m × 6 m.

¹⁴⁵ AGK, NTN, 93, Vol. 11, p. 107.

Müller also mentions “three wooden barracks” which presumably served as undressing rooms for the victims (ibid., p. 133), although he does not indicate their location, but which were to be found where three parallel rectangles cleared of vegetation can be seen in the air photos of May 31, about 50-100 meters south of the presumed “Bunker V” (Mattoigno 2016a, Doc. 20, p. 164).

Paisikovic did not mention these buildings. For him, “the SS led people into the rooms of the little house. 300 people entered at a time and for this reason there were about 8-10 SS.” The rest of the transport waited 700 meters away from the “Bunker,” to prevent them from hearing the screams of those being gassed (pp. 89f.). This is in total contradiction to what is professed to by the Auschwitz Museum: there were four gas chambers, their capacity was 1,200 people, and the victims undressed in three special barracks (Piper 2000, pp. 137, 139).

The question of the “Sonderkommando” of “Bunker V” is far from clear either. On May 21, 1944, the group of 150 inmates to which Paisikovic belonged was sent there; at that time, this facility was already in operation, and there were already two pits, one was burning, the other had just been excavated. It is evident that “Bunker V” could not function without an adequate “Sonderkommando” already at work, but if there was already a group, then why were these 150 inmates sent there?

As I have shown earlier, the staff of Crematoria IV and V basically consisted of the same number of inmates (118 and 119 inmates, respectively), which means that they performed symmetrical duties; therefore, sending a group of inmates from Crematorium V to “Bunker V” would not have made sense. Furthermore, this inmate unit would have received a specific denomination – such as the “wood unloaders” for Crematoria II, III and V, who officially constituted a unit called “Kommando 61-B Holzabblader”¹⁴⁶ – but there is no documentary trace of it.

The claimed organization of the extermination was not exactly the peak of rationality and efficiency. The first group of 300 people was ushered into “Bunker V,” while the others waited about 700 meters away; then, from time to time, each successive group had to travel this distance in the middle of the meadows. “Bunker V” was in fact located about 200 meters west of the western fence of the Birkenau Camp, so the place where these victims had to wait must have been somewhere in the middle of the meadows and/or woods that extended to the west, somewhere between the camp and the Vistula River. The alleged transport system of corpses is nothing short of insane: an inmate had to grab the neck of a corpse with the hook of a walking stick, and thus had to drag it over the ground to the pits!

¹⁴⁶ This Kommando appears already in the labor-deployment report (Arbeitseinsatzbericht) of July 28, 1944. APMO, D-AuI-3a/1a, p. 18.

8.4. The Gassings in Crematoria II/III

After working for eight days (or maybe two weeks) at “Bunker V,” Paisikovic was sent to Crematorium II, where he stayed for a week,¹⁴⁷ then he was transferred to Crematorium III, where he remained until the evacuation of Auschwitz. The witness’s statements on the gassings are confusing and contradictory.

First of all, what was the capacity of the gas chamber? In the Vienna statement, he stated in this regard:

“Usually, there were 3,000 victims in the gas chamber. The room was so crowded that those killed by the gas could not fall down.”

Ignoring the foolish claim that the corpses remained standing, it should be noted that, during his interrogation at the Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial, the witness stated something quite different. I quote the related exchange (Fritz Bauer..., pp. 20958f.):

“Presiding Judge: [...] So, roughly how many people were led there into the gas chamber?”

Witness Dov Paisikovic: About 3,000.

Presiding Judge: Into a gas chamber?”

Witness Dov Paisikovic: Yes.

Presiding Judge: All at once?”

Witness Dov Paisikovic: What does ‘all at once’ mean?”

Presiding Judge: Well, were they led in together or in different batches?”

Witness Dov Paisikovic: No, no, no. Not together.

Presiding Judge: Not together?”

Witness Dov Paisikovic: No.

Presiding Judge: How many went in at once?”

Witness Dov Paisikovic: About such a [crowd] went in at one time.

Presiding Judge: 3,000 at Witness Dov Paisikovic [interrupts]: But people didn’t go in there at once. The undressing room couldn’t hold that many at once. One always undressed [them] there.”

Regarding the undressing room, in his statement to the Auschwitz Museum, Paisikovic said that it had “about 500 numbered hooks [coat hangers]” (“około 500 numerowanych haków”; p. 91), which should mean that it could contain or was in fact arranged for 500 people.

Morgue #2, the alleged undressing room, measured 49.49 m × 7.93 m, hence ca. 392.5 m², but it had 11 concrete columns of 0.4 m × 0.4 m (ca. 1.8 m²), thus reducing the usable surface to just under 391 m². Therefore, each of the 500 people would have had (391÷500=) about 0.8 m² available to undress, ¹⁴⁷ APMO, Zespół Oświadczenia, Vol. 44, p. 93: “I worked briefly in Crematorium I – only for one week” (“Na terenie krematorium I pracowałem krótko – tylko 1 tydzień”).

just enough space. If then, as in the related drawing by Olère (Olère, p. 52), there were also benches in the room, the space would have been even less.

This is evidently in contrast to batches of 2,000-3,000 people at a time in the undressing room and gas chamber as claimed by Nyiszli, Müller and Mandelbaum (see Chapter 10), among others.

In the final part of the Vienna statement, Paisikovic further specifies this alleged practice:

“The women with the children always came first. When they had undressed, the SS led them into the gas chamber. They were told to wait for the water to come. Then the men had to undress and also go into the gas chamber. Everyone had to tie their shoes together and take them along. Before everyone got into the gas chamber, they had to hand over their shoes to two inmates in the corner. Most of them didn’t know what was happening to them. Sometimes they did know what their fate was, however. These often prayed. We were forbidden to talk to the transports. As soon as the women were undressed and in the gas chamber, a unit of ours had to carry the clothes out and take them to Canada in trucks; the men found an empty, clean undressing room.”

From this it follows that the men, since they found the undressing room empty and clean, entered it after the gassing of the women and children had already ended. In fact, he specified:

“When we had cleared the gas chamber downstairs, our group had to clean the gas chamber with two hoses to make room for the next gassing.”

It would not have made much sense to clean the undressing room and leave the gas chamber dirty, so in the aforementioned context it must be understood that the men entered a clean undressing room and a clean gas chamber, therefore after the gassing of women and children, and after the removal of their corpses from the gas chamber. On the other hand, Paisikovic’s statement during the Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial was the answer to the question “So, roughly how many people were led there into the gas chamber?” – hence the “gas chamber,” not the “undressing room.”

But in the Vienna statement, Paisikovic reiterates that the 3,000 victims entered the gas chamber all together, since “Clearing 3,000 bodies from the gas chambers took about 6 hours.” In further contradiction to this, we read in his statement for the Auschwitz Museum (p. 91):

“About 2,000 people [około 2 tysięcy osób] were crammed into the gas chamber.”

The idea of handing over the shoes in tied-up pairs to two inmates near the entrance to the gas chamber does not indicate any particular acumen, because in a short time the two unfortunates would have been overwhelmed by 500 or 2,000 or 3,000 pairs of shoes, respectively. Undoubtedly it would have been more reasonable to have the victims leave them in the undressing room, as the orthodox version has it.

During the Frankfurt Auschwitz trial, Paisikovic asserted that it took two hours to fill the gas chamber (Fritz Bauer..., p. 20959). If we are inclined to interpret this charitably, we would have to assume that all 3,000 victims were put into the gas chamber at once, because if they had been dispatched in batches of 500, just the step of filling the chamber with the six batches to get to 3,000 would have taken twelve hours. Then add to this six batches of gassing and ventilation –

“The gassing usually took about 3 to 4 minutes. Then the ventilation system was turned on for about a quarter of an hour.”

– plus the just-mentioned six hours for clearing the chamber. Had they been murdered in batches of 500, the whole operation would have lasted ($6 \times [120 + 4 + 15 + 360] = 2,994$ min) some 50 hours, or two days, with no one ever sleeping or taking a break!

On this point, Paisikovic stated the following during the Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial (Fritz Bauer..., p. 20964):

“Presiding Judge: And what was that approximately, the longer time? In the extreme.

Witness Dov Paisikovic: Longer time – it could also [take] up to 20 minutes.

Presiding Judge: And the shorter time?

Witness Dov Paisikovic: Shorter time – five, six, seven minutes.”

Hence, the normal gassing time – 3-4 minutes – was shorter than the shortest time (5-7 minutes)!

Paisikovic, like Müller, knew nothing about the ventilation system of Morgue #1 and, just like Müller, spoke of fans installed in the walls of the room. In the Frankfurt deposition on this matter, Paisikovic stated (Fritz Bauer..., pp. 20961f.):

“Witness Dov Paisikovic: No, there was a vent there with [unintelligible]

Presiding Judge [interrupts]: Vent with an electric

Interpreter Grünblatt [interrupts]: Electric ventilator.

Witness Dov Paisikovic: No, no, no. Not ventilator.

Interpreter Grünblatt: No?

Witness Dov Paisikovic: That [was] in the walls. There was no ventilator on the outside.

Interpreter Grünblatt: But?

Witness Dov Paisikovic: There was none in the thing, only in the walls. Here on the sides of the walls were the ventilators.

Interpreter Grünblatt: The ventilators were built into the side walls of the gas chamber.”

In his statement for the Auschwitz Museum, Paisikovic specified:

“In the center of the chamber there were 3 or 4 cement columns [słupy betonowe]. There were showers fixed to the ceiling, most of which were installed near the walls, and there were fewer in the center of the ceiling. On the side walls, on both sides, there were ventilators [były wentylatory], by means of which the gas was removed from the chamber after the gassing of the people. By means of these ventilators, fresh air was introduced into the chamber, which made possible the further work of the Sonderkommando inmates.”

If the fans brought in fresh air, they cannot have at once removed the gas, but obviously both air intake and removal were required for any ventilation system to work.

This nonsense of the ventilators being installed in the walls may have been inspired by the stories spread by the camp’s resistance movement involving the two fans (one for air intake, the other for extraction) installed in the outer walls of the fumigation gas chambers of the two Birkenau delousing facilities (Buildings 5a and 5b), or maybe also the fan in the wall of Block 3 of the Auschwitz Main Camp, of which I have published photographs (Mattoigno 2016b, Photos 1-3, pp. 240f.).

Paisikovic did not know anything about the alleged Zyklon-B-introduction system either, and related an extremely imaginative story about it (p. 91):

“There was a net around the internal columns [wokół słupów wewnętrznych] that were in the gas chamber. The Cyklon poured in from the outside behind this net spread over a large surface, and also people could not get to it, because the dense net protected it enough. After closing the chamber that I mentioned above, an SS man with a gas mask went to the concrete platform – the ceiling of the chamber – and poured a can of Cyklon from the outside into each of the two openings [do dwu otworów po jednej puszcze cyklonu]. I saw him repeatedly [wielokrotnie].”

These are the “cement columns” mentioned above, hence the pillars of reinforced concrete that supported the ceiling. There were seven of these in Morgue #1, equidistant, along the entire length of the room, and not just two of them. These massive columns, therefore, were surrounded by a wire mesh, and the Zyklon was poured from above between the column and the mesh!

It will be recalled that for Müller the related devices were made up of hollow sheet-metal columns, perforated at regular intervals, with a spiral inside. And the beauty of it all is that they both claim to have worked at the same period of time in Crematoria II and III and had “seen” these devices!

As for the number of alleged Zyklon-B-introduction devices, Müller was cautiously silent. Paisikovic explicitly said that there were just two of them, and that a can of Zyklon B was poured into each. It is worth remembering that the orthodox narrative claims that there were four of these devices.

Considering the conditions described by the witness (just two cans of Zyklon B!), the claimed duration of the presumed gassing of merely 3-4 minutes is absurd; that of 20 minutes is a little less absurd, even with four cans of Zyklon B. The actual quantity needed would have been enormously greater, in the first case on the order of 64 one-kg cans.¹⁴⁸

I noted earlier that Danuta Czech claims that the alleged gassing of the Jews from Theresienstadt lodged in the Birkenau Family Camp occurred on March 8, 1944 in Crematoria II and III, and that Müller claimed to have been an eyewitness of it. Here are Paisikovic's pertinent statements at the Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial (Fritz Bauer..., p. 21001):

“Associate Prosecutor Ormond: Witness, do you know in which crematorium the Czech family camp was gassed? In which gas chamber?”

Witness Dov Paisikovic: I don't remember that exactly. But I think in Crematorium III, IV [=IV+V].

Associate Prosecutor Ormond: Do you know anything about how this unfolded?

Witness Dov Paisikovic: That [was] brought there with machines. I didn't see it, just heard about it.”

Keep in mind that Paisikovic claims to have worked in Crematorium III at that time.

The alleged gassing of the Gypsy Camp is said to have occurred on August 2, 1944 and involved 2,897 people (Czech 1990, p. 677). Müller, who takes up the figure of 3,000 victims mentioned by Jankowski, relates that some of them were transported by trucks to Crematorium V and explains:¹⁴⁹

“These people were also directed into the changing room, while the trucks went away again. The process was repeated two or three times more, until towards midnight over 1,000 people were in the changing room of crematorium 5. The rest had been put in crematorium 3 [recte: 2].”

Therefore, about 1,000 Gypsies were gassed in Crematorium V, and some 2,000 in Crematorium II. And here is Paisikovic's pertinent testimony at the Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial (Fritz Bauer..., p. 21002):

“Associate Prosecutor Ormond: Do you know anything about the gassing of the gypsy camp?”

Witness Dov Paisikovic: Yes, that was the same ‘action’. They were gassed in III, IV [=IV+V]. That's for sure.

Associate Prosecutor Ormond: So not with you, where you worked there.

Witness Dov Paisikovic: We had a part of them, but very few.”

Jankowski related the alleged extermination of the 3,000 Gypsies of Birkenau in these terms: the camp administration first asked for skilled volunteers to be transferred to another camp, and those who volunteered were sent to the ¹⁴⁸ Rudolf 2020, Chapter 7, “Zyklon B for Killing of Human Beings,” pp. 227-298.

¹⁴⁹ Müller 1979b, p. 150. The German original has here: “The rest was brought to Crematorium II” rather than III; 1979a, p. 241.

Auschwitz Main Camp. A few days later, the Gypsies remaining in Birkenau were taken to Crematorium V.¹⁵⁰

“At the same time, the Gypsies who had been brought to Auschwitz a few days earlier were sent back to the same crematorium, and all together, after having undressed, were crammed into the crematorium halls [do sal krematoryjnych], where they were gassed, and then they were burned in the pits near this crematorium, because this same Crematorium V, at that time, was inactive as regards cremation. I personally witnessed this gassing along with other members of the Sonderkommando.”

It is a documented fact that the Gypsies who had been selected as fit for labor – altogether 1,408 people – were actually transferred to other camps, namely 918 men to Buchenwald and 490 men to an unknown camp (Mattogno 2016, pp. 167-172), but Jankowski was an “eyewitness” to their transport to Crematorium V and even to their gassing.

The gassing of the Gypsies therefore took place exclusively in Crematorium V, and at the same time in Crematoria V and II (Müller) and in Crematoria IV and V, but with “very few” in Crematorium III!

8.5. The Cremations in Crematoria II/III

After the alleged gassing, “the ventilation system was turned on for about a quarter of an hour.” In his statement to the Auschwitz Museum, Paisikovic thought it best to double this time (p. 102):

“The ventilation – extracting the gas from the gas chamber lasted at least 30 minutes [najmniej 30 minut].”

This was done through the non-existent ventilators installed in the gas-chamber walls. As explained earlier, with 3,000 corpses jam-packing the room, extracting the toxic fumes would have been physically impossible.

Then a team of six inmates dragged 3,000 corpses within six hours from the gas chamber to the freight elevator, onto which 15 corpses were loaded at a time. In the statement for the Auschwitz Museum, this figure is a little lower (p. 92):

“The load of the corpses in the elevator, depending on their weight, was 10-12 corpses.”

In Paisikovic’s perspective, each of the six inmates mentioned above would have had to haul 500 corpses or ($500 \times 60 \text{ kg} =$) some 30 tons to the elevator, which corresponds to about 43 seconds per body, for six hours continuously, without a minute of rest – a truly exceptional athletic performance!

The freight elevator would have made ($3,000 \div 12 =$) 250 trips upstairs with 12 corpses each, then 250 trips downstairs empty. When describing the tasks of the “Sonderkommando” inmates of Crematorium III in his statement for the Auschwitz Museum, Paisikovic spoke of “2 inmates at the crane [sic]” (“przy dźwigu 2 więźniów”; p. 110), each of whom would therefore have had to handle 1,500 corpses, or 90 tons, with just 24 seconds to handle each corpse! One round trip of the elevator, including loading and unloading, would have taken only about one and a half minutes, if it was perfectly orchestrated, and if there weren’t any problems. However, “The corpse elevator failed several times, because the load was very high.”

It is a fact, however, that Crematorium II was equipped only with a make-shift freight elevator which had a capacity of only 300 kg (Mattogno 2019, pp. 47-51), that is five corpses of 60 kg. This would result in $(3,000 \div 5 =)$ 600 round trips. Even assuming that all the necessary operations (loading, ascending, unloading, descending) lasted only two minutes, transporting 3,000 corpses would have taken 1,200 minutes, or 20 hours, not just 6.

What Paisikovic says about the cremation of corpses can only be described as delusional. With reference to the 3,000 corpses mentioned above, he states:

“Since the crematorium’s 15 furnaces needed about 12 hours to burn these corpses, they were stacked up in the room in front of the furnaces. Another group of our Sonderkommando did that. When we had cleared the gas chamber downstairs, our group had to clean the gas chamber with two hoses to make room for the next gassing. Then we had to go upstairs to the crematorium furnaces and help bring the bodies to the furnaces.” (Emphases added)

From this it follows that:

1. The five triple-muffle furnaces cremated 6,000 corpses in 24 hours, or 4.2 minutes per corpse;
2. at least two gassings a day of 3,000 people were carried out in that crematorium.

In contradiction to this, in the statement for the Auschwitz Museum, the witness claimed (p. 102):

“The cremation of all the bodies of one gassing – up to 2,000 people – in the furnaces of Crematorium II lasted at least 15 hours.”

This amounts to 8.9 minutes per corpse. During the Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial, the witness declared the following under oath (Fritz Bauer..., pp. 21002f.):

“Associate Prosecutor Ormond: Witness, in Crematoria I and II [=II+III], how many corpses could be cremated at the same time?

Presiding Judge: The witness said 3,000 in a gas chamber.

Associate Prosecutor Ormond [interrupts]: Yes, gassed.

Interpreter Grünblatt: Gassed.

Presiding Judge: Yes.

Associate Prosecutor Ormond: And how many gassed corpses could be burned in the furnaces of Crematorium I and II at the same time?

Witness Dov Paisikovic: You have to calculate. That is, about 3,000 in 24 hours.

Associate Prosecutor Ormond: Burned?

Witness Dov Paisikovic: Burned.”

The capacity was therefore at the same time 3,000 corpses in 12 hours, 2,000 in 15 hours, and 3,000 in 24 hours! And if the cremation capacity was 3,000 corpses in 24 hours, it would have been crazy to carry out two gassings a day, because every day 3,000 additional corpses would have piled up in the furnace room.

Crematorium III did not have a cremation pit, as Paisikovic explicitly stated in Frankfurt (Fritz Bauer..., p. 20981):

“Presiding Judge: Were corpses also burned or buried in pits?

Witness Dov Paisikovic: No corpses were burned in pits in Crematorium II [=III].

Presiding Judge: None?

Witness Dov Paisikovic: No.

Presiding Judge: No. And in Crematorium IV [=V]?

Witness Dov Paisikovic: Yes.

Presiding Judge: But you didn’t see that yourself, did you?

Witness Dov Paisikovic: No, only heard from the others.”

In his statement for the Auschwitz Museum, Paisikovic made a surprising claim on this subject (p. 101):

“There was a period of time when at Crematorium IV the corpses were buried in the pit [zakopywano zwłoki w dole], but after the end of the work in Bunker 5, these corpses were dug up from the pit near Crematorium IV, and the bodies were burned in the crematoria.”

What about Müller’s five cremation pits?

Not satisfied with such nonsense, the witness dared to assert in his Vienna statement that the “bodies were consumed within about 4 minutes,” a statement worthy of a madman. With the canonical load of three corpses per muffle, this would correspond to a theoretical cremation capacity of 32,400 corpses in 24 hours for Crematoria II and III alone!

In the statement for the Auschwitz Museum, Paisikovic tried to mitigate these absurdities a little, but always remained within the sphere of thermotechnical delusions (p. 92):

“On the ground floor inside the crematorium, in the furnace room, the corpses removed from the freight elevator were deposited 2 to 3 in each cremation opening. There were 5 furnaces, and each furnace had three cremation muffles [retorty]... the bodies burned for 15 to 20 minutes [ciała spalały się od 15 do 20 minut].”

In the Vienna declaration, Paisikovic stated that Crematorium II/III had 15 furnaces. At the time, he evidently did not yet know that these were five triple-muffle furnaces, as he was clearly thinking of 15 separate furnaces. This is clear from what he asserted about their operation:

“Two groups of inmates, with four men each, had to work on the furnaces as such. One group had 7 furnaces to operate, the other 8. These groups had to push the corpses into the furnaces, and ensure with a long hook that they were properly cremated.”

Such a subdivision makes sense only in relation to 15 single furnaces. Considering the triple-muffle furnaces, it would mean that the six muffles of the first and second furnace plus one muffle of the third were operated by one group of inmates, while the two muffles of the third furnace plus six of the fourth and fifth furnace were operated by the other group. But in this type of furnace, the three muffles were interconnected, so operating a single muffle or two is simply nonsense.

If then the cremation of two (or three) corpses lasted only four minutes, the four inmates who took care of seven muffles had four minutes to load 14 (or 21) corpses, hence merely 17 (or 11) seconds per corpse, and then they had to go back to their first muffle again, in which the cremation had meanwhile ended, and so on! The stokers also had to ensure that the corpses were “properly cremated” by poking around “with a long hook.” This means that Paisikovic, like Müller, did not have the faintest idea of how to operate a cremation furnace; for him, it was assumed that everything merely boiled down to poking the burning corpses with a hook!

The operations of cutting hair from female corpses and extracting gold teeth took place in the furnace room according to Paisikovic:

“While corpses were lying in the fire, other inmates had to shear the hair of the corpses prepared for cremation in front of the furnaces (only for female corpses), and two inmate dentists had to collect gold teeth and gold rings.”

The orthodox version insists, however, that

“Glasses and artificial limbs were removed from the bodies in the space outside the gas chamber, and women’s hair was shorn.”

At the furnaces, only the gold teeth were extracted (Piper 2000, pp. 170f.).

Paisikovic also declares that “there was no need for much coke, because once the furnace was burning, the bodies themselves fed the fire” (p. 92), which is untrue, as noted earlier.

Paisikovic further states that the “crematoria were built so solidly that I am not aware of any failure of furnaces or entire crematoria during my time there,” which the documents also prove to be diametrically wrong.¹⁵¹

In his statement for the Auschwitz Museum, Paisikovic modified his account:

¹⁵¹ Mattoigno 2020c, pp. 181-185; 2019, Subchapter 8.8.1., pp. 262-268.

“During my work at Crematorium II, there were cases of failure of the blowers that blew air into the cremation furnaces which fed the combustion.” (p. 101)

It is unclear whether Paisikovic referred to the combustion of the coke or the corpses.

8.6. The “Sonderkommando”

In Crematorium III, where Paisikovic claims to have worked, the “Sonderkommando” consisted of 83 inmates, who did not have specific tasks, as the witness declared during the Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial:

“The people were not assigned [to tasks]. He just had to work there, and the other just had to work there.” (Fritz Bauer..., p. 20954)

In his statement for the Auschwitz Museum, on the other hand, Paisikovic introduced a precise division of labor: two goldsmiths, one barber, two dental technicians, one stoker, one cook (Leon), one artist (Oler), six furnace operators, three workers transporting corpses to the furnaces, two freight-elevator workers, six gas-chamber-clearing workers, ten undressing-room workers, ten workers for miscellaneous tasks (p. 110).

Furthermore, this breakdown includes only 45 out of 83 inmates; what were the remaining 38 inmates doing?

Paisikovic mentioned the dissection room of Crematorium II, but without mentioning Nyiszli, who must have been the physician in charge. In the Vienna statement, Paisikovic asserted:

“A Hungarian prisoner doctor had to carry out dissections in a room. This was done under the supervision of an SS doctor whose name I no longer remember. There was a dissecting table in this room. Above all, malformed people (e.g. hunchbacks) and twins were dissected. I remember with certainty that the physician Dr. Schumann was present at dissections as well and supervised them. The inmates selected by the SS for dissections were not murdered in the gas chambers but by injections. Blood and various organs were also taken from such inmates, which were to be delivered to field hospitals.”

Unlike Müller, Paisikovic was very vaguely familiar with Nyiszli’s “eyewitness account,” and imaginatively enriched the tale of blood drawing with that of organ transplantation.

As for the “selections” among the “Sonderkommando” members, Paisikovic invented one not attested to by orthodox Holocaust historiography. He claimed in his Vienna statement:

“When the so-called Hungary Action was over, the Hungarian Jews who had been assigned to the Sonderkommando at the time were liquidated. My father and I escaped this extermination operation only because we were assigned to Sonderkommando II; the others from our transport were at Bunker V and Crematoria III and IV. The inmates were brought to the Auschwitz Main Camp, where they were gassed. The corpses were brought to Crematorium II during the night, and were burned by the SS themselves, while our entire unit was not allowed to leave the room. We recognized this from the fact that we had to take away the inmate's clothes. We knew the clothes and the inmate numbers. After the Łódź extermination action, inmates of the Sonderkommando were again liquidated, most of those who had to work at Bunker V, and a smaller part of the Sonderkommando Crematorium III and IV. The extermination process was the same. These were about 200 inmates in total."

As we have seen earlier, only two "selections" among the "Sonderkommando" members are claimed for 1944 before the revolt of October 7, one on February 24, when Paisikovic was not yet in Auschwitz, the other at the end of September 1944. It was precisely after this selection that the 200 inmates affected by it were allegedly gassed in the disinfestation chamber of the so-called Kanada I at the Main Camp (storage area for inmate property).

During the Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial, the debate touched on this point as well. The presiding judge asked the witness if any detainees from the "Sonderkommando" had been killed while he was a member of this unit. The interrogation unfolded as follows (Fritz Bauer..., pp. 20977-20980):

"Witness Dov Paisikovic: They never did [that] at the crematorium where we worked. They did [this] at the crematorium of Bunker V, and of III, IV, they killed 200 prisoners in Auschwitz.

Presiding Judge: of III, IV and of the Bunker V unit.

Witness Dov Paisikovic: And Bunker V, yes.

Presiding Judge: 200 prisoners in Auschwitz were there

Witness Dov Paisikovic [interrupts]: Killed in Auschwitz.

Presiding Judge: When was that roughly?

Witness Dov Paisikovic: That was [pause] around August, I think. July, August, I don't know exactly. [...]

Witness Dov Paisikovic: I only heard that they were killed in Auschwitz in the Main Camp.

Presiding Judge: Also with gas?

Witness Dov Paisikovic: Also with gas.

Presiding Judge: And do you know where they were killed?

Witness Dov Paisikovic: What's that called? I can't remember what that is called.

Presiding Judge: In the chamber for personal property?

Witness Dov Paisikovic: In the chamber for personal property. Right, yes."

In practice, Paisikovic doubled the presumed selection at the end of September, thus obtaining two of them.

Like all his congeners, Paisikovic projects his own stupidity onto the SS: in order to conceal the killing of 200 members of the "Sonderkommando," they transferred them overnight to the Auschwitz Main Camp, gassed and cremated them personally – while the rest of the “Sonderkommando” was locked up in their dorm – but then the SS smart alecks sent members of this same “Sonderkommando” to retrieve the clothes of their gassed comrades!

The revolt of the “Sonderkommando,” which took place on October 6-7, 1944 (Vienna statement) or “perhaps on September 13, 1944” (Statement for the Auschwitz Museum, p. 95), is of interest here primarily for the claimed number of survivors. In the witness’s narration, the outbreak of the revolt was anticipated, but its timing took the “Sonderkommando” inmates at Crematorium III by surprise.

Paisikovic recounted the subsequent events as follows:

“The SS immediately gave the alarm, and all inmates from the Sonderkommando in Crematorium II had to line up. SS Oberscharführer Steinberg, who was the boss of Crematorium II, counted us, and when he realized that the number was correct, we all were locked up in the dissection room.” (Vienna statement)

During the Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial, the witness returned to the question as follows (Fritz Bauer..., p. 20986):

“Witness Dov Paisikovic: They put us in a room – what is it called – where they probed the bodies...

Interpreter Grünblatt: Dissecting room.

Presiding Judge [interrupts]: Dissecting room.

Witness Dov Paisikovic: Dissecting room. [There] we were put in.

Presiding Judge: How many?

Witness Dov Paisikovic: All these people. We were 83 men.

Presiding Judge: 83 men.”

Finally, here is what he claimed in his statement for the Auschwitz Museum:

“In Crematorium II, there was a room in which Mengele^[152] and a Jewish inmate of Hungarian origin carried out various experiments on the dead and the living. Living twins were taken, some experiments were done with them, and then their corpses were cremated. These corpses were dissected. What they were doing with them, I don’t know. They locked us all in Mengele’s room. We stayed there until the evening.” (p. 95)

The SS then forcibly took 20 inmates and sent them to work at Crematorium II. Of all the “Sonderkommando” members of Crematorium III, only one inmate was killed, so that “82 inmates of the Sonderkommando – we from the Sonderkommando Krematorium II[I] – lived until the evacuation from Auschwitz” (Vienna Declaration).

During the Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial and in his statement for the Auschwitz Museum (p. 96), he claimed instead that 30 members of his unit were taken. All surviving prisoners were then assigned to the demolition unit (Fritz Bauer..., p. 20992):

“Witness Dov Paisikovic: No. When the Russian army come closer, we were transferred to the demolition unit.

Presiding judge: To the demolition unit. What did you demolish?

Witness Dov Paisikovic: Crematorium I [=II] and Crematorium II [=III].”

In his statement for the Auschwitz Museum, the witness confirmed this, but specified that his unit was called “demolition unit Crematorium,” and that “his effective force was 70 prisoners” (p. 113), a figure which was the “official” number as sponsored by the Auschwitz Museum; but earlier he had talked about 82 survivors assigned to that unit.

Paisikovic therefore is a third discordant “eyewitness” of the same alleged event. For Nyiszli, 460 inmates from the “Sonderkommando” were locked up in the furnace room of Crematorium III; here the memorable speech of the Dajan was given. For Müller, 200 inmates from the “Sonderkommando” were gathered in the courtyard of Crematorium II, and he also reports a speech by the Dajan. For Paisikovic, however, 82 (or maybe only 70) “Sonderkommando” inmates were locked up in the dissection room of Crematorium III, and there was no speech by the Dajan.

And since we are at it, we might as well add a fourth contradictory version, that by Dragon:¹⁵³

“In October 1944, 500 prisoners were shot, in particular 400 in the courtyard of Crematorium No. IV, and 100 in the field near Crematorium No. II.”

Nyiszli claimed that the “Sonderkommando” inmates were all killed except for himself and his three coworkers, who were therefore the only four survivors. Müller asserts that there were 100 survivors, including the unit of 30 inmates from Crematorium V, of which he claims to have been a part. Paisikovic states that 82 inmates were saved, all exclusively made up of the entire unit of Crematorium III, so the 30 inmates of Crematorium V were all killed, including Müller. However, as he contradictorily said in his Vienna statement, “Filip Müller and Bernhard Sakal [...] were also able to save themselves.”

As seen earlier, after this “selection,” Müller – together with his unit of 30 men – was sent back to Crematorium V, which remained in operation until the end; Paisikovic said instead:

“From this point on, Crematoria I, III and IV [=II,IV+V] were closed. Crematoria III and IV [=IV+V] were wrecked and had become unusable due to the uprising; Crematorium I [=II] was undamaged.” (Vienna statement)

In other words, Crematorium V was also wrecked and out of use. Like Müller, Paisikovic was evacuated to “Wadzislaw-Leslau/Loslau” and then to Mauthausen (p. 97), but the frantic and vain search for inmates of the “Sonderkommando” by the SS did not happen in this camp, as Müller had claimed, but already in Auschwitz:

“All prisoners from Camp Sector d were brought to the Auschwitz Main Camp. During the night, the SS looked for the inmates there – those who worked in the crematoria and knew us from the Sonderkommando – those inmates who were from the Sonderkommando. Of course, none of us stepped forward. Whoever they discovered was shot on the spot.” (Vienna statement)

Since he adds that they “have been told repeatedly by the SS that they will not leave any witnesses” (Vienna statement), even this variant of the fable is not very credible. I may anticipate here that for Henryk Mandelbaum there were 70-80 survivors of the “Sonderkommando,” or at least not more than 100, who were evacuated from Auschwitz by marching in a separate column under the surveillance of six to eight SS men (see Subchapter 10.6.)! Joshua Rosenblum stated instead that there had been about 120 “Sonderkommando” survivors of the revolt, who had been gathered in the courtyard of Crematorium V (see Subchapter 11.2.).

9. The False Testimony of Stanisław Jankowski

9.1. Jankowski’s Statements

Viewed from the perspective of this study, I cannot share the Auschwitz Museum’s enthusiasm about Jankowski’s deposition of April 16, 1945. The entire text it is not of such importance to Holocaust historiography as to require or deserve a complete translation of the Polish text on these pages, which could be useful, but is not indispensable, since a complete Italian version already exists, although it is a retranslation,¹⁵⁴ while published translations from the original are available in German and English.¹⁵⁵ As for the contents, the parts significant for Holocaust historians, on which I will focus here, are short and scattered among irrelevant digressions.

On October 3, 1980, Jankowski made a short notarized statement which was published by Jean-Claude Pressac (1989, pp. 124f.). Worthy of mention is the following passage relating to the Main Camp’s crematorium:

“During my detention in Auschwitz, I was a witness of mass executions. The SS shot people by the hundreds using machine guns in the big hall of the Krematorium, 30 meters long and 5 meters wide – called ‘Leichenhalle’ (corpse hall) by the SS – Before making their victims enter the courtyard of Krematorium, the SS shut the nine Jews of the SonderKommando [sic] in the adjoining coke store. There we could hear the shots and the cries of the victims. Then they made us come out and carry the corpses, covered in blood and still warm, to the furnaces. It is at AUSCHWITZ that I saw for the first time a gassing in the corpse hall 'Leichenhalle.' This room had no windows, but it had ventilators in the ceiling. The two thick wooden doors of the hall, one opening on the long side of the hall, the other on the short side, had been made gas tight. The lighting of the hall was electric. The victims of the gassing were about 400 Jews from Birkenau. The men of the SonderKommando, including myself, saw them enter the courtyard, then we were shut into the coke store. When the SonderKommando men came out, they saw and I saw only their clothes in the courtyard.

Thirty minutes later, the SonderKommando men were ordered to transport the remains to the furnace, located about five meters from the door of the Leichenhalle [sic], in a separate hall."

Between August 28 and September 6, 1985, Jankowski had a series of meetings with employees of the Auschwitz Museum, which resulted in a written statement that is practically unknown to Holocaust historiography. I translate it in full here:¹⁵⁶

"From August 28, 1985 to September 6, 1985, in Auschwitz, Alter Fajnzylberg, former inmate No. 27675 of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, currently residing in 75019 Paris, 37 Avenue Jean Jaures, had the following statement recorded concerning the operation of the gas chambers, crematoria and the work of the Sonderkommando.

I stayed at the Auschwitz Camp from March 1942 to January 1945. At first, I worked as a carpenter in the Main Camp, and then in the staff of the crematoria and gas chambers: from November 1942 to July 1943 in Crematorium I in Auschwitz, and subsequently until January 1945 in Crematoria IV and V in Birkenau. Due to this, I learned in detail the entire procedure of the mass extermination of people in the gas chambers.

When I started working at Crematorium I, three Polish inmates were employed there as Kapos, and nine Jews, including myself.

On the subject of work in the crematoria, I made extensive statements before the investigating authorities in April 1945. They were used during the trial against camp commandant Höss and published in 1971 in the Notebooks of Auschwitz, Special Issue II, with the title 'Manuscripts of the men of the Sonderkommando.' I confirm in all respects the content of the declarations made then and published in 1971.

With reference to the specific questions, I clarify moreover:

The coke was poured into the storeroom through a window, and from there it was taken to fire the furnaces. The furnaces as currently rebuilt differ a little from those we had to operate, that is, the coke was poured into them from above through a special opening that was at floor level.

A wooden gate with bars led into the crematorium courtyard, which was surrounded by a high wall of concrete or plastered brick. It was on the side of the barracks, that is, opposite the SS hospital. The wall reached up to the roof of the crematorium. The gate had the same height. The gate and the bars were always closed. At the gate there was an electric bell, at the signal of which a Kapo came to open it.

In the crematorium, the corpses of inmates who had died in the camp were cremated, the corpses of those killed in the gas chamber – I remember the gassing of about 400 members of the Birkenau Sonderkommando who had been deployed in the outdoor cremation of corpses, and some others who were gassed. In the mortuary they also shot people in front of a special board wall. The wall was portable and was placed in front of the morgue/gas chamber wall on the side of the commandant's house. It was 2 meters high and 1.5 meters wide. In addition, the corpses of guillotined people were cremated and carried along with their heads in wooden crates from outside the camp.

In the crematorium, there were three furnaces, which each had two hearths. Three corpses were generally placed into each opening. Only at the end of the work [shift], 10-12 corpses were placed inside, which burned in our absence. The introduction of such a number of corpses was not easy, so the Kapos took care of it themselves. The corpses were crammed in by placing a special poker under their armpits. The cremation of a load of five corpses lasted about half an hour.

The furnaces of Crematorium I were initially operated by three Polish inmates, who carried out the function of Kapo: Mieczysław Morawa, from Krakow, who was also older than the other two, Waclaw Lipka and Józef Ilczuk from Lublin, as well as six Jews: me, Müller from Slovakia, Schwarz from Slovakia, Chil known as Kuzyn, a prisoner whose name and surname I don't remember, but who fled with Dragon during the evacuation. Subsequently, three other Polish inmates, named Władysław, Jan and Stanisław, were assigned to work in the crematorium.

The gas chamber inside was painted white, on the ceiling, to the best of my memory, there were two gas-feed holes [były dwa otwory do wsypywania gazu], there were no fake showers, I don't remember a ventilator. The room also had electric lighting. As for the appearance of the front wall of the crematorium, it has not undergone any changes, except for the fact that there were no bars on the windows, the door is perhaps the same, likewise the lamp hanging above it. The courtyard was paved. The location of the individual rooms is reflected in the map attached to this report.

In July 1943, Crematorium I was closed. We thought that then we would be killed. Instead, the entire Kommando was moved to Birkenau, to Camp Sector BIId, and lodged in Block 13.

The members of the Sonderkommando were already there who were employed in the Birkenau crematoria that had recently been put into operation. I was sent to work in Crematoria IV and V. We had a Kommandoführer and the same Kapos. Only in the morning did we learn which crematorium each of us would work in. There were no fixed jobs in the crematorium, that is, we worked constantly in different jobs.

The extermination process in Crematoria IV and V was as follows.

The inmates sent to death arrived at Crematorium V from the side of the road /Crematorium IV/. The first room they crossed was the vestibule, from which a door on the right led to the undressing room. All this happened quickly, under the relentless blows of the SS, so as not to give people time to understand what was happening around them. In the undressing room, Kommandoführer Moll sometimes gave a speech to the people gathered in the gas chamber, announcing them the bath and disinfection.

After they had undressed, the people, again under blows, were urged onward into the vestibule and from there into the gas chamber. The room was crowded with 1500-2000 people, men, women and children. After closing the door, an SS [man] poured the contents of 2 Zyklon cans through an opening in the side wall /on the side of Crematorium IV/. To reach the opening, he had to get on a stool. From the inside of the gas chamber the opening had a lower wall cut transversely at the bottom.^[157] I remember two rooms that were used for gas-sing: a large one, which I mentioned above, and a smaller one for about 200-300 people, where the gas was poured in through the door.

The gas chamber had a normal ceiling, was plastered and painted white. Instead of windows it had a small opening for pouring in the gas. In the room there were two doors: towards the vestibule and towards the outside. The gas-sing lasted about half an hour. After this time, the outer door was opened, and after the ventilation, which lasted a short time, the inmates of the Sonderkommando dragged the corpses back into the undressing room cleared of the clothes. There the corpses were arranged in layers and gradually cremated in the furnaces. From the undressing room, the corpses were dragged to the furnaces through two small rooms to the right and left of the chimney. In these rooms, inmates, dentists by profession, extracted teeth of precious metals, removed all the jewels and threw them in a special crate one meter high with a closed lid and an opening to throw them inside. From time to time the SS took these crates to Crematorium III, where there was the smelter for these objects. Inmate Katz took care of this. In each opening of the furnace, three corpses were introduced with stretchers that ran on rollers. When the furnaces were properly heated, the corpses burned by themselves for weeks on end. We crushed the ashes with the bony remains using wooden mallets, which had a board at the end to increase the surface.

¹⁵⁷ Meaning that the opening's sill was inclined inward.

Crematorium V was disguised from the side of the road by a temporary hedge with branches intertwined with iron wires fixed to trees and wooden posts. People destined for death undressed between this hedge and the crematorium when there was no time to clear out the undressing room.

The photo – one of three known as resistance-movement photographs – showing women walking from a grove, was taken by us, that is, Alex, a Greek Jew, myself and others, from the vestibule leading to the gas chamber. Two other photographs showing corpses lying in front of smoking pits [przed dymięcymi dolami] were taken from the outer door of the gas chamber. We took all the photos using a camera procured by Dawid Szmulewski. The camera came from the luggage of the victims; there were only three free frames. Szmulewski removed the exposed film and we buried the camera near the crematorium; at the moment I am unable to indicate this location.^[158]

The cremation pits, of enormous capacity, were located west of the gas chambers of Crematorium V, at a distance of a few tens of meters. There were two pits, and each could contain about 2,000 corpses. The corpses were placed on layers of wood, alternating corpses of men and women, because that way they burned better. Corpses of children were also burned there. The cremation pits were operated at the same time as the furnaces. Outflows [i.e. drainage channels] of human fat had been dug in the pits, but I didn't know whether fat was collecting in them – the corpses just burned completely.

The gas chamber was neither equipped with mechanical ventilation nor with fake showers. These were there only in the initial period, then people broke them, and they were no longer installed. In the undressing room, all the jewels were taken from the people, and from the corpses only teeth with precious metals were extracted, and individual hidden jewels were removed. Every two weeks, SS doctors came to the undressing room and from the corpses cut off muscles, which were placed in clay pots with some disinfectant liquid. Muscles were cut from corpses, both of men and women, as long as they were shot and not gassed. Executions were also carried out in the undressing room. There were three gas chambers, but mostly the last one was used. The others [were used] when they could not enter the latter one mentioned.

Returning to the events in the Auschwitz crematorium, I would like to add that both Morawa and Ulczuk were bloodthirsty bandits who treated us Jews with great ruthlessness. The Sonderkommando people especially beaten by Morawa were no longer able to work, and were therefore shot. The other Poles, on the other hand, treated us well. Wacek Lipka even said to Morawa: 'Mietek, by God, what are you doing?' He even fought with him in our defense.

The SS, when pouring in the cyklon, used gas masks; we did not use masks, although the gas chamber was ventilated briefly, about 15 minutes. But for this reason, there were cases of lightheadedness [oszołomienia] due to cyklon.

With that ends this report."

¹⁵⁸ I have discussed these photos in detail in Mattogno 2016a, pp. 41-50.

In the statement dated September 6, 1985, Jankowski provided clarifications on the collection of valuables in Crematorium V, on the gold smelter in Crematorium III, and on the cutting of women's hair. For the present study, only the second topic is of some interest. I therefore translate the pertinent section of this statement:¹⁵⁹

"2/ [Clarifications] regarding the [gold] melting laboratory in Crematorium III /II/

After arriving at the camp, I spoke several times with inmate Paul Katz, from France, and with an inmate from Czechoslovakia whose name I do not know, who for a long time were employed as goldsmiths /Goldarbeiter/ in the smelting workshop which was located in Crematorium III /II/, and under the control of the SS they melted jewelry made of gold and other precious metals into ingots weighing about 0.5 kg and even 1 kg. I know from the two aforementioned inmates that in the aforementioned laboratory they not only melted into ingots the gold teeth extracted from the teeth of the victims, the people killed in the crematoria, but together with the teeth also other precious items, for example watches, necklaces, wedding rings that were found on the corpses of the victims of mass extermination or in their clothes or luggage in the undressing rooms of the crematoria. The ingots cast by the two aforementioned inmates had a rectangular shape [kształt prostopadłościenny], resembling the gold bars commonly deposited in banks. Some 'organized' molten ingots themselves and smuggled them into Camp Sector BIId, in the housing barracks of the Sonderkommando members. They handed the ingots to other inmates. These in turn gave them to the SS in exchange for food. Although I had sometimes been in the building of Crematorium III /II/, I am unable to specify exactly in which part of it /in which room/ the smelting laboratory was located.

I am convinced that the two aforementioned inmates, the workers of the smelting laboratory, are no longer alive. They were selected by the SS during the last selection that was carried out among the Sonderkommando inmates in December 1944. So far I have not found any evidence that any of the inmates selected back then survived the war."

On May 10, 1945, while traveling by train through the Carpathian Mountains, Jankowski wrote a statement for a Hungarian official. Unfortunately, the text as stored in the Yad-Vashem Archives is difficult to read (Catalog No. 182).

9.2. Jankowski's Arrival at Auschwitz

Jankowski's personal background is of little interest here. Suffice it to say only that, after having participated in the Spanish Civil War in 1937 in the ranks of an International Brigade, he found himself in the French concentration camp at Compiègne in 1942, from which he was deported to Auschwitz. He described his deportation as follows:¹⁶⁰

¹⁵⁹ APMO, Oświadczenia, Vol. 113. Sygn. Oświadczenia/Fajnzyblberg/2613, pp. 13f.

“The transport included 1118 people, only Jews from various countries. We were loaded into small freight cars, 50 people in each. For the journey, we received 2.5 kg of bread and 250 grams of sausage each, and it had to be enough for the whole journey, which was to last about 12 days. During the journey, we did not receive anything to drink. However, the transport arrived in Auschwitz after about five days. Already at the time of arrival, a lot of us [wielu z nas] were missing, because during the journey due to the difficult transport conditions, a lot of people [szereg osób] died. I point out that we had no medical care during the transport. We arrived at Auschwitz on March 27, 1942, around 10 in the morning.”

In his presentation of this transport, Serge Klarsfeld informs us that it contained 1,112 people, departed from Compiègne on March 27 at 7:40 pm, and arrived at Auschwitz on March 30 at 5:33 am. The 1,112 deportees were all registered at Auschwitz, with numbers 27533-28644. Among the deportees, explains Klarsfeld, there was also “Stanislas Jankowski (Alter Feinsilber),” but neither of the two names appears in the pertinent “Alphabetical list of Convoy No. 1.”¹⁶¹

Therefore, the expected duration of the trip was not twelve days, and it didn’t last five days either, but not even three days. The deportees were 1,112 rather than 1,118, and not a single one of them died during the journey, since they were all properly registered.¹⁶²

Regarding the food provided, SS Hauptsturmführer Theodor Dannecker, in charge of Jewish affairs in France, wrote in a note dated March 10, 1942 relating to this transport (Eichmann-Trial Document T/403):

“The Jews who are to be deported are allowed to carry a maximum of 50 kg of luggage and have to be provided with food for 3 weeks. Above all, it is to be ensured that the shoes are in order and that every Jew has at least one blanket with him.”

So even Jankowski’s “2.5 kg of bread and 250 grams of sausage each” isn’t true.

¹⁶¹ Klarsfeld, “Convoi N° 1 en date du 27 mars 1942” and “Liste alphabétique du convoi N°1” (the book is unpaginated).

¹⁶² With reference to the English version of Klarsfeld’s work mentioned in the previous footnote, Salletti writes that “of the 1,118 deportees, 6 died during the journey, while the remaining 1,112 are registered with numbers from 27,533 to 28,644” (Note 6, p. 86). It is clear that he gives more credit to the witness than to the documents. On the other hand, the claimed six dead deportees certainly cannot be considered “a lot of people.”

9.3. The Gassings at Birkenau

In the first part of this study, I have examined, where appropriate, various statements by Jankowski in relation to those of Müller. Here I consider the most significant of his claims about the gassings at Birkenau regarding their veracity. He introduces the theme as follows (p. 18):

“On average, about 50% of each transport was gassed. During this period [w tym czasie] came transports of Greek Jews (about 50,000), French Jews (every two weeks a transport of about 1,000 people from the well-known French camp), Belgian, Dutch (about 15,000), German, Italian Jews (about 20,000), large transports of Slovak Jews and Polish Jews. I remember that 35,000 Jews from Katowice, Będzin and Sosnowice went into the gas in just one week. Jews from Krakow also went into the gas. The Theresienstadt Jews did not go directly into the gas. They were first housed in the Jewish family camp and were gassed exactly 6 months after arriving at the camp. The first transport from Theresienstadt included around 3,500 people, all of whom were gassed and cremated in the crematorium.”

The expression “during this period” refers to the time of Jankowski’s transfer to Birkenau, hence July 1943 (pp. 19f.), and by extension perhaps also to August and September.

In fact, of the 22 transports of Greek Jews deported to Auschwitz (about 54,500 people), as many as 18 arrived there before Jankowski’s transfer to Birkenau. In the period considered by him, only one transport arrived, on August 18, 1943 (Piper 1993, p. 191). Three transports arrived from France (July 18 and 31, September 2, 1943; ibid., p. 188). The eight transports from Belgium and Holland that arrived in July–September 1943 amounted to about 7,950 deportees (ibid., pp. 190, 197). About 500 German Jews were deported during that time frame (ibid., pp. 193f.), while the first transport of Italian Jews reached Auschwitz on October 18, 1943 (ibid., p. 198), and in all of 1943 there was not a single transport of Slovak Jews (ibid., p. 196). The alleged gassing of “35,000 Jews from Katowice, Będzin and Sosnowice” in one week, given that some 50% of each transport were allegedly gassed, would correspond to 70,000 deportees, which is wrong even from an orthodox perspective: the official figure is in fact 32,000 (ibid., pp. 184f.), but it is purely conjectural, because there are no documents on the deportation of Jews from the Będzin and Sosnowice ghettos to Auschwitz (see Mattogno 2021, pp. 169f.; in this period there was no transport from Katowice).

The first transport from Theresienstadt arrived in Auschwitz on September 8, 1943. The 5,006 deportees were all registered, 2,293 men with numbers 146694–148986, 2,713 women with numbers 58471–61183 (Czech 1990, p. 483). Jankowski’s claims are therefore extremely unreliable.

According to him, Hungarian Jews began arriving at Auschwitz “in July 1944” and “in that period an average of 18,000 Hungarians were killed in Birkenau a day.” Only 20% of the deportees from these transports were allegedly selected for work – Jankowski does not explain why (p. 18). This corresponds to the arrival of about 22,500 deportees per day, or the equivalent of 7-8 transports, which is not reflected by reality.

This disproportionate exaggeration served to enormously inflate the number of those allegedly gassed, which Jankowski pushed to even more-absurd heights than Müller (p. 61):

“Here I affirm, what I had forgotten before, with regard to the number of Jews in the Hungarian transports who were cremated in this period, that it amounted to half a million people [1/2 million osób].”

In the declaration of May 10, 1945, Jankowski mentioned the arrival in Birkenau of 500,000 Hungarian Jews within almost three months, and a total of 600,000-700,000. In this context he specified:¹⁶³

“Every day, 2,000-3,000 corpses were cremated in each of Crematoria I and II over a period of 24 hours, and 2,000-2,500 in Crematorium III and IV. On average, 8,000 corpses were cremated in the crematoria, and the rest in pits instead. The daily number of cremations exceeded 18,000.”

The distribution of the cremations is in conflict with what he had asserted earlier: 2,500 in each of Crematoria II and III and only 1,500 in each of Crematoria IV and V.

It goes without saying that Jankowski didn’t mention the Birkenau transit camp either; on the contrary, he managed to misrepresent this important story as well. He asserted that towards the end of 1943 the “Meksyk” [Mexico] was established, which was originally intended to accommodate British and American prisoners, but in which Hungarian Jews were housed instead. “Mexico” was the slang term for Construction Sector III of the Birkenau Camp, which at the time, together with the Sectors BIIC and BIIE, constituted precisely the transit camp or deposit camp, from which inmates were transferred to other camps. According to a letter from the Inmate Clothing Department of the Birkenau Camp of July 14, 1944, 48 transports had left the camp from May 16, 1944 until then, with altogether 45,132 inmates (Mattogno 2007, pp. 12-14). For Jankowski it was instead a delayed-death camp (p. 24):

“The Jews and their children did not work, but were kept for several months with almost no food and bad clothing, no blankets, in the unfinished barracks of the ‘Mexico’ camp. Under such conditions, these people died en masse; their corpses were then taken to the crematorium.”

It is a fact, however, that the inmates of the transit camp also received medical treatment, as I have documented elsewhere. A document dated July 26, 1944 and headed “Inmate Infirmary Outpatient Ward BII/a. Auschwitz II. Monthly report on Hungarian Jews temporarily accommodated in the camp,” which refers to the period June 26 to July 26, mentions health treatments for 3,135 inmates, including 1,426 surgical interventions (Mattogno 2007, pp. 14-16, 26f.).

Jankowski stated moreover (pp. 22f.):

“At the same time as the transports of Hungarian Jews were gassed, that is, in the late spring and early summer of 1944, around 50,000-60,000 Jews from Lodz and about 30,000 Jews from Theresienstadt were also gassed. This happened in this way: our Sonderkommando staff were told that very-large shipments of ‘raw material’ would arrive, that is, people destined for the gas. Shortly after this announcement, transports from Theresienstadt began arriving, numbering 1,000-2,000 people [each], and transports from Lodz, only a small part of which, when unloaded, was destined for work, the rest was sent directly to the crematoria (without any registration) and gassed, and then cremated in the crematoria and pits.

I was able to ascertain the number of Jews from Theresienstadt and Lodz who were cremated because at the time I was part of the crematorium staff. I therefore had the possibility of establishing with my own eyes the number of people cremated near me [= at my Kommando]. To this I added the number of cremated persons that my companions from the Sonderkommando told me who were serving in the crematorium on a different shift than mine.”

Like Müller, Jankowski had been assigned to Crematorium V since July 1943 (p. 17), so this enormous extermination took place in this crematorium. However, Müller does not mention the gassing of the Jews from the Lodz Ghetto at all. Jankowski, on the other hand, was unaware of the alleged liquidation of the Family Camp filled with German Jews from Theresienstadt. For him, the related gassings concerned transports coming directly from Theresienstadt. In fact, in May 1944, three transports arrived at Auschwitz from this ghetto, on May 16, 17 and 19, but the 7,449 deportees were all registered (Czech 1990 pp. 627f.). For Jankowski, 30,000 of these 7,440 deportees were gassed! In his statement of May 10, 1945, this number is 33,000-35,000, that relating to the Jews of Lodz 70,000-80,000.¹⁶³

As for the deportees from the Lodz Ghetto, as I have documented elsewhere, their number was about 22,500. The extant documents show that of these deportees, 3,100 men were registered and 11,500 women were transferred from Auschwitz to Stutthof (Mattogno 2004a, pp. 17-36). Hence, Jankowski's claim that he “ascertained” that at least 80,000-90,000 people were gassed and cremated in Crematorium V at that time is another pathetic lie, like that relating to the total number of victims, which is in accordance with the propaganda of the time: “The number of unregistered deportees cremated amounts to a few million” (p. 19). Based on his talks with other “Sonderkommando” members, he concluded that within two years “no less than 2 million people were cremated in the crematoria and bunkers of Birkenau,” but this figure did not include those who had been murdered previously (p. 23), an “observation” that clearly aimed at confirming the canonical propaganda figure of four million Auschwitz victims.

About “Bunker V,” indeed, about “bunkers” in general, Jankowski knew nothing. In this regard, he was very sketchy (p. 17):

“At Birkenau, they first killed with gas in the bunkers, and the bodies were cremated in pits. These bunkers were normally disguised as innocent farmhouses. Bunker 1 was located in a field on the right side of Brzezinka (Birkenau), Bunker 2 on the left side.”

Here, the orthodox narrative is turned on its head: instead of two farmhouses converted into gas chambers, as the orthodoxy claims, the gas chambers were disguised as farmhouses.

The claimed locations of these facilities make no sense, because the alleged “bunkers” were both “to the left” of the camp (if oriented along the standard north-south axis) or both in the right half (if oriented along the more-common east-west axis).

In his statement of May 10, 1945, we read on this matter:¹⁶³

“Crematoria. In all, there were 4 crematoria and 2 bunkers in Birkenau. The crematoria were numbered, precisely I, II, III and IV. There was also a Bunker numbered V and another Bunker installed next to Crematorium IV.”

Jankowski then added that there was a Kommando Krematorium II and III which had 100 inmates, a Kommando Krematorium IV and V which had 60, in addition to a “Sonderkommando” of 60 prisoners. Regarding the latter, he explained (pp. 17f.):

“This Sonderkommando was initially used in the demolition of houses, and then worked on the pits dug specifically to cremate the Jews. These pits already existed before, even before the arrival of Hungarian transports,” but according to the orthodox version they were filled in the spring of 1943.

Finally, the witness stated that:

“before the crematoria were put into operation, in Birkenau the corpses were also cremated in special pits near the so-called Bunkers No. 1 and 2.” (p. 23)

Hence, judging by his April 16, 1945 statement, he did not yet know the expression “Bunker V.” The first time he used that expression was in his deposition of May 10, 1945.

9.4. The Gassing Technique at Crematorium V: Dragon, Tauber and Jankowski

In my study The Making of the Auschwitz Myth (Mattogno 2021), I reconstructed the development of the Auschwitz gas-chamber lore in the literature based on statements by inmates who were part of the camp’s various underground resistance organizations, among other things. In this enormous amount of source material, details on the structure and operation of Crematoria IV and V are very-limited, while details on the gassing technique presumably used in them are completely absent. Hence, any writings on this topic could not use any already-pre-packaged, more-or-less-fabulous elements, such as had been available for Crematoria II and III since the years 1943-1944, but instead had to make up stories from scratch.

Furthermore, the plans of Crematoria IV and V, which had been conceived and built without any criminal intention (just like Crematoria II and III), did not at all lend themselves to a rational gassing procedure. For these reasons, the creators and propagators of this fable – first and foremost among them Dragon, then Henryk Tauber and much later also Jankowski – had to invent a procedure that even Pressac considered absurd, as we will see.

This tall gassing tale was drafted already in February 1945 and finalized in April, no doubt with at least the indirect help of the Soviet and Polish investigating officials, who showed former camp inmates willing to cooperate German documents they had seized in order to extract from these inmates their “explanations.”

In its essence, this literary version already appears in the Soviet interrogation of Szlama Dragon conducted on February 26, 1945, and he developed it further in the subsequent Polish interrogation of May 10 and 11, 1945.

To the investigating judge of the military prosecutor of the First Ukrainian Front, Captain Levin, Dragon declared:¹⁶⁴

*“In Crematoria Nos. 4 and 5, there was an annex building about 20 meters long. Inside, this building was divided by walls into three parts, each of which was a gas chamber. To pour the Zyklon, openings with bars [люки с решотками:¹⁶⁵ ljuki s rešjotkami], were arranged on the outer walls of the gas chambers, at a height of about 2 meters, which could be sealed hermetically with lids [shutters]. [...] The process of poisoning people took place in a similar way to how it was carried out in the gas chambers of Crematoria Nos. 2-3. The difference was only in the fact that the SS poured the Zyklon inside through the openings in the wall mentioned above, not on the roof.”*

In the account he gave Judge Jan Sehn, the witness added further elements:¹⁶⁶

“The rooms of Crematorium No. 5 used for gassings were about 2.5 meters high. However, with my arm raised high, I could not touch the ceiling. From the top of the door to the ceiling there were still 70 cm. An adult man of medium height could reach the lower edge of the opening of the window with his arm raised through which the contents of a can of Cyklon was poured into the chamber. However, Scheinmetz did have a special ladder on which he stood when he poured the Cyklon into the chamber.”

¹⁶⁴ GARF, 7021-108-8, p. 25.

¹⁶⁵ Recte: решётками.

¹⁶⁶ AGK, NTN, 93, Vol. 11, p. 109; subsequent page numbers in the text are from there, unless stated otherwise.

“When the room was full, the door was closed. The SS guards did it, very often Moll personally. Then Mengele gave the order to Scheinmetz, who, like at the Bunkers, went to the Red-Cross van, took out the gas can, opened it, and poured its contents into the chamber through a small window in the side wall. This window was high enough, so that it could be reached [by climbing] up a small ladder. And here too, as in the Bunkers, he did this with a mask.” (pp. 107f.)

To be precise, according to Plan 2036 (p) of January 11, 1943 relating to Crematorium IV (and the mirror-symmetrical Crematorium V), the wing of the building that contained the alleged gas chambers was only 2.20 meters high inside. The small openings arranged in the walls, 40 centimeters high, had the upper edge about 10 centimeters from the ceiling and the lower one about $(220 - 10 - 40 =) 170$ centimeters from the floor (Pressac 1989, p. 399). In practice, an adult man of average height would have reached the lower edge with his head already, and raising his arms, he would have reached at least halfway through the window.

In the interrogation of February 27, 1945 by the deputy military prosecutor of the First Ukrainian Front, Major Pakhomov, Henryk Tauber expressed himself in almost the same words as his colleague Dragon:¹⁶⁷

*“In Crematoria 4 and 5 there was an annex building about 20 meters long. Inside, the building was divided into three parts, each of which was a gas chamber. To throw in the ‘Zyklon,’ into the walls, at a height of about two meters, there were openings with bars [люки с реше[ë]тками, ljuki s rešjotkami] that closed hermetically with shutters [...]. The process of poisoning people took place in a way similar to that which the fascists adopted in the gas chambers of Crematoria Nos. 2 and 3. The difference was that the ‘Zyklon’ was thrown by the SS through the aforementioned openings, which were made in the walls, not through the roof, as in Crematoria Nos. 2 and 3.”*

The statements made by Tauber to Jan Sehn also followed the lines of those by Dragon (p. 148):

“All [the rooms] had gas-tight doors, windows with bars on the outside [okna zakratowane od strony zewnętrznej] and were closed from the outside by gas-tight shutters. These windows, which a standing man could reach with his hand raised, were used to pour the contents of the cans of ‘Cyklon’ into the gas chambers filled with people. The gas chambers were about 2 meters high, they had an electric lighting system that ran along the walls; they did not have a ventilation system.”

In his 1985 statement, Jankowski also described the alleged extermination technique in Crematoria IV and V and also attached an explanatory drawing of Crematorium V (see DOCUMENT 24), as his colleague Dragon had already done (p. 118). The numbers correspond to the following designations:

- “1 – Room of Kommandoführer Foss [Voss], then of Moll, small kitchen for the SS.*
- 2 – Coke storage and room /changing room/ for Sonderkommando members.*
- 3 – Furnace room.*
- 4-5 – Rooms for extracting precious metal teeth from the corpses and for removing other hidden precious items.*
- 6 – Undressing room, corpse storage, place of executions.*
- 7 – Vestibule.*
- 8 – Room where the old gas masks were and [the inmates] awaited being shot /among others Rumkowski with his wife, seen by Fajnzylberg.*
- 9 – Room.*
- 10-12 – Gas chambers.”*

Doors are indicated by arrows. The gassings therefore took place as follows: the victims entered the vestibule [7], then went into the undressing room [6], where they left their clothes. Then they returned back into the vestibule and from there they went into the gas chambers 10, 11 and 12. From there, the “Sonderkommando” inmates brought the corpses back into the undressing room through the vestibule, and finally took them to the furnace room [3] passing through Rooms 4 and 5.

Jankowski picked up this procedure from Dragon’s depositions, making a few tweaks here and there. For example, to carry out the gassing from outside the crematorium, the SS did not use a ladder, but a stool. Apart from this detail, the observations that Pressac expounded regarding the procedure declared by Dragon also apply to Jankowski (Pressac 1989, p. 386):

“Although the operating sequence looks simple enough, it had become irrational and ridiculous. It was irrational to have the victims going from the central room to the gas chambers then [after having been killed] being brought back, thus destroying the linear logic of the initial design. It was ridiculous to have an SS man in a gasmask balancing on his short ladder with a 1 kg can of Zyklon-B in his left hand while he opened and then closed the 30 by 40 cm shutter through which he introduced the [Zyklon-B] pellets with his right hand. This performance was to be repeated six times. If he was not capable of such a balancing act, the SS [man] had to climb his little ladder three times for each opening: first to open the shutter (up and down), second to introduce the Zyklon-B (up and down) and third to close the shutter (up and down). Six openings, eighteen times up and down the ladder wearing a gasmask. A simulation shows that this exercise would take 10 minutes. A few steps installed beneath each opening would have avoided all this performance.”

In his second book, Pressac added (1993, p. 68):

“The criminal arrangement of Crematorium IV (and V), established exclusively by technicians and engineers of the Construction Office, turned out to be so aberrant that, without the intervention of Topf, which also had its share of responsibility for the malfunctioning furnaces, its operation would have been almost impossible.”

Incredibly, Pressac attributed such an irrational, ridiculous, aberrant and “almost impossible” procedure invented by an inmate of not-exactly staggering intelligence to the Auschwitz Construction Office, as if its staff was made up of a bunch of mentally handicapped people!

DOCUMENT 25 shows the plan of Crematorium IV (and mirror-symmetrically of Crematorium V). The letters and numbers added indicate:

E: entrance

F 1-7: openings of 30 cm × 40 cm (presumed Zyklon-B-introduction openings)

1-3: alleged gas chambers

4: vestibule

5: alleged undressing room for the victims

6: double-door lock, pressure-lock room

7: furnace room.

The victims therefore entered through the entrance (E) into the vestibule (4), then went to the undressing room (5), then returned naked through the vestibule (4) and distributed themselves into the gas chambers (1-3). After the deed, their corpses were then taken back through the vestibule (4), the undressing room (5) and finally to the furnace room (7) through the pressure-lock room (6).

In examining this irrational and ridiculous procedure, Pressac overlooked a crucial element. As pointed out in another study,¹⁶⁸ he published photos of three gas-tight shutters, which once belonged to Crematoria IV/V, corresponding to the inventory numbers of the Auschwitz Museum.¹⁶⁹ The external dimensions of the frames are 30 cm × 40 cm, but the closing shutters are smaller than the frames and, due to the particular structure of the shutters, the interior opening was even smaller: about 20 cm × 30 cm for the frames archived as II-5-64/2 and 3, and some 15 cm × 25 cm for the frames archived as II-5-64/1. DOCUMENT 26 shows Shutter Type II-5-64/2 (internal side), the one with the largest usable surface. I added the exterior (30 cm × 40 cm) and the interior dimensions (20 cm × 30 cm), and a crossbar in the interior clearance space,¹⁷⁰ and the dimensions of the four rectangular openings bounded by the bars: 9.5 cm (width) × 14.5 (height). The exterior view of that shutter is shown in DOCUMENT 27.

¹⁶⁸ Mattogno 2019, Subchapter 5.7., “Introduction of Zyklon B,” pp. 152f.

¹⁷⁰ The frames were set into wall openings of 30 cm × 40 cm (F1-7 in DOCUMENT 25).

A 500-gram can of Zyklon B had a diameter of 15.4 cm and a height of 12.5 cm; the 1,500-gram can had the same diameter, but was 31.5 cm tall; the 1,000-gram can had the same diameter but an intermediate height – and it is also necessary to include the hand of the gassing employee holding the can. Therefore, the introduction of a can of Zyklon B into such a small opening would have been physically impossible.

It should be noted that the claim that these openings of the alleged gas chambers had bars is not an error or a whim of the witnesses quoted earlier, but is confirmed by two orders from the Central Construction Office's Locksmith Shop. The first is No. 252 of March 29, 1943 for Crematoria IV and V, which concerns the manufacture of "iron bars" ("Eisengitter") for various windows, including four of 0.30 m × 0.40 m in size (p. 89). The work was finished on April 30th. The second is No. 351 of April 27, likewise for Crematoria IV and V, which mentions among others "12 pieces window bars 50 × 70 cm" (p. 92). The work was finished on April 30th. Since all the windows of the two crematoria had standard sizes of 100 cm × 150 cm, 50 cm × 100 cm and 30 cm × 40 cm, it is clear that the four bars of 30 cm × 40 cm and the 12 of 50 cm × 70 cm could only be used for windows that measured 30 cm × 40 cm, that is for those of the alleged homicidal gas chambers. In fact, the total number – 16 – corresponds to the total number of openings measuring 30 cm × 40 cm of Crematoria IV and V.

The dimensions of 50 cm × 70 cm may have been the result of subsequent changes to the design of the openings, such as inserting the iron rods into the wall.

Pressac's mention of the intervention of the Topf Company undoubtedly referred to its proposal for "De-aeration systems for Crematoria IV and V" dated June 9, 1943. Without these devices, the passive ventilation of the three alleged gas chambers through the three doors and the seven small openings would have required days,¹⁷¹ making it impossible to carry out gassings in a continuous cycle. Pressac believed that the de-aeration system was only installed in Crematorium V, and precisely in May 1944 (Pressac 1993, p. 89), which he claims is supported by the 3rd paragraph of SS man Betzinger's letter of June 13, 1944 (Pressac's Note 290, p. 108), which says:¹⁷²

"Based on your invoice of December 23, 1943, on the arrival of the equipment we ordered a down payment amounting to RM. 1,200. – to be made in your favor. Since the device has been completed already, the remainder can now be made available. For this purpose, we need a final invoice which we have written out and attached for you to complete by affixing your company seal and signature."

¹⁷¹ Mattogno 2019, Subchapter 5.9., pp. 154-156.

Although in the letter's header, addressed to Topf, appear the initials of SS Oberscharführer Ewald Betzinger ("Btz"), it is signed by the head of the Central Construction Office, SS Obersturmführer Werner Jothann.

Before examining the matter, it should be noted that no document states that the two de-aeration systems were intended for the rooms allegedly used as gas chambers. This is a pure conjecture conjured up by Pressac ex cathedra, thus transmogrifying it into a "fact." It cannot be ruled out, indeed it is much more-likely and reasonable, that such a system was planned for the furnace rooms of the two crematoria. On the other hand, since Pressac claims that only one of them was installed – and only in May 1944 to boot – until then any homicidal gasings claimed for Crematoria IV and V would have been catastrophic. Each gassing would have required days of ventilation, with the serious risk of the toxic fumes wafting throughout the entire building, including the SS's service rooms and the furnace room.

Topf's invoice dated December 23, 1943 concerns the two "De-aeration systems for Crematoria IV and V," which were supplied at the total price of RM 2,524, and acknowledges a down payment of RM 1,200.¹⁷³ The final invoice mentioned in the letter and attached to it, dated July 13, 1944, acknowledged the payment of the outstanding RM 1,324.¹⁷⁴ The data match, but it is by no means certain that the expression "Since the device has been completed already" (German: "fertiggestellt") signifies that the device had been installed or mounted (German: "installiert," "montiert," "eingebaut"). This might have referred merely to the fact that these devices had already been manufactured specifically for the Auschwitz Camp. Since "Anlage" is in the singular, but the payment was valid for both systems, it is obvious that it designated both. On the other hand, Jothann's letter makes no mention of the month of May: how could Pressac deduce from it that only one system was mounted, namely that of Crematorium V, in May 1944?

An undated file memo by SS Oberscharführer Wegner mentions that machinery listed on Invoice No. 2134 of December 23 1943 was taken over on January 1, 1944,¹⁷⁵ and the final invoice of July 13 records the receipt of the first down payment of RM 1,200 on February 2, 1944.

Jothann's urgent telegram of May 12, 1944 to Topf stated:¹⁷⁶

"The 2 elevators cannot be installed now. Installation takes place later together with the installation of the de-aeration systems in [Crematoria] 4 and 5."

Therefore, the de-aeration systems had not yet been installed by that date, and two days before the start of the deportation of the Hungarian Jews, which Jothann must have been aware of, he was not in the slightest worried about bringing the alleged gas chambers in Crematoria IV and V into operation, as he was likewise unfazed by the fact that the freight elevators with high-load capacities would not be available for Crematoria II and III either. Pressac, on the other hand, in thrall to testimonies like Müller's, claimed:

“Anticipating the deportation of the Hungarian Jews to Auschwitz, Jothann took care to have Crematoria II and III overhauled, and to reactivate the IV and V, which had been unused since September 1943. He asked Topf to install the final elevators of Crematoria II and III, and to mount the de-aeration systems of the gas chambers of Crematoria IV and V, because without them, any serial gassing was impossible.” (Pressac 1993, p. 89)

In reality, however, Jothann did not “ask” Topf at all to install the elevators and de-aeration systems, but to the contrary told them that the installation of the elevators was currently not possible, and that it would be carried out later, together with that of the deaeration systems.

The meaning of the telegram dated May 12, 1944 is that the Topf Company was then exempted from providing the Central Construction Office with a mechanic, which, among other things, required submitting a cost estimate, such as for repairs to the second furnace of the Main Camp's crematorium.¹⁷⁷

There is no document on the actual installation of the de-aeration systems. On the contrary, such an installation can be ruled out due to the fact that it is not included on the list of Topf's outstanding invoices which runs from May 24, 1943 to December 2, 1944.¹⁷⁸ On December 21, 1944 we find listed the invoice for “De-aeration systems for Cr. IV. V.,” but none of the items listed for 1944 contains any charges for installing these systems by Topf's mechanic Heinrich Messing, as is the case for Crematoria II and III. In fact, the list mentions an invoice of 921 RM dated February 22, 1943, and another one of 916 RM dated May 25, 1943. In a letter from Topf to the Central Construction Office of August 20, 1943, these invoices explicitly refer to “supplying a fitter (Messing),” that is, for the work of Topf's mechanic Messing.¹⁷⁹

In addition, the three main witnesses declared that Crematoria IV and V did not have a ventilation system:

- Jankowski: “The gas chamber was neither equipped with mechanical ventilation nor with fake showers” (as quoted earlier).
- Dragon: “Furthermore, in the gas chambers of Crematoria No. 4-5, there was no ventilation system, so the ventilation of the rooms was done by opening the doors and windows.”¹⁸⁰

¹⁷⁸ RGVA, 502-1-96, pp. 33-33a.

¹⁷⁹ RGVA, 502-1-313, p. 27.

¹⁸⁰ GARF, 7021-108-8, p. 25.

- Tauber: “The gas chambers were about 2 meters high, they had an electric lighting system that ran along the walls; they did not have a ventilation system” (as quoted earlier).

That said, here is Jankowski’s most-surprising statement (1985 statement):

“The SS, when pouring in the cyklon, used gas masks; we did not use masks, although the gas chamber was ventilated briefly, about 15 minutes. But for this reason, there were cases of lightheadedness due to cyklon.”

So after just 15 minutes of passive ventilation, which was practically ineffective, the “Sonderkommando” inmates entered the gas chambers without masks and, at most, felt dizzy! This is not only nonsense, but also contradicts Dragon’s claims regarding clearing out the alleged “Bunker 1,” whose ventilation would have occurred under similar conditions, namely by simply opening the doors and windows of the chambers:¹⁸¹

“The clearing of the corpses from the chamber, as I have already explained, was carried out by 12 people in turn, 6 people were clearing [it] out for 15 minutes. It was difficult to stay in the gas chamber for more than 15-20 minutes, because the smell of Zyklon, despite the open doors, did not disappear immediately.”

Dragon stated that, when performing this task, the “Sonderkommando” men were equipped with gas masks (“All 12 of us were equipped with masks and led to the door of the house”¹⁸²), and according to him, this also happened in Crematorium V:¹⁸³

“Then Moll would open the door of the gas chamber, we would put on the mask and haul the corpses from the individual chambers, through small corridors, to the furnaces.”

In conclusion, on the one hand, the introduction of Zyklon B into the alleged gas chambers through the aforementioned openings was impossible, and on the other hand – if we assume that it had been possible without conceding it – “any serial gassing was impossible” due to the lack of mechanical ventilation systems.

In his statement of September 6, 1985, Jankowski also badly put to good use his literary memories regarding the melting of dental gold. He mentioned Paul Katz, but did not remember Franz Feldmann. The gold was melted “in ingots weighing about 0.5 kg and even 1 kg” which “had a rectangular shape resembling the gold bars commonly deposited in banks.” Given the specific weight of gold (19.3 g/cm³), such “bars” would have been practically the size of a credit card, with a thickness of 7 millimeters! I remind the reader that for Paisikovic the gold was “cast into large cubes” (Vienna statement), meaning gold cubes. He evidently conflated the story of the cube-shaped fireclay crucibles mentioned by Kraus and Kulka.

10. The False Testimony of Henryk Mandelbaum

10.1. Mandelbaum's Activities as a Witness

This witness, a Polish Jew born in 1922 in Olkusz (Poland), was deported from Będzin to Auschwitz at the end of April 1944, where he was registered under Number 181970. In June of that year, he was assigned to the "Sonderkommando," and remained there until January 1945.

On February 27, 1945, Mandelbaum was interrogated by the Soviet Major Kotikov. On September 26, 1946, he was interrogated by Judge Artur Bubik during the investigation leading up to the Höss Trial, in which he then testified as a witness for the prosecution. He also testified during the trial against the members of the former Auschwitz camp garrison (the Krakow Trial).

In the years 2003-2004, Igor Bartosik and Adam Willma repeatedly interviewed Mandelbaum, and from these conversations arose the core of a book that was published only in 2009, after the witness's death on June 17, 2008. The Polish book whose title translates to I was at the Auschwitz Crematorium: A Conversation with Henryk Mandelbaum, Former Prisoner and Member of the Sonderkommando at Auschwitz (Mandelbaum 2009), appeared two years later also in an English edition with exactly that title (Mandelbaum 2011/2015).

In the presentation of this book, Bartosik affirms that "fate made Henryk Mandelbaum one of the most-important witnesses of the Holocaust" (Mandelbaum 2015, p. 5), undoubtedly an excessive judgment, but Franciszek Piper underestimates him a lot, mentioning him only twice and in almost-irrelevant contexts (Piper 2000, pp. 189, 194). Robert J. van Pelt, on the other hand, does not mention him at all in his book The Case for Auschwitz.

After giving Mandelbaum's registration number (181970), the interviewers explain that, according to the incomplete documents of the camp, he arrived at Auschwitz from Sosnowice on April 28, 1944 with a transport of 21 people, only three of whom were registered (numbers 181970-181972; Mandelbaum 2015, p. 38; 2009, p. 34). The quarantine list (Quarantäne-Liste) drawn up by the former inmate Otto Wolken, however, records the arrival of the three inmates, all Polish Jews, from Sosnowice on 25 April. They were housed in Block 7 (as stated by the witness; ibid.) and their quarantine ended on May 21.¹⁸⁴ During an interrogation dated April 24, 1945, Wolken presented a typewritten transcript of the quarantine list that was added to the interrogation report, and which – unlike the original manuscript version – has an additional column listing the numbers of allegedly gassed deportees; in the case in question, 18 people.¹⁸⁵

10.2. The Interrogation of February 27, 1945

This statement, chronologically seen the witness's first one, is completely unknown to Holocaust historiography, so I report it in full.¹⁸⁶

"I was arrested by the Germans on April 16, 1944 in the city of Będzin. Previously, I hid at my comrades, buying and selling things. This was my source of income. I arrived at Auschwitz/Oświęcim on April 23, 1944. I spent six weeks in quarantine, after which I was immediately assigned to the Sonderkommando. I didn't want to go there, but I was forced to. On the first day, when I arrived at Crematorium No. 4 [= V], I was assigned the task of burning people on pyres who had been asphyxiated in the gas chambers.

Question: Were there many people in this Sonderkommando?

Answer: In this Kommando there were 135 people in one shift only, just as many in the other.

Question: From which countries were the Sonderkommando men recruited?

Answer: In the Kommando there were Jews from Greece, France, Holland, Hungary, Slovakia and even Poland. The head of the crematorium was SS Oberscharführer Fass [Peter Voss] and later Hauptscharführer Moll Otto.

Question: How long have you worked in the crematorium?

Answer: I worked in the crematorium for seven months.

Question: How many people were killed or cremated each day in the crematorium where you worked?

Answer: Each shift worked for 12 hours, cremating 6,000-7,000 corpses.

Question: How many transports of people a day arrived for cremation during your stay in the crematorium area?

Answer: Three or four and even seven transports arrived. There were rarely days when no transports arrived, excluding October and November. Well, when there was no transport, the work at the crematorium did not stop, the corpses of executed people and of inmates who died in the camp arrived – every day 20, 30, 40, 70, 100 and 200 and more.

Question: From which countries did transports of people arrive at that time?

Answer: From Greece, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, less so from France – Americans delivered from Warsaw – about 60 people, from Italy and other countries.

Question: How many people were murdered during your work?

Answer: About 1.5 million people were murdered during this period, possibly more.

¹⁸⁵ GARF, 7021-108-50, p. 65.

Question: What are you relying on when providing this figure?

Answer: It is not difficult to calculate. I have already said that each shift [cremated] 6,000-7,000 people, if this is multiplied by the largest 20 days [of greatest influx] and then by two shifts, that already gives about a million. To this we must add the corpses of inmates who arrived from the camp and were cremated at the same time in the other crematoria.

Question: How did [the SS] treated the people as soon as they were brought in?

Answer: On the ramp /platform/ the German doctor Mengele selected them. Some healthy people were left for work, the rest were immediately sent to the crematorium. In general, they basically burned mainly women and children, the elderly and old people.

Question: How many people at a time did the Germans shove into the gas chamber for the killing?

Answer: 1000 to 1500 in each room. The people died within half an hour after the gas was administered to the chamber.

Question: What was done with the corpses before cremation?

Answer: At each shift, a special man worked who pulled out gold teeth, others cut women's hair. I remember the case when a German military doctor appeared at the crematorium; he picked out some healthy people, put them aside, shot them, and then removed the flesh from their legs. Sometimes he would extract blood out of people, and then shoot them.

Question: What did the Germans do with human ash?

Answer: The ash was carried to rivers, fields and Brenitze [?], where it was thrown into the water. One day, the wheel of a truck sank in the area of the camp; in that place, a lot of ashes fell out of the vehicle. I think that the ashes were also buried there, I can indicate this location. The inmates of the Sonderkommando then told me that, when they sifted through the ashes and found golden objects, they threw them into the pool, so as not to deliver them to the SS. I can also indicate this pool.

Question: What do you know about mass executions by shooting at the camp?

Answer: The SS carried them out in the crematorium, every day 8, 10, 15 people were shot by them, sometimes even more.

Question: What nationalities were the people shot?

Answer: Mainly Russians and Poles.

Question: Please tell us what the pyres were like on which the corpses were burned.

Answer: We alternated a layer of wood, a layer of corpses, so up to ten layers [так в десять рядов: tak v desjat 'rjadov]. In all, we burned 150-180 corpses. We lit the pyre of pine wood doused with gasoline. We also used roots from uprooted trees, because they contain a lot of bitumen [sic]. In the Pyres we used them especially when we burned corpses from the camp, because they were very meagre and burned badly.

Question: Who from the German government visited the crematorium?

Answer: Towards the end of August or September 1944, Himmler arrived from Berlin with other army generals and officers. They were in the crematorium during the second shift, when I wasn't working. But the inmates of the Sonderkommando told me that the whole commission at the crematorium laughed and were satisfied. One said aloud: 'The Jews burn well!'

During my stay there [at the camp], there were many commissions from Berlin, I don't remember what they were. In the Sonderkommando, a group of inmates recorded the cremations, and buried this somewhere in a bottle or box in the crematorium area.

Question: Were there days when the gas chamber could not cope with work due to the large number of people?

Answer: In these cases, the chamber was filled to the maximum, I remember that, when the gas chamber was opened, the dead people stood on their feet, with their heads tilted, on top of one another.

Question: Were detainees from the Sonderkommando [also] killed?

Answer: Yes, they were killed. At the end of October, we Sonderkommando inmates who were staying at the camp were not allowed into the crematorium, although the crematorium was working that day. The SS themselves operated it. That day they cremated 230 inmates of the Sonderkommando, and then they declared that they had all gone on the transport. The Germans were afraid of us, because we could reveal what they had done in the camp and in the crematoria.

Question: When did they begin to dismantle the crematoria?

Answer: At the end of October, they began to dismantle the first crematorium, the dismantling was started by the Sonderkommando, and then inmates were sent, then inmates were also assigned to the dismantling. A total of 300-350 people worked on the dismantling of the crematorium. The Germans, always SS, came and beat everyone, so as to make them work faster.

During the dismantling, trucks operated and immediately took away parts of the furnaces and masonry, I don't know where. The first crematorium was completely dismantled over the course of 3-4 weeks.

When the first crematorium had not yet been demolished, they sent us to demolish the second one, that is, in October two crematoria were normally dismantled. In January 1945, the Germans blew up the remaining crematoria which they had failed to dismantle.

Question: What else can you tell us about the Sonderkommando?

Answer: At the beginning of October 1944, the Sonderkommando, who was housed in the camp, was transferred to stay in the crematorium, and we stayed there for about a month. Once, in October, a fire broke out in Crematorium 3; it was started by the Sonderkommando; then this crematorium was surrounded by the SS, and a fight began that lasted 2 hours. At the time, the Sonderkommando had disarmed the guards in one of the crematoria and fled the crematorium. I know that the SS captured all the insurgents and shot 400 of them. The crematorium burned down completely and started to be dismantled first.

Question: Did the Sonderkommando receive better or the same food as the remaining inmates?

Answer: The same as the other inmates.

Question: How old were the SS [men]?

Answer: At the crematorium they were 25-30 years old; one was 50 years old; his name was Puch; he was Scharführer.

Question: Please give me the names of the SS [men] who served in the crematoria.

Answer: Kurschluss, he was Kommandoführer, a terrible despot; he hit everyone on the head with the gun. He hit me too. I still have the scar. Konzelmann,^[187] a soldier who was on guard duty at the crematorium all the time."

10.3. The Statement of September 26, 1946

This is a relatively short statement, equally unknown to Holocaust historiography, in which the witness spoke extemporaneously, without having to answer questions:¹⁸⁸

"I was interned in the Auschwitz camp in May 1944. I remained in quarantine for a period of 2 months, and then I was assigned (as healthy, physically robust) to the so-called Sonderkommando, i.e. the special team of inmates that dealt with gassing, cremation, etc. The head of the Sonderkommando was a certain Otto Moll, Hauptscharführer. Personally, I was assigned to loading clothes onto a truck after the gassings. In particular after the gassing of Hungarian transports. All the action took place in such a way that a doctor received a transport at the railway ramp. Of the entire transport, he designated about 200-300 people as fit for work (the entire transport generally numbered 3,000 people), the rest was destined for death instead. This rest was told that they had to go to the bathhouse, to get towels etc. They actually went into a room that looked like a bathhouse (the rooms were large, so an entire transport entered a room). Of course, before that, those who were made to enter it undressed in special undressing rooms. Then the SS closed the door of the hall (because during the gassing itself, only SS men were used), and then the gas was introduced from the ceiling through special devices. In one hall there were 4 gas injection devices (cyklon).

As for the person of Rudolf Höss, he came 1-2 times a week. Each of his visits meant the arrival of a new transport of inmates. He was always smiling, serene, he wore his cap [pulled down] to the left, halfway up his ear. From all his behavior it appeared that he urged his subordinates to work quickly. I once saw that, with a load of corpses, the staff were not doing too well with their work. Then Höss and Moll showed by their example how corpses were best thrown [into pits].

¹⁸⁷ A person unknown to Holocaust literature.

¹⁸⁸ AGK, NTN, 85, Vol. 4 (Höss Trial, Vol. 4), pp. 147f.

I would like to point out that the staff of the detainees employed in the Sonderkommando had no contact with the other detainees; there was no dissemination of information on the things that happened there. Moreover, this staff was changed from time to time, starting with the liquidation of the old staff.

When things began to go wrong for the Germans at the Eastern front, if I am not wrong, in November 1944, they began to dismantle the gas chambers [gazownie], crematoria etc., and eventually they blew up everything, but part of the things, that is, the devices, were taken away first. They also took the inmates away with transports of 5,000 people, telling them they were going to Gross Rosen. I also declare that the ashes of the corpses were first buried and then thrown into the Vistula River.

I ask to be called to testify at the trial of Rudolf Höss."

10.4. The Testimony during the Höss Trial (1947)

Mandelbaum was questioned during the 8th hearing, on March 19, 1947. I translate the essential part of the testimony, rendered in a rather confusing way (to the point of arousing the hilarity of the courtroom), adding, where necessary, the appropriate explanations:¹⁸⁹

"They took us to Auschwitz. At Auschwitz they made a Russian get off, and they took us to Birkenau. At the sauna, we waited for the doctor for 3 days, without food, [then] the doctor came to examine us. Among us there were also old people; we were only 2 young blokes and a young girl.

Prosecutor: When did the witness arrive at Auschwitz?

Witness Mandelbaum: In early May 1944. After the [medical] examination the other inmates were taken away, and only the three of us remained. We weren't dressed in striped shirts yet, but in civilian clothes, and were sent into quarantine. After two months, an Arbeitsführer arrived and selected us for work. I arrived at Block 13, the so-called Sonderkommando [lived there]. I didn't want to go there, because I knew what this was about. Fire day and night; the transports arrived near that very crematorium. Naturally, I received beatings, and I can declare that I was made to go there by force, by violence. Finding myself there, I went to work for the first time after two days, of course to the crematorium. I thought I was in Hell, because I never saw a man [alive]. Corpses, corpses and more corpses. At first, I could not understand, I was even stunned, but after a while I returned to normal, and then I was able to observe how this unfolded. At that time, they did not cremate in the furnaces, but on pyres, because transports were arriving en masse, then there were Hungarian transports. We had to work 12 hours, in two shifts, the day shift and the night shift, and every week we alternated, those who worked at night worked during the day the following week, and vice-versa. A narrow-gauge railway was installed there, because the soil was clayey, so it was difficult to transport the dead. Our leader was Otto Mohl [sic], a great sadist, I can even say a pervert. There was also his substitute, a certain Schultz, and there were still others, whose names I do not remember. When a transport arrived, Mohl was standing on a bench – there were such benches there – and he gave them a speech: You have come to work; nothing bad will happen to you here; you will have a job, and you will go to your job. And now please take your clothes off, take a bath, leave your clothes, and you will have new ones. Well, people are so [gullible]. They went into the bathhouse.

This bathhouse was structured as follows: there was a hall in which 3,000 people entered, sometimes 2,500 people. The hall looked like this: temporary showers were installed. Of course, there were also water pipes. When a person entered for the first time, he really felt like he was in a bathhouse. When entering, [a sign] said: 'Entrance,' and on the last wall, on the last door, there was the writing 'Exit.' In this way, they deceived the people. When this bunker [bunkier] was full, SS men and the Kommandoführer closed the door, and immediately a truck with a red cross arrived. Two SS men got out of this truck; they wore gas masks and took out the 'cyklon.' It was a colorless gas, like rice starch before the war, but the color was blue. They threw the gas into the windows [do okienka] and closed them, so that no air could enter. The agony of these people lasted 7-8 minutes, depending on the amount of gas. If it was more, the agony was shorter, if it was less, it was longer.

After 7 minutes, the doors were opened on both sides so that there was a draft of air. They waited for the gas to dissipate, an hour. Based on when the next transport was supposed to arrive, these superiors of ours urged us: 'Faster, faster, and once again faster.' So after the opening, they went to these bunkers [do tych bunkrów]. When entering these bunkers – I apologize, High Court, but I must say it – everyone was soiled with vomit, had hemorrhaging blood, because everyone wanted to breathe, yet they breathed gas; but since the gas was colorless, they couldn't see it. People were even entangled. One was clinging to the other. When they understood where they were, it was too late; one clung to the other, as if they said: 'God's will be done'¹⁹⁰ – I have a hard time understanding it.

Now, I must point out that the inmates carried their valuables with them, because Moll ordered them to do so. When these objects were taken after gassing, they remained in the bunker. When the dead were carried out, the SS were present, and all these valuables were picked up and placed in a lockbox with two padlocks. This box was near Oberscharführer Moll, in his office. After a while, when it was full, it was taken away. Whither? That is unknown.

When the people were pulled out of the bunker, their hair was cut, and their gold teeth were extracted. For this, specialists were chosen. There was a dentist by profession, there was a barber, as far as I know, the High Court, there were also professors, lawyers, etc. These [the gold teeth] were cleaned and placed in this box. At the camp there was a goldsmith, he was [held] under lock and key and guarded by the SS. He cast this gold into bars. As a comrade from this Kommando told me, in 1942, they took away from Auschwitz – not much, but about 4 gold wagons, about 30 trains [sic] – I can't say exactly, maybe 25 of them just spectacles. Also various things: shoes, duvets, clothes, all of which, as I was told, was shipped from somewhere to Berlin. There [to that job], only Germans were assigned. They evidently wanted to pilfer this. I want to say one more thing.

Once, during my time [during my stay at the camp], a group of 5 or 6 people arrived from Berlin, high personalities; I don't know the German ranks. Of course, the camp commandant Höss came also. He got out of the Mercedes first, because, as the camp representative, he had come to visit his factory. He wanted to show these [Berlin] representatives who had arrived what he was capable of doing. He turned to the inmates. He grabbed a corpse by one leg, Oberscharführer Moll by the other, Schulte by the third, another Kommandoführer by the fourth (laughter in the courtroom).

Presiding Judge: Not by a leg.

Witness: I apologize, by an arm. He wanted to show how this work was to be done, at what speed. So, they grabbed a dead man and threw him into the fire.

Presiding Judge: In the open fire?

Witness: Yes, it was on an open fire. On the pyres. Then only our superiors, that is, the Kommandoführer, began to beat us with batons, as the work did not go the way we had been shown, because there was no time, because another transport was about to arrive. But the men [of the Sonderkommando] didn't give a damn, because they also have had enough of how they had to work [i.e. the pace of work], but they were more at liberty to waste time. The more at liberty they worked, the fewer transports would arrive.

Presiding Judge: How did you think that fewer transports would arrive?

Witness: For no reason. Then once among us – it was not in my time, but a comrade told me about it – it happened that the inmates who worked in the crematorium were exterminated. Why? Lest this comes to light. So, the SS men got organized for this task. They pretended to take them [the inmates] to other camps, and then took them back to the crematorium. Since now the prisoners had been dispensed with, only they [the SS] themselves carried out the cremation, as I deduce precisely from the fact that the prisoners did not talk about it [about the SS having carried out these cremations themselves].

Presiding Judge: Is that all?

Witness: I can also specify how many people more or less could perish of the Greek and Dutch transports, as my comrades told me.

Presiding Judge: Please, the witness will speak.

Witness: As my companions told me, for a certain period of time, they cremated like this: there were 4 large pits 25 meters long, 2.5 meters deep and 15 meters wide. This was a factory. The second factory was maybe 2 meters away. When smaller transports arrived, the furnaces were put back into operation.

...in these new furnaces,^[191] which were built, not during my time, in 1942-1943, another crematorium was also built, there were two furnaces, in each there were two hearths. It was fired with wood, the binders [segregatory; sic] from the back.^[192] When a furnace was well heated, so that the refractory lining was red, then they still didn't cremate, because when a corpse was introduced, it burned, like paper, completely to the end. When another transport arrived, it then was burned so that they did not heat up a second time.^[193] Over the entire period of time, as my comrades told me, over 4.5 million [people] perished in Auschwitz. In addition to gassings, people from our [sic] transport were occasionally shot when they were deported [here] from freedom [from outside the camp]. They were conspirators who came in groups of 40, 50, 70 people. Once, in my time, in 1944, about 123 American citizens were brought in; then they were also shot. Various partisans were also shot.

Presiding Judge: How does the witness know that they were American citizens?

Witness: Because among us there were some who worked on the clothes, loaded the clothes onto the trucks, took them to the screening, where they were sorted, what was best and what was worst, so they asked [the deportees] where they came from. They replied, if I'm not mistaken, that they were brought from another camp, where they didn't stay long, so they were wearing civilian clothes, did they say they were American citizens? [sic]

Prosecutor Siewierski: Can the witness explain in more detail what his own work consisted of, what the witness himself was doing in this Sonderkommando during the cremation?

Witness: More than once I loaded clothes onto a truck.

Prosecutor Siewierski: The clothes that remained behind after the people had gone into the bunker?

Witness: More than once wood was placed under the fireplaces when a transport was to arrive, because when cremation occurred in the pits, every now and then you had to extract the ashes, and light it up again, and make [build] the hearth [the pyre] again, because over time so much accumulated that the ashes reached the surface of the ground. Before they were extracted from one pit, another one was burning, and this happened alternately. The ashes that were extracted were refined [made fine], there were pestles made of wooden logs. It was reduced to dust.

Prosecutor Siewierski: How did you explain that [the ashes] were sifted and crushed?

¹⁹³ There was no need to reheat the furnaces.

Witness: So that the infamy they committed did not come to light.

Prosecutor Siewierski: How did you know what would become of these ashes?

Witness: Sure, we knew that. When the transports were smaller or sporadic, one part [of the Sonderkommando inmates] took care of these ashes, the other part attended to their work. In the area where the crematorium was, pits were dug, gravel was brought from the Sola River, and the ground was leveled, a roller [steamroller] was brought, we were the carthorses. After some time, they considered that [the ashes] perhaps might have come to light. Perhaps someone would have fled and [then] would have come here to point out this place. So, we dug it up again, extracted the ashes, refined it again, and it was taken to the Vistula River.

Prosecutor Siewierski: Who took it?

Witness: The inmates of the Sonderkommando, but the Kommandoführer guarded them.

Prosecutor Siewierski: How was the staff of the Sonderkommando, how many people?

Witness: There were 120 on our shift, sometimes 110, some got sick, [others] fled.

Prosecutor Siewierski: How were you accommodated in the housing barracks which had no contact with the camp?

Witness: No, at the beginning, I think in September, we were at the camp together with everyone else, but in the housing block, which was fenced in, so that there was no contact, so that we did not inform the inmates of what was happening, but [the Germans] they were foolish, because we were smarter.

Prosecutor Siewierski: So, you told your comrades?

Witness: Of course. On March 5, two years have passed since the commission arrived from Moscow, and I was there, too, as a member of this Kommando. The older inmates knew that there would be nothing of us as well [that no one would survive], and they recorded how many transports there were, recorded the dates; and all this data, along with the camera, was put in a mess tin, and it was buried. I am aware of it. It was buried when the crematorium was set on fire. When we came together with the [Soviet] commission, I pointed out all the pits where the ashes were, and where this mess tin and the camera were; everything was handed over.

Prosecutor Siewierski: What else did the witness do besides receiving clothes and working on the ashes?

Witness: When there were mass transports, many railway cars of wood arrived, beech lumber, split into logs. We had to unload it from the car and take it about a mile to the workplace. If there were no transports, they ordered us to make a screen [blendę¹⁹⁴], a fence of branches, around the crematorium. [This] kind of work depended on a Kommandoführer.

Prosecutor Siewierski: Where did the SS not let [you] in?

¹⁹⁴ The Polonized German word “Blende”.

Witness: We could go anywhere. We had access to the whole area. We didn't have a certain type of work assigned. Once I could work on clothes, on the second, third day, I could go to [do] another job.

Prosecutor: Did the witness bring it [the wood] to this gassing bunker?

Witness: Yes, there was a narrow-gauge railway, two wagons with which the gassed people were brought to these pits.

Prosecutor: Please tell me exactly what it was like when Höss showed the SS men how they had to quickly throw the corpses.

Witness: A certain delegation had arrived from Berlin. They had come in their vehicles. They arrived, they observed how this work proceeded, how the cremation was done quickly; with an ironic smile they said that it was going formidably, that [the corpses] burned like paper. The Kommandoführer became confident and goaded on the work, began to rush [the inmates]. It was difficult work. Often the corpses weighed 80-90 kg, often the detainee [of the Sonderkommando] was weak and exhausted, it [the work] did not proceed as efficiently as it had to. Then Höss ordered how they had to work. The first time, I took a well-fed one [corpse], but if you had to work like this all day...

Prosecutor: Who helped you?

Witness: Moll, Schulte, Untersturmführer, Kurschluss, Ottomar, our capos, two stars, the [their] rank.

Prosecutor: Did the witness work at the Sonderkommando until the end?

Witness: Yes. Until the end, in January 1945. We were evacuated to Gross Rosen with the last transport. I managed to escape along the road to Jastrzębie-Zdrój. I hid for 4 weeks. I had been in the Sonderkommando since June 1944. In October [1944], the gassing of people ceased, the demolition of the crematoria began. At the beginning, the tiles and rafters were removed, the furnaces were ordered to be dismantled; these crematoria were modern installations, the undressing rooms were underground, also the gassing bunkers [bunkry do gazowania], and with the elevators from the bunkers [z bunkrów], the corpses were carried to the furnaces. So, we drilled holes in the walls until December 1944. Charges of dynamite were inserted into these holes. We all went to the camp, and then everything was blown up. Then all these facilities were dismantled and taken away. I do not know where.

Prosecutor: Witness, talk about the last selection.

Witness: It happened like this: 400 of the older workers were selected who had been working for 2 years. It was in September or early October. I don't remember the date. It was organized like this, they took 100 people. [...]

Prosecutor Cyprian: I would like to ask two questions. May the witness please describe this revolt in the crematorium?

Witness Mandelbaum: [It happened] in October 1944, when our SS leaders had to take the inmates of our Kommando away in a transport as before, that means they had to kill and cremate them themselves, without us – but they didn't succeed. Because when they arrived at the crematorium, whither we had been transferred from the camp, and we were all spending the nights in the crematoria, three-level bunks and straw mattresses were set up there, and we stayed there for a month; when they arrived to take us away, a revolt broke out among the inmates. When the SS arrived to line them up in rows of four, their commandant and others were hit with a hammer. There was panic. They [The inmates] joined the fray. The crematorium was set on fire. The alarm was given [and] firefighters rushed from all over the camp to extinguish it. But they did not extinguish it, because the building was made of wood, only the skeleton [walls] and the furnaces remained, because they were made of iron. Of course, the commandant arrived, guards were organized and reinforced to surround these inmates, but they managed to cut the barbed wire to the women's camp in order to escape. Unfortunately, however no one [from this sector] fled. When the fire broke out in the other crematoria – because it was all a parallel line [the crematoria were located along the same line] – so that the other [inmates] saw that something was wrong; when they saw the fire that had been started simultaneously, they managed to disarm the SS men who were on guard stands, and then 5 SS men were killed. But they could not escape, because at a distance of 7 km, there was a guard picket of SS men, and they were all captured, indeed killed, because they did not let themselves be taken alive. In the evening, at 7, they brought all the killed [fugitives] to us to verify that no one was alive. At the same time, the 200 remaining people who had provoked the revolt were also shot by an Unterscharführer whose name I do not know. After all this, the deputy commandant arrived and gave the order that, if something similar were repeated, everyone in the camp would be shot to the last man. After all this, normal work resumed.

I return to what I forgot to say. When the transports arrived, a doctor came – Höss will know his name; he chose healthy people and women from the transports, about 30-40; from each they extracted the blood completely from the aorta, and then they were shot. Men got their muscles cut mainly from the legs, and [the flesh] was put in sheet-metal crates which were then taken I don't know where, but we assumed to the German hospital for soldiers who had been wounded by shrapnel at the front, so they wanted to treat them this way.

Prosecutor Cyprian: One more question. The witness stated that this staff at the crematorium [was divided] into two shifts, and that the crowds of people from the railway ramp arrived one after the other at the cremation. Did these people realize along the way what awaited them? After all, flames could be seen there. Did they go there calmly, without suspecting anything?

Witness Mandelbaum: They did not see them; perhaps some realized, but in general they were so naive that they did not understand.

Prosecutor Cyprian: Did the people come to understand that they are going in to their death only when they were in the camp?

Witness: Yes.

Defense Counsel Ostaszewski: The witness arrived at the camp in May 1944. Who was the camp commandant then?

Witness: When I arrived, the commandant of the Birkenau Camp was a certain Schwarzhuber.^[195]

Defense Counsel Ostaszewski: Was Birkenau subordinate to the Auschwitz Camp?

Witness: It was subordinate.

Defense Counsel Ostaszewski: And who was the commandant of the whole camp?

Witness: Höss.

Defense Counsel Ostaszewski: Didn't the witness hear about another commandant?

Witness: After Commandant Schwarzhuber, there was another commandant, but I don't remember his name.

Defense Counsel Ostaszewski: When did this other commandant arrive?

Witness: I don't remember.

Defense Counsel Ostaszewski: The witness spoke about the cremation in the crematorium. [This] interests me for a moment. The gassing, as the witness states, lasted less than 7 minutes. And how long did the entire cremation last more or less in the crematorium?

Witness: In normal furnaces, as they were built [in] the new crematoria, this means a new system – because there was an old and a new system. It [the cremation] lasted depending on the person. If people were lighter, they loaded 3, 4 and even 5 into a furnace; there were 10 of these furnaces. This means that 50 corpses were loaded at a time. The cremation lasted 12-13 minutes [spalenie trwało 12-13 minut]. This depended on the weight of the corpse, but I'm talking about an average man – 12 to 15 minutes. I can't say exactly.

Defense Counsel Ostaszewski: Did the witness see the camp commandant separately from the inner camp commandant, the so-called Lagerführer?

Witness: I once saw the camp commandant – Höss himself – riding a horse. The inmates who saw him from afar said: the commander is coming, and everyone disappeared, everyone slipped into a hole like rats. Then I recognized the main commandant, namely Höss.

Defense Counsel Ostaszewski: Was he far away from the witness?

Witness: Not far away, because I was almost on the spot.

Ostaszewski: More or less when was that, in relation to the witness's stay in the camp?

Witness: In [the first] two or three months.

Defense Counsel Ostaszewski: That is, it could have been in September 1944.

Witness: In July or September 1944.

Presiding Judge: I have another question for the witness. In relation to what the witness stated, that 4-5 people were loaded per furnace if they were lighter, and if they were bigger, they put more, how should we understand that.[?]

¹⁹⁵ Back then, SS Obersturmführer Johann Schwarzhuber was 1. Schutzhaftlagerführer (first leader of the protective-custody camp) of the Birkenau male camp.

Witness: Quite the contrary, I stated that if people were lighter [they loaded] more, if they were heavier, fewer.

Attorney Umbreit: I still have a question. Wasn't the witness wrong, can he assert with great firmness that the accused threw the corpses into the furnace when these four [Höss, Moll, Schulte and "another Kommandoführer"] demonstrated how the work was to be done?

Witness: Yes.

Attorney Umbreit: Was he at the crematorium or at the fire [pyre] outdoors?

Witness: I was at the open fire.

Attorney Umbreit: When?

Witness: One evening.

Attorney Umbreit: But in what month?

Witness: I can't remember that.

Attorney Umbreit: But more or less?

Witness: It was, I think, during the Hungarian transports.

Defense Counsel Ostaszewski: More or less how much time could have passed since the witness's arrival [at the camp], two, three, four months?

Witness: About two months, I can't say exactly.

Defense Counsel Ostaszewski: So, when did the witness see Höss on horse-back?

Witness: It was on a quiet day, when there was hardly any transport. We cleaned that place, after each transport it had to be cleaned, because another transport was arriving.

Ostaszewski: But does the witness know that from 1943 Höss was commandant of a camp elsewhere?

Witness: I am not aware of it."

Later Höss was called to respond; speaking of Adolf Eichmann, he declared:

"On the occasion of his [Eichmann's] visit to Auschwitz, he ascertained that the installation of Crematorium No. 5, which was used for outdoor cremations, was immobilized [inactive], and the extension of the railway branch that was located at the camp was not even considered and neglected. On the basis of these observations, Reichsführer Himmler ordered that I personally carry out this action in Auschwitz. [...]

I remember then that I hastened the extension of the station, of the railway branch that was inside the camp with the necessary tracks and that then the outdoor-cremation installation, the so-called Installation V, was reactivated, and the Kommando was strengthened for sorting the luggage of the condemned [...].

After exploitation [intense use] for cremation, the crematoria became themselves useless for further use within 8-10 weeks, so that continuous work was impossible in these individual crematoria."

10.5. The Testimony during the Trial against the Garrison (1947)

At the end of November 1947, Mandelbaum also appeared as a witness during the Krakow Trial. During the 5th hearing, he made the following statements:¹⁹⁶

“In 1944, at the end of May or the beginning of June, I was interned in the Auschwitz Camp. At first, I was in quarantine for just under two months, and one day the ‘Arbeitsdienstführer’ [leader of labor services] showed up and assigned me to the so-called Sonderkommando in Block 13.

When I went to work the first time, I immediately realized where it was taking place, I realized that I was in hell, full of corpses, fire, SS personnel everywhere watching those who worked, and urging them to remove as quickly as possible the corpses of the gassing victims, because new transports were arriving.

Cremation, when I worked there, took place in pits and on pyres. The pyres were made in this way: they were about 30-35 meters long, about 15 meters wide. The preparation for the cremation of the gassed people was carried out in this way: large transports of wood or so-called split logs were brought with wagons, they were unloaded into the pits, then branches were brought from the woods, and only on such a layer were the gassed corpses thrown. A railway was built from the gas chamber to the pits, by means of which corpses were transported on platforms to the pits, where they were then thrown in. When part of the corpses had already been thrown into it, they were doused with gasoline, and the pyre was lit at the four corners, then, according to the combustion of the bodies, the second layer of corpses and wood was thrown onto it so that the pits burned continuously for 24-48 hours. After the cremation followed the removal of the ashes from the pits, and its transport to the same place where the crematorium was. When no transports arrived, but camp inmates were brought, they were not gassed, but shot, during my stay by Oberscharführer Foss [Voss]. They were executed with a small-caliber weapon with a shot to the spine. When there were larger transports, the inmates employed in that Kommando were ordered to crush all residues into ashes and dust, and bury them in a pit. When the pit was filled with such ashes, it was leveled, gravel was brought from the Vistula River, and a few layers of gravel were poured into it, so that the pit had to be [appear] completely filled with gravel, and so it was disguised, so that the world would not ever know what had happened in Auschwitz. Then, when Oberscharführer Mohl [Moll] Otto took over from Foss, his orders were very strict. Mohl improved the work day by day for the benefit of the camp administration. He then ordered that around the crematorium screens [blendy¹⁹⁷] were set up, that is, branch fences. When this fence was made, he ordered that the ashes not be buried inside the camp, but that it be brought by trucks to the Vistula River, and so it was done. And now I will tell how the transports were gassed during my time there. There were Hungarian, Slovakian, Greek transports, some from Holland, from Belgium, some from France, and once 100 American citizens arrived from Warsaw who were shot. When a small transport of people arrived, it was evidently not worth the effort to gas them. The more people there were in the gas chamber, the faster the gassing proceeded. In [Crematoria] III and IV, the gas chambers were smaller, while Crematoria I and II were crematoria of a new type: a transport of about 3,000 people entered into them. Such a bunker was about 50 meters long; it was divided into two parts. In this bunker, there was a makeshift bathhouse with showers, taps, so that, when normal persons entered it, they could believe that it was really a bathhouse, especially when it had been praised during the journey, or after arrival on the spot at Auschwitz, as Hauptscharführer Mohl did, who gave the people a speech [saying] that they had come to work and would receive a farmstead there. Although they had left many riches in the place from which they had been deported, there they would receive more in return; they would work, settle and live there. Then he ordered them to undress, telling them that they would receive other clothes, because they would go to a place where cleanliness had to reign, so that certain diseases would not spread. Naive as the people were, they believed it, undressed normally, and after they had undressed, they went inside for a bath. They were not allowed to take valuables with them, which remained in the undressing room,^[198] they would get them back [later]. When the gas chamber was finally full and the door was hermetically sealed, then cyklon was poured in, which asphyxiated the people. At the same time, since there were also old, sick and disabled people in the transport, in order to deceive them, a Red Cross ambulance arrived that was driven by two SS [men]. The sick people were taken away in an ambulance, and then they were destined for gassing. In the gas chamber, there were two ventilation openings [*lufty*¹⁹⁹], which had an earth filling [around them] from above to a thickness of about one meter, [and] on which a plate [plyta] was placed. When a transport was in the gas chamber, two SS men donned the gas mask, and the pouring in of the cyklon followed. The people in the gas chamber were in agony for about 7 minutes, during which time some of them bled. Once the gassing was over, gas was still released after the chamber was opened, and the inmates who worked there often succumbed to the gassing [the gas], although they did not die. The chambers were opened after about 15 minutes and were ventilated. Masks were worn, and the corpses were taken away from the chamber, and nearby was the freight elevator which carried the corpses to the furnaces. There were 5 furnaces with three hearths [muffles]. Three inmates were on duty at each furnace. This means, two to load them on the elevator and one to unload them; that inmate put the corpses on the so-called pan. On the furnace, there was a spool [szpulka] with 2 wheels like a cutter; this facilitated introducing it [the “pan”] into the furnace.^[200] In each furnace, 4 corpses were placed, 6 if they were frail. The cremation lasted 12, 13 and 15 minutes. Such a transport of 3,000 people, as the Kommandoführer always said, had to be cremated in one [work] shift. [...]

¹⁹⁸ During the Höss Trial, however, the witness had stated the opposite: "Now I must emphasize that the inmates carried their valuables with them, because Moll ordered them to do so."

¹⁹⁹ Polonized word of the German "Luft," air, here evidently in terms of a ventilation opening.

Prosecutor: Was the witness interested in how the gassing process unfolded as such?

Witness: Yes, I saw it.

Prosecutor: What was the doctor’s role in this gassing?

Witness: After the selection, a transport arrived from the camp, usually with trucks. The doctor monitored the inmates who went into the gas chamber, [to see] whether they went there voluntarily or resisted. There were cases in which inmates realized they were going into the gas chamber, and they resisted. In this case, the SS would come running with dogs, or stand on either side and force the inmates into the gas chamber with blows.

Prosecutor Szewczyk: Was this doctor interested in the unfolding of the gassing, when the gas chambers was opened?

Witness: This doctor, I don’t know his name, was present when the inmates were pushed into the gas chambers, and when it was opened, he supervised the whole cremation every time. The gassed people were pulled out of the chambers and thrown into the fire.

Prosecutor Szewczyk: How was it that the witness himself did not perish, as did the other Kommandos [komanda]?

Witness: In October [1944], they had to transfer a transport of 100 people. The strongest men were then selected who had been in the camp for a year or a year and a half. I was still a novice. Some of the inmates who worked in a [gun] powder factory in Birkenau brought powder to our camp, with which we made hand grenades. Some even had weapons. When this transport was to leave, the revolt was proclaimed. The inmates lined up in front of the crematorium for the departure threw themselves on the SS [men], the crematorium itself was set on fire, some of the soldiers were disarmed, and the SS [men] who were on the guard towers were disarmed or killed. Then, 14 inmates managed to escape beyond the limits of the camp. During the escape, the fences of the women’s camp were cut, but none [inmate] wanted to escape. The SS organized a hunt, and all [the fugitives] were captured and shot, even all those who had to leave with the transport. Then we had to lie down with our face on the ground.

Prosecutor Pęchalcki: The witness described the time when corpses were cremated in outdoor pits. Did he himself also cremate in the crematorium at that time?

Witness: Yes, I cremated.

²⁰⁰ This “pan” was the corpse introduction stretcher (Trage or Einführtrage or Leichentrage). The “spool with 2 wheels” were the roller guides (Laufrollen) mentioned earlier.

Prosecutor Pęchalski: Did they cremate in the pits because the crematoria were overloaded?

Witness: That's right.

Prosecutor Pęchalski: Did the SS go to the crematorium in a Red Cross ambulance?

Witness: Yes.

Prosecutor Pęchalski: Was the cyklon was also brought by ambulance?

Witness: That's right. Apparently, it was under the seat.

Prosecutor Pęchalski: Does the witness know whether the bodies of the gassed were desecrated by cutting their hair and extracting their teeth?

Witness: Yes, I know.

Prosecutor: Does the witness know the defendant Koch?

Witness: Yes, I know Koch, Muhsfeldt, Münch and Götz [Paul Götze].

Prosecutor: What were they doing?

Witness: I saw Muhsfeldt at the crematorium. He used to come there often. I know the others only from the camp, when they had contact with our Kommandoführer. Therefore, I only know them by sight."

10.6. The Interview (2003-2004)

The text of this interview contains a lot of personal data and various digressions. From the perspective of this study, the book's most-important chapter is the third, titled "In the Crematoria."

After three weeks of quarantine, Mandelbaum worked for another two weeks in a warehouse, then was selected with five other inmates to join the "Sonderkommando."²⁰¹

Here are the dialogues relating to this essential part of this testimony (questions in bold as in the original):

"What was your first day of work in the Sonderkommando like?

They took us to work at crematorium V. Bodies of people who had been gassed were everywhere. [...]

They transferred me there after about a month, and I worked there for a couple of weeks, but afterward they sent me back to 'number five.' Right to the very end. [...]

Who gave the instructions?

Everybody knew what to do without talking. Yet the revulsion remained. I didn't want to pull the deceased by the hands, because the bodies had lain there quite a while waiting to be burned and it sometimes happened that the skin came off the hands like a glove. So I came up with the idea of making a special loop out of a shirt. On the other side of the crematorium where the undressing room was, clothing was lying around that had not yet been collected from the undressing room. So I took one of the shirts, ripped it, made myself something on the order of a cord, and dragged the bodies with the use of that loop. That means two of us dragged, because the head of the deceased gets in the way when you drag by the arm.

How did the other men react?

The same as me. They saw themselves in those deceased.” (pp. 42-44/36-38)

“What did the burning technology look like?”

The technology is short and to the point. In Oświęcim, the crematorium that exists to this day was primitive. Number four and number five in Brzezinka were just as badly thought out. When three transports of a thousand people each came in, you couldn’t get it done even in three shifts. That was why the Germans decided it would be better to use pyres than the burners in the old crematoria. They thought they could burn more on the pyres.

In the new crematoria, on the other hand, the technical solutions were very advanced. Above all, the furnaces were well ventilated [piece dobrze wentylowane] and the fire was fed by the fat from the bodies so it burned faster. An elevator brought the deceased up to be burned from the underground chamber.

I even thought up a small improvement – when you drag the deceased from the elevator, you have to pull them along a shallow gutter in the concrete. I poured water on that concrete so it would slide. Because the skin always sticks a little and makes it harder to pull.

Did they teach you burning techniques?

Nobody planned this. It was worked out in practice. Like when an engineer walks into a factory. He has the theory, but not the practice. Basically, people used two techniques. Some placed the deceased directly on the tray when it was on the rollers, but in this way they risked the deceased shifting. It was better to put the deceased on the tray first, and only then to place the tray on the rollers. One of us always had a sort of ‘pitchfork’ to push the body inside by the crotch. The legs couldn’t be left sticking out because then the doors wouldn’t close tight.

How many corpses would fit at once into a single furnace?

We burned three people at a time in a furnace, and even four if they were thin, but seldom, because if a person was thin we put them off to the side to add them to the fatter ones. A stout person burns like wood chips. Just as there’s sap in wood chips, there’s fat in a person. The bones of a thin person, before they reach the appropriate temperature, burn like oaken wood. A camp muzulman weighed thirty kilograms, so you can imagine how he burned. Sometimes not everything burned, and there were leg bones or bits of skull left. When you put new bodies in, they caught fire immediately from the temperature.

How long did it take to reduce them to ashes?

Fifteen to twenty minutes.” (pp. 44f./39,42; pp. 40f. has a photo)

“Was burning corpses on pyres different from in the furnaces?”

The corpses were arranged for the pyres in pits. The burning was different, slower. Pieces of wood were placed between the layers of corpses. In addition, we placed a fir tree, brought from Kobiór, on the pyre. Petrol or used oil was poured on. Sometimes the flames rose to four or five meters. The smoke was yellowish-gray. The fire was good until all the wood burned. The heads, legs, and arms burned fast but the trunks and thighs remained. It was like with wood – the branches burn first, and the trunk smolders slowly.

The fat didn't have a chance to burn; it ran in gutters to holes. This fat was collected in little pans and poured on the pyre. So the deceased in the pits fried rather than burned. It took the right temperature for the intestines, livers or hearts to start burning. And the bodies in the pits sizzled like pork cracklings. They burst like chestnuts thrown into a fire. That was why, when the pits were emptied, hooks were used to throw the thighs and guts into another pit.

Burning in the pits was not well thought out, there was lots of work involved, and in the end the deceased did not burn the right way.

What size were the pits?

Pit is the wrong word. They were more like ditches. They were a meter or maybe a meter and a half deep, I can't say precisely because we never removed the ashes to the bottom. But I don't think they were any deeper, because why should they be? The bigger the pit, the worse the burning. It was terribly primitive in comparison to crematoria, especially modern ones. I once wanted to go to Ruda Śląska, where there's a private crematorium now, and see how it looks today, just out of curiosity." (pp. 46/42f.)

Describing Crematorium II, Mandelbaum said that the gas chamber was divided in half (w połowie).

"Could you smell the stench of burning corpses in the furnace hall?

No. You really couldn't smell anything there. It wasn't as primitive as what you can see at the crematorium in Oświęcim. It was colossal, modern! Behind the furnaces was a machine room that fed the fire with air. That's why the temperature was right and it went fast. Aside from that, the deceased were not loaded with the help of carts, as in the old crematorium. I feel for the crews that had to work like that." (pp. 47/44)

"Could the fire from the pyres be seen from far away?

Of course. At night there was such a glow that you could read a book by it.

How high were the crematory pyres?

They varied. Around two to three meters. I might be mistaken because the flames were high. That height was a problem because you had to really heave every time to throw the bodies onto the very top." (pp. 48/44f.)

"In various accounts there are descriptions of throwing living people into the fire. Otto Moll and other SS men supposedly permitted this.

When I was in the Sonderkommando, I didn't see such things. But it might have happened earlier. Back then, the work was even more 'fevered.' They brought people from all over Europe and there wasn't yet the proper flow of gassing and burning.

When working at the crematorium did you come across the corpses of children?

No.

Mr. Mandelbaum, the records clearly indicate that there were children in the transports.

But I didn't see it! You are speaking with a serious man, and I have lived through a great deal. I didn't come here to lie to the two of you. If I don't know something, I say I don't know. I did not see children. Maybe there weren't any on my shift.

Or perhaps your memory has erased these painful images.

There were women. But children? After all, I would remember children going to the gas, how they are burned." (pp. 49/45)

To justify this unique affirmation by Mandelbaum, the interviewers refer in a footnote to psychological studies of ex-inmates from which it appears that "in eyewitnesses, memory was highly selective" (pp. 49/45, Note 65).

"When you began working in the crematorium, the transports of Hungarian Jews were still arriving, and there were a lot of children among them.

When we were working three shifts, two other transports could arrive on the other shifts. And have you heard about the destruction of the Gypsies in Auschwitz?

Of course.

So, a multitude of people were murdered, and I never saw a single Gypsy on the pyre. I only heard from the other guys that there was some kind of fighting with them. They were obviously burned on another shift. I repeat that, when I was working, there were only childless transports." (pp. 50/48)

"How many prisoners worked in the crematorium on one shift?

There were five furnaces with three burners each, and so there must have been three men at each of them. In addition, people who threw the corpses from the gas chambers into the elevator. So there must have been about fifty to sixty of us." (pp. 52/49)

"Did members of the Sonderkommando assist during the undressing?

They sometimes helped people get undressed.

You too?

No, never. I worked upstairs at the furnaces.

Didn't you also work in the gas chamber?

Yes, at 'number five.'

Can you describe it?

It all looked like a bathhouse. There were four rows of showers [były cztery rzędy pryszniców]. People didn't realize what was going on at first." (pp. 52f./50)

“What did the road from the unloading ramp to crematoria IV and V look like?”

It was a long way. The people walked through the gate and entered a grove of trees. From the gate to the IV and V crematoria ran a long fence made of leafy tree branches. That fence was over two meters [ponad dwa metry] high and effectively screened the crematorium.” (pp. 54/54)

“What did they take into the chamber?”

What you usually take to the bath – a towel, soap, a toothbrush...” (pp. 56/55)

“Were masks available to those who went in first?”

No, I don’t remember any masks.

In what way was the chamber emptied?”

The door opened outward. We waited a moment [chwilę] until the rest of the gas dissipated. The gassed people covered the entire surface. Transports were managed in such a way that the crowding in the chambers was maximized. Because, as is known, the more crowding, the swifter the gassing. The bodies were standing because the density was so high that they could not fall over. In addition there were signs of spasms, hemorrhages, and feces. Just looking at it was enough for anyone.

The crystals of gas [kryształki z gazem] thrown through the opening fell directly on the people?”

Yes. It was different in ‘number two,’ where there were columns with screens [kolumny z siatki] in the middle of the gas chamber [pośrodku komory gazowej], and the gas fell into them. That means those bluish-greenish crystals.

Under what circumstances did you see these crystals?”

Cleaning the crematorium. They didn’t all manage to dissolve [nie wszystkie zdążyły rozpuścić], especially if they fell between people in a dry place.” (pp. 58f./58f.)

“What happened with the ashes?”

The ashes were removed from the furnace and heaped up at the side. Later we took a wooden stamper with a wooden slat or a piece of sheet metal on the bottom. We used this stamper to break up the bones. We ran the ashes through a sieve until the bones were as fine as salt. A truck came for these prepared ashes and took them to the Vistula.” (pp. 62/60)

“How do you recall the mutiny in the Sonderkommando?”

When the Kommando went out to work, one of our men ran over to the crematorium building and set fire to the mattresses, bunks, and wooden structures.” (pp. 70f./70)

“What was the rest of the Kommando doing in the meantime?”

Nothing. We stood there. Later we continued on our way to work.” (pp. 71/71)

“Did the idea of liquidating your Kommando come up at that time?”

That was obvious to us. We were aware that we no longer existed, that we were already deceased. But they kept us alive because they still had to dismantle the crematorium.

What did the work consist of?

We made holes for the charges in the concrete walls of the crematorium. We used a hand drill.” (pp. 73f./73f.)

“When did they march all of you out of the camp?

It was morning. When we left, there was snow on the ground in Oświęcim but there wasn’t much of a frost. Our Kommando marched as a separate column, seventy to eighty of us, for sure fewer than a hundred. I walked in the same row as the block boss, Georgi.

How many SS men guarded that column?

Six or eight.” (pp. 75/74)

During the march, Mandelbaum managed to escape in Jastrzębie (pp. 75/74).

“Have you come across people who say there were no gas chambers in Auschwitz?

Yes, I even wanted to pay a visit to a certain historian who writes such things. I felt like inviting him to Oświęcim and showing him everything.” (pp. 84/82)

“When did you first return to the camp as a free man?

Shortly after the war, when lots of people were searching and digging.

Did you hear about that or see it?

I saw it.

What did you see?

I saw people searching and digging in the ground in the grove of trees near the crematorium.

What were they looking for?

Gold, valuables.

Did you say anything to them?

Why should I? I saw it and I walked on. If they want to, let them search.

The men you worked with buried various objects in the ground, including their notes. Did you hear about that?

Yes. Today I know [dziś wiem] that they wrote down the transports arriving in Auschwitz. Back then, no one boasted about it. Such things were done in secret.” (pp. 86/84)

“Were there traces still left of the burning pits after the war?

Yes.

Until what year?

When I came again several years later, the pits were still there. Later, trees grew over them. Now there’s grass. I even thought that those pits should be preserved in some way because it would make it easier to explain things when people are guided around Auschwitz. They should have been shored up and covered in turf, but they caved in.” (pp. 87/85)

10.7. Critical Analysis of Henryk Mandelbaum's Statements

Except for the interview, Mandelbaum uses the Arabic numerals 1 through 4 for the Birkenau crematoria in his statements, which corresponds to today's common Roman numerals II through V. In the subsequent analysis, I use the following abbreviations:

- 1945: interrogation of February 27, 1945
- 1946: declaration of September 26, 1946
- 1947/1: testimony during the Höss Trial
- 1947/2: testimony during the trial against the Auschwitz camp garrison
- 2003-2004: interview granted to Igor Bartosik and Adam Willma.

In June 1944, Mandelbaum was assigned to Crematorium V and lodged in Block 13 of the Birkenau Camp Sector BII d (1947/2), where he remained until September, but “[a]t the beginning of October 1944, the Sonderkommando, who was housed in the camp, was transferred to stay in the crematorium, and we stayed there for about a month” (1945). The transfer perhaps took place “in September” (1947/1). Instead, as F. Piper points out, it necessarily “must have taken place before June 28, 1944, since the punishment [=penal] company moved into barracks 13 in camp BII d on June 29” (Piper 2000, p. 190). In contradiction to both, Dragon stated: ²⁰²

“At the end of May 1944, I was transferred together with the entire Sonderkommando from Block 11 of Sector BII d to Crematorium No. IV, where I stayed until October 1944.”

The task he was assigned to was burning the bodies of the gassing victims on the pyres (1945), but he was also involved in “loading clothes onto a truck after the gassings” (1946), arranging the wood for the pyres and extracting the ashes from burning the pits (1947/1), unloading and transporting wood from railway cars (1947/1), but he also worked “upstairs at the furnaces” (therefore in Crematoria II/III) and in the gas chamber of Crematorium V (2003-2004).

In one shift, there were 135 prisoners, and they worked 24 hours a day in two shifts of 12 hours each (1945), one during the day and the other during the night (1947/1), but one shift included 120, sometimes 110 inmates (1947/1); Furthermore, there were not two, but three shifts: “When three transports of a thousand people each came in, you couldn’t get it done even in three shifts,” “When we were working three shifts” (2003-2004). I will return to the meaning of this statement below.

These shifts did not include specific tasks (1947/1):

“We didn’t have a certain type of work assigned. Once I could work on clothes, on the second, third day, I could go to [do] another job.”

²⁰² AGK, NTN, 93, Vol. 11, p. 112; subsequent page number in the text from there unless stated otherwise.

This conflicts with Tauber's claims that, in Crematoria II/III, a shift of 60 inmates was divided into 11 teams, each with its own particular task.²⁰³

In 1945, Mandelbaum declared that 6,000-7,000 corpses were cremated in each shift. The number of victims was 1,500,000 or more, and in support of this figure, he put forward this calculation: the 20 monthly days of greater influx of transports for about four and a half months (June-October) multiplied by two shifts already give about one million, which is likely to be understood as follows: $[(6,000 + 7,000) \div 2] \times 20 \text{ days/month} \times 4.5 \text{ months} = 1,170,000$. To this million it was necessary to add "the corpses of executed people and of inmates who died in the camp," from which it is inferred that Crematorium V alone cremated 1,000,000 victims, the other three together about 500,000, and that only Crematorium V was used for extermination, since the other three treated only the corpses of registered inmates.

Dragon expounded a numerically more "moderate," but no-less-absurd version of this fable (p. 110):

"Such a work lasted for the months of May and June. Based on my observations, I calculate that in Crematorium No. V, during these two months, some 300,000 Hungarian Jews were cremated. These people arrived at Crematorium V on foot, directly from the Brzezinka unloading ramp."

Mandelbaum also repeated another, even-cruder tale, the one par excellence about the total death toll of Auschwitz, claiming that "over 4.5 million [people] perished in Auschwitz" (1947/1).

This madness was also declared by his two most important colleagues. Dragon (p. 111):

"I calculate the number of gassed people in the two Bunkers and four crematoria at over 4 million. The other inmates employed there had the same opinion."

Tauber (p. 150):

"In total, therefore, I calculate the aggregate number of people gassed in Auschwitz at about 4 million."

In his statements, Mandelbaum often used the term "bunker." It is pertinent to clarify that he meant with this the alleged underground gas chamber (Morgue #1) of Crematoria II and III, not the elusive gassing "bunker" called "Bunker 2" or "Bunker 2/V" or "Bunker V," of which he made no mention. Precisely for this reason, he used the term both in the singular and in the plural. The following statement demonstrates this perfectly:

"these crematoria were modern installations, the undressing rooms were underground, also the gassing bunkers, and with the elevators from the bunkers, the corpses were carried to the furnaces." (1947/1)

²⁰³ GARF, 7021-108-13, pp. 35f.

“1000 to 1500” victims entered into “in each room” (gas chamber) of Crematorium V, which suggests that there were more than one, but the witness does not specify how many existed (1945). However, this installation contained at the same time “a hall in which 3,000 people entered, sometimes 2,500 people” (1947/1), a capacity practically identical to that of Crematorium II/III: “while Crematoria I and II were crematoria of a new type: a transport of about 3,000 people entered into them” (1947/2). Here, the gas chamber that he once more calls “bunker was about 50 meters long; it was divided into two parts” (1947/2), although it is known that the alleged gas chamber (Morgue #1) was 30 meters long, and its alleged subdivision into two rooms, also claimed by Tauber,²⁰⁴ finds no objective (documental) confirmation.

And here are his descriptions of the (only) gas chamber of Crematorium V:

“temporary showers were installed. Of course, there were also water pipes. When a person entered for the first time, he really felt like he was in a bathhouse. When entering, [a sign] said: ‘Entrance,’ and on the last wall, on the last door, there was the writing ‘Exit.’ In this way, they deceived the people.” (1947/1)

“It all looked like a bathhouse. There were four rows of showers” (2003-2004)

But the orthodox narrative has it that the alleged disguise of the gas chamber with fake showerheads (installed directly on the ceiling, without “water pipes”) occurred only in Crematoria II and III, as the witness stated at the garrison trial:

“In this bunker, there was a makeshift bathroom with showers, taps, so that, when normal persons entered it, they could believe that it was really a bathroom [...].” (1947/2)

Mandelbaum is also explicitly contradicted by Jankowski, for whom, as seen in Subchapter 9.1., the “gas chamber was neither equipped with mechanical ventilation nor with fake showers.” And since the “gas chambers” in Crematoria IV/V were not disguised as bathhouses, it makes no sense for the victims to have taken along “[w]hat you usually take to the bath – a towel, soap, a toothbrush...” (2003-2004), where the toothbrushes – where would they have come from? – are a claim unique to Mandelbaum.

Dragon has it that Crematorium V initially had three gas chambers, which later became four, with respective capacities of 1,500, 800, 600, and 150 people – while Mandelbaum spoke of 1,000-1,500 people “in each room.” Furthermore, Dragon claims that the sign over the door did not say “Entrance,” but rather “Zur Desinfektion” (“To disinfection”; p. 107).

²⁰⁴ AGK, NTN, 93, Vol. 11, p. 129: “At the end of 1943, the gas chamber was divided in two by a masonry wall, so that it was suitable for gassing smaller transports.” From an orthodox point of view, this doesn’t make much sense, because at the time there allegedly were two sets of three smaller gas chambers in Crematoria IV and V of about 43, 95 and 98 square meters, respectively.

Mandelbaum had rather strange ideas about Zyklon B: for him, it was made up of “bluish-greenish crystals” which failed to dissolve when staying dry! (“They didn’t all manage to dissolve [...], especially [...] in a dry place.”; 2003-2004).

Mandelbaum’s first, 1946, description of the devices for introducing Zyklon B evidently refers to Crematoria II and III, although he does not explicitly state so: “then the gas was introduced from the ceiling thanks to special devices. In one hall there were 4 gas-injection devices (cyklon).” In contrast to this is his second 1947 statement:

“In the gas chamber, there were two ventilation openings, which had an earth filling [around them] from above to a thickness of about one meter, [and] on which a plate was placed.” (1947/2)

Therefore, either there was a single gas chamber with four introduction openings, or there were two gas chambers, one of which had four openings, the other none, or there was one chamber with two openings.

The procedure claimed by Mandelbaum for Crematorium V was different: two SS men arrived in a Red-Cross truck and threw Zyklon “into the windows” (1947/1). The gas crystals fell directly on the victims, in contrast to Crematorium II, “where there were columns with screens in the middle of the gas chamber, and the gas fell into them” (2003-2004). However, the orthodox narrative has it that these columns had to be staggered on both sides of the central (longitudinal) concrete beam that supported the ceiling of the morgue. Mandelbaum attributed two contrasting functions to the Red-Cross truck and the two SS men: the transport of the Zyklon B and the deportees to the “gas chambers”: “in order to deceive them, a Red-Cross ambulance arrived that was driven by two SS [men]. The sick people were taken away in an ambulance, and then they were destined for gassing.” (1947/2)

How long did the gassing last? In this regard, Mandelbaum provided contradictory answers: “The people died within half an hour after the gas was administered to the chamber” (1945). “The agony of these people lasted 7-8 minutes, depending on the amount of gas” (1947/1). “The people in the gas chamber were in agony for about 7 minutes, during which time some of them bled” (1947/2).

Such a duration, as I noted above, is absurdly short. No-less-absurd is how the witness presents the ventilation of the “gas chambers”:

“After 7 minutes, the doors were opened on both sides so that there was a draft of air. They waited for the gas to dissipate, an hour.” (1947/1)

“Once the gassing was over, gas was still released after the chamber was opened, and the inmates who worked there often succumbed to the gassing [the gas], although they did not die. The chambers were opened after about 15 minutes and were ventilated.” (1947/2)

“We waited a moment until the rest of the gas dissipated.” (2003-2004)

But none of the claimed “gas chambers” had doors “on both sides”! Furthermore, ventilation began after 7 or after 15 minutes, and it lasted an hour, or just “a moment.” The victims were packed so tightly that they “stood on their feet” and “could not fall over,” even though they were dead (1945; 2003-2004), a fairly common nonsense among witnesses that was also regurgitated by Dragon (p. 106):

“When the chamber was opened, the corpses of the gassing victims were mostly lying. When they were very crowded, they were on top of each other, leaning against each other, some in an upright position with the trunk inclined.”

The way the workflow was organization according to Mandelbaum borders on madness, too:

“This means, two to load them on the elevator and one to unload them; that inmate put the corpses on the so-called pan. On the furnace, there was a spool with 2 wheels like a cutter; this facilitated introducing it [the “pan”] into the furnace. In each furnace, 4 corpses were placed, 6 if they were frail. The cremation lasted 12, 13 and 15 minutes. Such a transport of 3,000 people, as the Kommandoführer always said, had to be cremated in one [work] shift.” (1947/2)

Given that in a shift, which lasted twelve hours, 3,000 corpses had to be transported, it follows that two inmates had to load the elevator with $(3,000 \times 60 \text{ kg} \div 2 =) 90,000 \text{ kg}$ or 90 tons of bodies, and the upstairs one had to unload 180,000 kg or 180 tons! This also means that one corpse had to be handled in less than 30 seconds when loading downstairs, and in less than 15 seconds when unloading upstairs, without the slightest break, for twelve consecutive hours!

It is no-less-senseless that there was only one inmate involved in the extraction of gold teeth from 1,000-1,500 corpses (1945).

Utterly unique to him, Mandelbaum distinguished between “new” and “old” furnaces or crematoria, where the adjectives did not have a chronological meaning, but referred to technical advancement. For him, therefore, Crematoria II and III were “new,” while Crematoria IV and V were “old”. He in fact explicitly declared that the latter was “badly thought out”. When three transports of a thousand people each came in, you couldn’t get it done even in three shifts. That was why the Germans decided it would be better to use pyres than the burners in the old crematoria. They thought they could burn more on the pyres” (2003-2004). He had forgotten what he had asserted in 1945 that in Crematorium V, 6,000-7,000 corpses were cremated during each shift, hence 12,000-14,000 per day, and 24,000-28,000 when adding Crematorium IV. If that means these facilities were badly thought-out, how many corpses could Crematoriums II and III cremate, if those facilities were well-thought-out? I have already shown earlier all the absurdity of the figures adduced in this regard by Mandelbaum. Between these two pairs of crematoria, he inserts another, which cannot be part of either:

“[...] another crematorium was also built, there were two furnaces, in each there were two hearths.” (1947/1)

From this it can be deduced that it had 4 “hearths” (probably muffles), but the furnace of Crematoria IV and V consisted of two mirror-symmetrical parts bundle together in one single system. Each of them had four muffles, not two.

According to the fable bandied about during the immediately post-war era, the furnaces were abandoned in favor of the pyres, and Mandelbaum parrots that story as well:

“At that time, they did not cremate in the furnaces, but on pyres, because transports were arriving en mass, then there were Hungarian transports.” (1947/1)

And vice-versa (ibid.):

“When smaller transports arrived, the furnaces were put back into operation.”

According to Mandelbaum, “[t]hree inmates were on duty at each furnace” (1947/2), 15 people in all, but for Paisikovic, “[t]wo groups of inmates, with four men each, had to work on the furnaces as such. One group had 7 furnaces to operate, the other 8,” altogether eight people.

Between three and six (or four and six) corpses were loaded into each furnace, and since there were ten furnaces, between 30 and 60 corpses were loaded in one batch. Such a load burned within 12-15 minutes (1947/1; 1947/2), or in 15-20 minutes (2003-2004). With the term furnace, the witness clearly meant a muffle, but no crematorium had ten of them: I remind the reader that Crematoria II and III each had five furnaces with three muffles each, while Crematoria IV and V had one furnaces with eight muffles each.

The claimed duration for the cremation of one batch within 12 to 20 minutes, moreover with a load of three to six corpses, is blatant technical nonsense. More thermotechnical nonsense is the statement that “[w]hen you put new bodies in, they caught fire immediately from the temperature.” (2003-2004), as if the corpses were made of paper or dry wood! This absurdity was also part of the testimonial fables of the time.

Mandelbaum’s profound ignorance in terms of cremation furnaces and cremation also results from his claim that “[b]ehind the furnaces was a machine room that fed the fire with air” (2003-2004). At best this could be a false interpretation of the three forced-draft devices (Saugzuganlagen), which were originally installed for a few weeks in early 1943 in a room behind the furnace room next to the chimney of Crematorium II, but were removed a short while later.²⁰⁵ However, no such devices existed in any of the Birkenau crematoria during the time when Mandelbaum claims to have worked there. In addition, these devices were used to accelerate the combustion air going out the chimney, not to feed air into the muffles or hearths. The witness may have been influenced by what Nyiszli had written about it, who wrote erroneously (Mattoigno 2020a, p. 112):

“The motors of the big fans drone, the fires in the furnaces are revived.”

Precisely in this sense Mandelbaum asserted wrongly that the furnaces “were well ventilated,” while his subsequent statement that “the fire was fed by the fat from the bodies so it burned faster” is both banal and fallacious, because in any furnace of any crematorium, the body fat burned in the muffle and fueled the combustion, and it is absurd to consider this self-evident fact an exclusive feature of Crematoria II and III, depending on the fact that their “technical solutions were very advanced” (2003-2004).

In 1944, Alfred Wetzler and Rudolf Vrba had embroidered the tale of the presence of a commission of high-ranking personages from Berlin on occasion of the inauguration of Crematorium II in their well-known report on Auschwitz as follows:²⁰⁶

“At the end of February, 1943 a new modern crematorium and gassing plant was inaugurated at BIRKENAU. [...] Prominent guests from BERLIN were present at the inauguration of the first crematorium in March [sic], 1943. The ‘program’ consisted of the gassing and burning of 8,000 Cracow Jews. The guests, both officers and civilians, were extremely satisfied with the results and the special peephole fitted into the door of the gas chamber was in constant use. They were lavish in their praise of this newly erected installation.”

In subsequent iterations of this fable by other “witnesses,” the presence of Himmler himself at the head of this phantom commission was claimed, and the visit’s date was moved at will in order to serve the witnesses’ “needs.” For instance, those who had arrived at the camp in 1944 certainly could not expect to have seen Himmler in 1943, so they postponed the alleged visit to 1944. In this context, Mandelbaum put all his fervent imagination to good use, which transpires already in his first interrogation:

“Towards the end of August or September 1944, Himmler arrived from Berlin with other army generals and officers. They were in the crematorium during the second shift, when I wasn’t working. But the inmates of the Sonderkommando told me that the whole commission at the crematorium laughed and were satisfied. One said aloud: ‘The Jews burn well!’

During my stay there [at the camp], there were many commissions from Berlin, I don’t remember what they were.” (1945)

In his later statements, Himmler disappears and Höss comes to the fore:

²⁰⁶ The Extermination Camps of Auschwitz (Oswiecim) and Birkenau in Upper Silesia. FDRL, WRB, Box No. 6, pp. 12f.

“Once, during my time [during my stay at the camp], a group of 5 or 6 people arrived from Berlin, high personalities; I don’t know the German ranks. Of course, the camp commandant Höss came also. He got out of the Mercedes first, because, as the camp representative, he had come to visit his factory. He wanted to show these [Berlin] representatives who had arrived what he was capable of doing. He turned to the inmates. He grabbed a corpse by one leg, Oberscharführer Moll by the other, Schulte by the third, another Kommandoführer by the fourth (laughter in the courtroom).” (1947/1)

During that same testimony, the witness stated a little later:

“A certain delegation had arrived from Berlin. They had come in their vehicles. They arrived, they observed how this work proceeded, how the cremation was done quickly; with an ironic smile they said that it was going formidably, that [the corpses] burned like paper. The Kommandoführer became confident and goaded on the work, began to rush [the inmates]. It was difficult work. Often the corpses weighed 80-90 kg, often the detainee [of the Sonderkommando] was weak and exhausted, it [the work] did not proceed as efficiently as it had to. Then Höss ordered how they had to work. The first time, I took a well-fed one [corpse], but if you had to work like this all day...” (1947/1)

That Jews deported from ghettos “often” weighed 80-90 kg, is blatant nonsense, unless the SS had intentionally fattened them to exploit their body fat in the cremation pits!

Here is a glaring contradiction, which Mandelbaum created in order to introduce the farcical episode relating to Höss: if the commission had ascertained that the work “was going formidably,” that the corpses “burned like paper,” it certainly cannot be said that it “did not proceed as efficiently as it had to,” because it cannot have gone formidably well, if it was inefficient. Since Mandelbaum essentially testified against the defendant Rudolf Höss during that trial, this nonsense allowed him to assert that “Höss and Moll showed by their example how corpses were best thrown [into pits]” (1946).

The anecdote, as I will explain below, is utterly absurd.

Mandelbaum is at the same time very verbose and very reticent about the pyres. He never says how many they were, and where they were located, but describes them with many details, although in a contradictory way. However, it is clear from his statements that they were in the area of Crematorium V, and they were located in pits, as he explicitly states. Regarding the transport of the corpses, the witness asserted:

“A railway was built from the gas chamber to the pits, by means of which corpses were transported on platforms to the pits, where they were then thrown in.” (1947/2)

At Crematorium V, a “narrow-gauge railway was installed there, because the soil was clayey, so it was difficult to transport the dead.” (1947/1). A little later, the witness reiterated that “a narrow-gauge railway, two wagons with which the gassed people were brought to these pits.” (1947/1).

This too was part of the testimonial fable of the time, which even presented contradictory aspects. Two years earlier, in 1945, Tauber had stated:²⁰⁷

“Indeed, a trolley track was built between these pits, although we did not use these trolleys, [because] the SS considered them cumbersome, and the Sonderkommando inmates dragged the bodies of the gassing victims from the gas chambers directly into the pits.”

Therefore, for Mandelbaum the railway was built and used because the manual transport of the corpses was difficult, whereas for Tauber it was built but not used because the manual transport of corpses was less-cumbersome!

It goes without saying that the air photos of 1944 rule out the presence of such a railway. After all, Jankowski did not mention it at all, and did not draw it in his sketch of Crematorium V (see DOCUMENT 20). In the area of “Bunker V,” however, where the alleged cremation pits were much farther away from the “gas chambers,” meaning that trolleys on rails would have made more sense, the transport system of the corpses was manual, clumsy and inefficient: they were dragged on the ground by hooking a walking stick to the back of the head, if we are to believe Paisikovic!

Mandelbaum also takes up another fable that was widespread among some witnesses: the fence made of tree branches that was allegedly made in order to hide the activities at the crematorium:

“If there were no transports, they ordered us to make a screen, a fence of branches, around the crematorium.” (1947/1)

“He then ordered that around the crematorium screens were set up, that is, branch fences.” (1947/2)

“From the gate to the IV and V crematoria ran a long fence made of leafy tree branches. That fence was over two meters high and effectively screened the crematorium.” (2003-2004)

Jankowski represented it in his drawing as “plot z gałqzi,” a fence made of branches, which ran along the south side of the crematorium and then turned at right angles to the north, separating it from the supposed cremation pits (ibid.). But there is no documentary trace of this alleged fence, which must have been more than 100 meters long in total. In the air photo of August 23, 1943, a grove appears south (left) of the crematorium, and the area from which a plume of smoke emanates, north of the crematorium’s northwestern corner, is not separated from this building by any hedge (see DOCUMENTS 17f.). This fable was also taken up by Müller:

“Before that, Moll ordered to set up screens here and at the courtyards of Crematoria IV and V, about 3 meters high and made of long sticks, switches and brushwood, in order to prevent outsiders from glancing curiously at the extermination sites." (Müller 1979a, p. 200)

This was cut short in the published English translation as follows:

"Here as well as at the crematorium yards wattle screens had been put up to prevent the curious from looking in at the death factories from the outside." (Müller 1979b, p. 126)

A photograph taken in 1945 by professional photographer Stanisław Kolowca (1904-1968) shows a section of a dense fence made of wooden posts and shrubs; the caption is "Fragment of the wicker fence that masked the crematorium [sic]" (Bogusławska-Swiebocka, p. 168). The shooting angle is deliberately from a low perspective to give the impression that it was higher than it actually was. Pressac, who re-published the photograph, notes that the alleged height of 3 meters "seems to be exaggerated in view of the position of the camera" (Pressac 1989, p. 501). On the other hand, the photo does not reveal any detail that allows you to verify where this photo was taken. I will return to its interpretation later.

Here it is also appropriate to reiterate what Jankowski asserted in this regard in his 1980 statement for the Auschwitz Museum which I discussed in Chapter 9:

"Crematorium V was disguised from the side of the road by a temporary hedge with branches intertwined with iron wires fixed to trees and wooden posts. People destined for death undressed between this hedge and the crematorium when there was no time to clear out the undressing room.

The photo – one of three known as resistance movement photographs – showing women walking from a grove, was taken by us, that is, Alex, a Greek Jew, myself and others, from the vestibule leading to the gas chamber. [...]

The camera came from the luggage of the victims; there were only three free frames. Szmulewski removed the exposed film and we buried the camera near the crematorium; at the moment I am unable to indicate this location."

The camera was also mentioned by Mandelbaum:

"The older inmates knew that there would be nothing of us as well [that no one would survive], and they recorded how many transports there were, recorded the dates; and all this data, along with the camera, was put in a mess tin, and it was buried. I am aware of it. It was buried when the crematorium was set on fire. When we came together with the [Soviet] commission, I pointed out all the pits where the ashes were, and where this mess tin and the camera were; everything was handed over." (1947/1)

It follows that Jankowski knew of the photographs, but not where the camera had been buried, while Mandelbaum knew where it had been buried (and told the Soviet Commission, but it was not found), but he did not know about the photos. Another inconsistency should be noted here. When asked by the interviewers about the objects buried by inmates of the “Sonderkommando,” Mandelbaum replied:

“Yes. Today I know that they wrote down the transports arriving in Auschwitz. Back then, no one boasted about it. Such things were done in secret.” (2003-2004)

But at the 1947 Höss Trial he claimed that he already knew about clandestine transport records in 1944!

Returning to Jankowski, if the victims undressed either in the undressing room of Crematorium V or between the hedge and the crematorium, it follows that the photograph “showing women walking from a grove,” since they are naked outdoors, shows deportees who must have undressed in the free space between the crematorium and the hedge, but there are only trees in the background. Furthermore, as I documented in another study, the scene was photographed near the small pond located east of Crematorium IV. Therefore, if this shows women going to the “gas chambers,” as the photograph is usually explained, where had these victims undressed? And why does it show basins and containers from which water is being poured?

The most likely explanation is that, in an era of great influx of inmates, the “Central Sauna” was overloaded, and makeshift baths were set up near the pond.²⁰⁸ In this context, a wicker fence would have served only to protect naked women washing themselves from prying eyes.

According to Mandelbaum, the pits measured 25 m × 15 m × 2 m (1947/1); but the length was at the same time 30-35 meters long (1947/2) and “a meter or maybe a meter and a half deep” (2003-2004). In these pits, a layer of wood and one of corpses were arranged alternately up to ten layers and a total number of 150-180 corpses (1945). The pyre reached a height of “[a]bout two to three meters” (2003-2004). These data are absurd, because if the pit measured (25 m × 15 m × 2 m =) 750 cubic meters and rose two meters above the surface of the ground, the total volume of the pyre would have been 1,500 cubic meters, and each corpse with its wood occupied (1,500 m³ ÷ 180 =) more than eight cubic meters!²⁰⁹ If the pit was just one meter deep, that value would still be excessive: over 6 cubic meters. This is, however, Mandelbaum’s first, the least-illogical version. According to the other version, the pyre was not prepared first and then burned, but the layers of wood and corpses were subsequently thrown into the pit:

²⁰⁹ The approximately 300 kg of green wood required for the cremation of a corpse, as mentioned earlier, correspond to a little less than half a cubic meter of stacked wood. Some 8 cubic meters are therefore equivalent to the quantity of wood needed for the cremation of a little more than 16 corpses. See Fiala, p. 31. 1 cubic meter of stacked wood is in fact roughly equivalent to 0.70 cubic meters of solid wood, and vice-versa, about 1.4 cubic meters of stacked wood is roughly 1 cubic meter of solid wood.

“[...] corpses were transported on platforms to the pits, where they were then thrown in. When part of the corpses had already been thrown into it, they were doused with gasoline, and the pyre was lit at the four corners, then, according to the combustion of the bodies, the second layer of corpses and wood was thrown onto it so that the pits burned continuously for 24-48 hours.” (1947/2)

In the interview, Mandelbaum provided a third version, which in a certain way merged the previous two: corpses were thrown onto the pyre up to a height of 2-3 meters, but “[t]hat height was a problem because you had to really heave every time to throw the bodies onto the very top.” (2003-2004). However, since “[s]ometimes the flames rose to four or five meters,” “the flames were high” (ibid.), this practice of hurling corpses from the edge of the cremation pit onto the top of the pyre is no-less-absurd than throwing buckets of human fat into it. Therefore, the anecdote Mandelbaum relates about Höss, Moll and two other SS men grabbing a corpse by its four limbs and throwing it onto the pyre cannot be true.

At this point, Mandelbaum also regurgitated the rumor of the recovery of human fat, which he interpreted in an even more senseless way:

“The fat didn’t have a chance to burn; it ran in gutters to holes. This fat was collected in little pans and poured on the pyre. So the deceased in the pits fried rather than burned.” (2003-2004)

So not only did he make the absurd claim that the fat dripping from the corpses did not burn and could be collected, but for him the pyre had been transformed into a huge frying pan full of hot fat in which the corpses fried and “sizzled like pork cracklings”!

In these cremation pits, the corpses “burned completely” according to Janowski, but according to Mandelbaum, “[t]he heads, legs, and arms burned fast but the trunks and thighs remained,” so “when the pits were emptied, hooks were used to throw the thighs and guts into another pit. Burning in the pits was not well thought-out, there was lots of work involved, and in the end the deceased did not burn the right way” (2003-2004).

But then, it is not clear why the SS gave up on the crematoria for large transports in favor of the pyres, as he claimed during the Höss Trial, all-the-more-so since he also claimed that Crematoria IV and V alone could cremate 24,000-28,000 corpses a day!

It is also not clear how the cremation residues could be crushed with mallets or wooden pestles, since they were not perfectly burnt, brittle bones. The ashes from these pits pose another problem, because on the one hand “over time so much accumulated that the ashes reached the surface of the ground” (1947/1), which made this cremation technique impracticable, but on the other hand, “[a]fter the cremation followed the removal of the ashes from the pits” (1947/2).

The procedure of the SS to conceal the remains of the cremation narrated by the witness is rather strange, not to say senseless: they were thrown into specially dug pits in the crematorium area (presumably Crematorium V), but when they were full, gravel was brought from the Sola River or the Vistula River, which was poured over the pits, as the top layer, and compressed with a steam roller. Subsequently the pits were reopened, emptied, and the ash was thrown into the Vistula River (1947/1+2).

Mandelbaum insists on outdoor cremations during the night. We have already seen that the process he claimed lasted 24-48 hours (1947/2), and that the “fire burned incessantly – day and night” (1947/1), or rather “[a]t night there was such a glow that you could read a book by it”! (2003-2004). I have already noted earlier that such a practice was inadmissible, because at Auschwitz there was total nighttime blackout ordered from December 1943.

In the 2003-2004 interview, Mandelbaum made statements in direct conflict with the currently prevailing orthodox Holocaust narrative. First of all, he claimed that he never saw people thrown alive into the burning pits, a crime usually attributed to Moll, as Jankowski expressly stated: “Oberscharführer Moll threw these living children into the fire of the pits.” Furthermore, Mandelbaum never saw the corpses of children, and when challenged on this point, he resolutely insisted, but even this was contradicted by Jankowski: “Corpses of children were also burned there.” Bartosik and Willma, who must be lauded for having reported these statements, tried to explain them away by resorting to the alleged psychic traumas that would have made the memory of the survivors “highly selective”: “Or perhaps your memory has erased these painful images,” they suggested. But if that is so, why wasn’t Jankowski traumatized by this sight as well, leading to selective amnesia?

Mandelbaum, who probably did not expect the stern reaction of his interviewers, made his own attempt at explaining away his claimed lack of memories in this regard: perhaps the bodies of the children had all been gassed and cremated in his absence, that is, during a different shift, and, to increase the probability, introduced a non-existent third shift.

Equally surprising is his assertion that he never even “saw” the corpse “of a single Gypsy.” Even though it is unknown how anyone could identify a corpse as being a Gypsy by just looking at it, fact is that, according to his colleague Jankowski, the Gypsies were gassed and cremated specifically in Crematorium V, where Mandelbaum was also working at that time, so it would have been difficult to remain ignorant of the talk of the day among the “Sonderkommando” members when it presumably happened!

These statements must therefore be counted among the very few truthful statements of this witness.

Mandelbaum pathetically boasted that he had devised two methods of dragging corpses. If they were true, it would bring the claimed demented (dis)organization of the SS into the spotlight once more: he made “a special loop out of a shirt,” which he then tightened around the wrist of a corpse, thusly dragging it “along a shallow gutter in the concrete” with a colleague, and he had the other brilliant idea of wetting it so that the body slid better. For Müller, on the other hand, the procedure was carried out with a belt, as seen earlier (1979b, pp. 117):

“This was done by putting the loop of a leather strap round the wrist of a corpse and then dragging the body to the lift by the strap and thence conveying it upstairs to the crematorium.”

In Crematoria II/III, the furnace hall was 30 meters long, and the distance from the elevator to the last muffle of the fifth furnace, the farthest one, was about 27 meters. Can one seriously believe that the SS would not have devised a faster and more-efficient system to transport the corpses (up to 3,000 per day!) to the furnaces? For example, by carts?

Tauber stated that in these crematoria, during a 12-hour shift with 60 inmates, only two were involved in “transporting the corpses to the retorts [muffles] of the furnaces”²¹⁰ – hence, two people had to drag 1,500 corpses within 12 hours²¹¹ across the furnace-room floor! If two inmates dragged one corpse, that would have amounted to one corpse every 30 seconds!

In 1945, Mandelbaum may have related the first nucleus of the fable about the taking of flesh and blood from the victims, which later was further developed by himself and also by Müller:

“I remember the case when a German military doctor appeared at the crematorium; he picked out some healthy people, put them aside, shot them, and then removed the flesh from their legs. Sometimes he would extract blood out of people, and then shoot them.”

During the Höss trial, Mandelbaum embroidered this scant tale:

“I return to what I forgot to say. When the transports arrived, a doctor came – Höss will know his name; he chose healthy people and women from the transports, about 30-40; from each they extracted the blood completely from the aorta, and then they were shot. Men got their muscles cut mainly from the legs, and [the flesh] was put in sheet-metal crates which were then taken I don’t know where, but we assumed to the German hospital for soldiers who had been wounded by shrapnel at the front, so they wanted to treat them this way.” (1947/1)

Evidently these completely bled inmates remained alive and, to kill them, they needed to be shot!

Among the other tall tales told by Mandelbaum, there is that of U.S. citizens allegedly taken from Warsaw to Auschwitz and shot there, whose number, strangely, changes from one statement to another: 60 people (1945), ²¹⁰ GARF, 7021-108-13, p. 36.

²¹¹ Assuming that the clearing of the alleged gas chamber went hand-in-hand with the cremation of the corpses.

“about 123” (1947/1) and 100 (1947/2). For Kraus and Kulka, as seen earlier, “in the summer of 1943, a group of 2000 interned American Jews was brought to Birkenau.”

In concluding my analysis, I may point out Mandelbaum’s delusional fantasies about the stolen goods allegedly taken from the victims:

“in 1942, they took away from Auschwitz – not much, but about 4 gold wagons, about 30 trains [sic] – I can’t say exactly, maybe 25 of them just spectacles.” (1947/1)

It is difficult to imagine how many pairs of glasses can be loaded onto 25 railway cars (let alone trains)!

11. The False Testimonies of Ludwik Nagraba, Joshua Rosenblum, Aaron Pilo, David Fliamenbaum and Samij Karolinskij

11.1. Ludwik Nagraba

This former Auschwitz detainee testified during the 11th hearing in the Höss Trial (March 22, 1947) and later, on September 16 of the same year, he was questioned by Judge Henryk Gawacki in preparation of the trial against the Auschwitz camp garrison.

Although he claims to have been a member of the “Sonderkommando,” this witness is practically unknown. Franciszek Piper mentions him in passing only a couple of times, in notes and in insignificant contexts (Piper 2000, pp. 190, 194).

According to his statements, Nagraba, a Pole of Roman Catholic religion, was interned in Auschwitz on February 15, 1941, and registered under Number 2549 (although this number was assigned on August 15, 1940; Czech 1990, p. 26). On October 26, 1944, he was transferred to Buchenwald. After spending six weeks in quarantine, he was employed for about four months at the disinfestation chamber of the Main Camp’s storage facility for inmate property called “Kanada I.” Then he was assigned to the “Sonderkommando” of Birkenau, but for the first eleven months of this deployment, he merely worked on the railway ramp, where incoming deportation trains were unloaded. At the camp, he contracted typhus and paratyphus and, upon his recovery, was assigned to Crematorium III. In May 1944, he was housed in that crematorium, and after its demolition, he was housed in Camp Sector BIId.

During the Höss Trial, Nagraba stated the following:²¹²

²¹² Höss Trial, 11th hearing, March 22, 1947 (Vol. 28), pp. 1145-1148.

“Witness Nagraba: When a transport arrived at the railway ramp, the selection followed. There were the camp commandant and doctors. There were trucks present. Pregnant women and children were selected and told to get on the trucks, because the road was long. They were taken directly to the crematorium. Then the old people were selected. The elderly were considered useless people, and immediately went to their deaths. Young people aged 18, 20, 25 were instead selected and interned in the camp. At the crematorium, the slightest infringement of an order, [for example] resistance to entering the gas chamber, was punished with a blow [by a firearm]; guards were shooting. After the gassing, they took the people’s hair and [gold] teeth, and they were put in the furnace in 9, 8 people [8-9 at a time], depending on their physical constitution. There were instances when a transport arriving at the ramp realized they were going to their death. People ran down the ramp, hoping they could escape. The camp commandant gave the order to shoot. Many corpses were left behind.

Altogether 2,850,000 [deportees] were gassed. I rely on the fact that the transports were recorded. The transport commandant conveyed the number to the camp commandant. We wrote down this number. We were 10, 11. During my presence [at the camp], these lists showed that 2,850,000 perished. Many perished, of whose fate the headquarters did not know [anything], who had not been sent by the headquarters, because they immediately went from the ramp to the crematorium. They came from various parts of Poland. This was 1942, 1943.

Many Germans in uniform arrived as well, but they were shot by the SS in the bunker in the crematorium [na bunkrze w krematorium].

A large number of civilians, professors, priests, arrived from various parts of Poland, and were immediately directed to the crematoria.

I worked in the Sonderkommando. When a transport arrived, we were ordered to line up. We were 60. Some of us had to take the objects away; these objects were handed over [by the victims] on the spot: we had to take them to the ‘Kanada,’ and then from the ‘Kanada’ we returned to Birkenau, where the crematorium was.

When there was no crematorium yet, there was a small white house, a shack [biały, domek, barak]. The people were taken by trucks, undressed, and went to the sewage plant [do oczyszczalni]. People entered through one door, and corpses came out the other. Then these people were burned. Until there was the modern 2-furnace crematorium, they cremated in pits. There were 18 pits. On average, 8,000-10,000 corpses could be cremated in one pit. It depended on the type of people gassed. The corpses were arranged, flammable substances were poured [on them], and they were set on fire. Cremation was carried out mainly during the night.

Presiding Judge: Did the witness see the defendant Höss at the reception of these transports?

Witness: He was always there.

Presiding Judge: Did the witness see the defendant Höss take children away [from the parents]?

Witness: For this there were helpers, thugs who did everything on his orders. He always had an entourage. The reception of a transport happened quickly, lasted 40 minutes; the people were locked up in bunkers [w bunkrach], which were spacious, if only [= so that] they [all] got in, and the door was closed.

Prosecutor Siewierski: So, when Jewish transports arrived at the crematorium, what measures were taken to speed up the loading process?

Witness: Pregnant women and children were selected first, the old were put aside, then the young people aged 18, 20, 25, who could be suitable for 2-3 months for the camp. Women were told to sit down immediately, because they would be accommodated faster due to their impediments [pregnancy].”

The interrogation of September 16, 1947, from which the biographical information given earlier is taken, contains many digressions. Hence, I only translate those parts that relate to the witness's activities in the “Sonderkommando.”²¹³

“In the Birkenau crematorium, I served as head of a Kommando made up of Jews of various nationalities, with the exception of Polish Jews. This Kommando had about 700 people. Among the tasks of this Kommando was the removal of the corpses from the gas chambers, as well as the cremation of corpses in the furnaces, after cutting the hair, extracting teeth and checking female corpses in search for hidden valuables. In this crematorium, Mieczysław Morawa worked with me as Obercapo of the so-called stokers,^[214] also Jews. The gas chamber itself was maintained by SS. When I was working at the crematorium, I went almost every day to both the Birkenau Camp and the Main Camp to take the Rollwagen [cart²¹⁵] of corpses to the crematorium. [...] While working at the Birkenau Crematorium, I came into contact with Muhsfeldt, whom I recognize well in the photograph that was shown to me. Muhsfeldt was almost always drunk, and if he was sober, he would demand to bring him whatever to drink from the suitcases and trunks that arrived in a transport of Jews. He beat the Jews deployed [at the crematorium] for the slightest flaw (insufficient cleanliness, scattered garments, etc.) and from [his] statements that it was necessary to destroy the Jews all over the world, it appeared that he hated Jews violently. During the gassing action, he went around with a gun in one hand, and a whip in the other. He urged reluctant victims with the whip into the gas chamber, and shot them with his pistol. I was not in contact with Muhsfeldt for a long time.

A few times, 3 or 4, I went to collect corpses from the Political Department in the Main Camp. Also, on average twice a week the Jews from my Kommando of the crematorium went to collect the corpses. The corpses brought were brutally beaten, massacred, and the bodies almost completely black. Grabner, as head of the Political Department, carried out the interrogations, and the corpses carried away were the victims of his interrogations. At least 2-3 corpses were carried away, at most 6 corpses. I very often saw Grabner himself in the crematorium during the action. [...]

²¹³ AGK, NTN 144, Vol. 61, pp. 302-307.

²¹⁴ “Heizerów,” Polonized word for the German term “Heizer,” stoker.

²¹⁵ In the Polish text “Rollwaga.” For Müller, the Rollwagen was instead the cart for introducing the corpse into the muffle (Leicheneinführungs-Vorrichtung).

I remember well and firmly declare that at the Birkenau crematorium I met the suspects Hans Koch and Kirschner, the latter was called 'tiny frog' because of his crooked legs. I don't know Kirschner's name. Both exercised the function of Gasmaster [gas masters²¹⁶], and the Germans called them that. Both always had a gas mask with them and carried in their backpack [w plecaku], most often Kirschner, cans of cyklon [Zyklon]. I almost always had these cans in my hand after the contents had been poured out, because I had to put them aside [collect them] after they had been left on the ground. Then these cans were brought to the Main Camp in the Rollwagen. After the gas chamber had been closed, both Koch and Kirschner went onto the roof of the gas chamber, and there they put on the gas masks, opened the cans, and through an opening [przez otwór] poured in the contents of the cans. In conversations with them I asked when this – that is, a gassing – would happen to me, to which they replied, 'Wait a little longer.' I also remember well that the penultimate Sonderkommando, made up exclusively of Jewish inmates, who were employed in Crematorium III [=IV], were gassed – not as always in one of the crematoria, but in the gas chamber which was located in the small red building near the warehouse 'Kanada.' This chamber was used for the disinfection [fumigation] of clothes. I know this from the fact that I then went there and took the corpses of the gassed inmates of this Kommando out of there and burned them in Crematorium II [=III]. So there, that is, at this gas chamber, I met the suspects Koch and Kirschner, 'tiny frog,' with the gas mask. The accused Kirschner – tiny frog – showed a great deal of interest and initiative in the gassing action. He was very active and proactive, and he was promoted to the rank of Hauptscharführer some time later."

Like Mandelbaum, Nagraba used the term "bunker" exclusively for the alleged gas chambers of Crematoria II and III, as can be seen from his explicit statements:

"Many Germans in uniform arrived as well, but they were shot by the SS in the bunker in the crematorium."

"The reception of a transport happened quickly, lasted 40 minutes; the people were locked up in bunkers, which were spacious, if only [= so that] they [all] got in, and the door was closed."

It goes without saying that the killing of Germans in uniform is a silly nonsense, like that of Polish intellectuals and priests:

²¹⁶ In the Polish text "Gazmeistrów."

“A large number of civilians, professors, priests, arrived from various parts of Poland, and were immediately directed to the crematoria.”

The witness, however, vaguely knew the fable of “Bunker” 2 or V or 2/V, but not the term:

“When there was no crematorium yet, there was a small white house, a shack. The people were taken by trucks, undressed, and went to the sewage plant [oczyszczalnia; sic]. People entered through one door, and corpses came out the other. Then these people were burned.”

According to the orthodox narrative, the “white house” was precisely “Bunker 2,” but it supposedly had four rooms and four pairs of doors, not a single entrance and exit door. It is evident that Nagraba had no knowledge of “Bunker 1.” That the victims, after having undressed, went “to the sewage plant” is an evidently senseless statement.

On the alleged gassings, Nagraba is very laconic, but he mentions the names of the two disinfectors allegedly responsible for pouring Zyklon B into the alleged gas chambers:

“[...] at the Birkenau crematorium I met the suspects Hans Koch and Kirschner, the latter was called ‘tiny frog’ because of his crooked legs. I don’t know Kirschner’s name. Both exercised the function of Gasmeister, and the Germans called them that. Both always had a gas mask with them and carried in their backpack, most often Kirschner, cans of cyklon.”

According to the indictment of the Krakow Trial, Hans Koch and Hermann Kirschner were precisely assigned to this task, and Nagraba undoubtedly was inspired by this indictment to invent an unlikely story: ignoring the orthodox theme of a Red-Cross ambulance used to transport the Zykon-B cans to the crematoria, he put them into the disinfectors’ backpacks instead!

Their presumed name as “Gasmeister” is instead the witness’s brain fart. In the broader orthodox Holocaust narrative, this name is notoriously and exclusively attributed to SS Oberscharführer Ernst Bauer, who was the alleged “Gasmeister” of the Sobibór Camp.

Pregnant women and children were “taken directly to the crematorium” by trucks, which, according to orthodox Holocaust fable, only happened when the transports were unloaded at the old railway ramp and had to be taken to the phantom “Bunkers.”

The witness showed surprising ignorance about the crematoria, and great imagination about the fires:

“Until there was the modern 2-furnace crematorium, they cremated in pits. There were 18 pits. On average, 8,000-10,000 corpses could be cremated in one pit. It depended on the type of people gassed. The corpses were arranged, flammable substances were poured [on them], and they were set on fire. Cremation was carried out mainly during the night.”

He took up Mandelbaum's fantasy of the crematorium with two furnaces ("another crematorium was also built, there were two furnaces," 1947/1), and disproportionately increased the number of pits to a whopping 18! And since 8,000-10,000 corpses could be cremated in a pit, presumably within a day, the pits' total capacity would have amounted to $(18 \times 8,000 \text{ or } 10,000 =) 144,000$ to 180,000 corpses per day! The cremation technique was laughable: flammable liquids poured on corpses piled up in pits, with no other, proper fuel such as wood or coke mentioned. I have dwelt earlier on the prohibition of nighttime cremations since late 1943.

Regarding the crematoria, Nagraba said nothing, except that each furnace (probably meaning muffle) was loaded with 8-9 corpses, which is madness.

On the number of victims, the witness stated:

"Altogether 2,850,000 [deportees] were gassed. I rely on the fact that the transports were recorded. The transport commandant conveyed the number to the camp commandant. We wrote down this number. We were 10, 11. During my presence [at the camp], these lists showed that 2,850,000 perished."

In whatever way we consider the period of his stay in the camp (since his arrival in Auschwitz in February 1941, or since he started working on the ramp in June 1943²¹⁷), his figure is always absurd. However, it must be admitted that Nagraba invented a very original transport-recording system.

I pass over Höss's omnipresence at the arrival of each transport ("Presiding Judge: Did the witness see the defendant Höss at the reception of these transports? Witness: He was always there."), as if the camp commandant had nothing else to do, or as if this was his primary task, and I draw attention to the unlimited freedom of movement which "Sonderkommando" inmates allegedly enjoyed:

"When I was working at the crematorium, I went almost every day to both the Birkenau Camp and the Main Camp to take the Rollwagen of corpses to the crematorium. [...] A few times, 3 or 4, I went to collect corpses from the Political Department in the Main Camp. Also, on average twice a week the Jews from my Kommando of the crematorium went to collect the corpses."

Although a Leichenkommando (corpse-carrying unit) of 10 inmates existed since May 3, 1944,²¹⁸ given the small number of its members, it cannot be excluded that a team of crematorium personnel carried out the task indicated by Nagraba. However, his statement is in contrast to the orthodox claim of the "Sonderkommando's" rigorous isolation and presupposes that this unit was not the custodian of any "terrible secret."

²¹⁷ Nagraba carried out this work for 11 months, before being transferred to the "Sonderkommando" in May 1944, therefore from June 1943 to April 1944.

²¹⁸ Report Arbeitseinsatz für den 3. Mai 1944. APMO, D-AuII-3a/16, p. 324a. The figure was then reduced to six inmates, and on January 16, 1945 down to five. RGVA, 502-1-67, p. 17.

Finally, the witness embroiders the story of the alleged selection at the end of September 1944:

“I also remember well that the penultimate Sonderkommando, made up exclusively of Jewish inmates, who were employed in Crematorium III [=IV], were gassed – not as always in one of the crematoria, but in the gas chamber which was located in the small red building near the warehouse ‘Kanada.’ This chamber was used for the disinfection [fumigation] of clothes. I know this from the fact that I then went there and took the corpses of the gassed inmates of this Kommando out of there and burned them in Crematorium II [=III].”

According to the orthodox narrative, as noted earlier, 200 inmates of the “Sonderkommando” of Crematoria IV and V (and of “Bunker 2”) are said to have been gathered and gassed in the disinfestation chamber of the Effektenkammer, the so-called “Kanada I” inmate-property warehouse, and the corpses were supposedly cremated by the SS themselves (Piper 2000, pp. 186f.).

For Nagraba, it was instead the “penultimate Sonderkommando” of Crematorium IV, whose corpses were cremated not by the SS, but by himself!

The anecdote was also related with other variants by Mandelbaum (1945):

*“Question: Were detainees from the Sonderkommando [also] killed?
Answer: Yes, they were killed. At the end of October, we Sonderkommando inmates who were staying at the camp were not allowed into the crematorium, although the crematorium was working that day. The SS themselves operated it. That day they cremated 230 inmates of the Sonderkommando, and then they declared that they had all gone on the transport.”*

I have already pointed out that this alleged event was dated in a contrasting way by various witnesses: for Müller it occurred “towards the end of September 1944,” for Dragon after the October 7 revolt, for Tauber before that event. Paisikovic traced it to the end of the Hungarian action (in mid-July 1944 or shortly thereafter), while Mandelbaum claimed that it did not happen “in [his] time” (1947/1), and since he was part of the “Sonderkommando” from June 1944 until January 1945, the alleged event was prior to June 1944. Jankowski, on the other hand, said nothing about it.

11.2. Joshua Rosenblum

This witness is practically unknown to Holocaust historiography. His first statement, which is translated below, dates back to 1970, and only in 1986 did Robert Jay Lifton publish some extracts in a book translated two years later into Italian. In 1996, the witness was interviewed by Barbara Siebert, but only practically irrelevant fragments of his statements have been published.²¹⁹ Rosenblum, born in 1923 in Jaworzno, Poland, was arrested along with other Jews ²¹⁹ Friedler/Siebert/Kilian, pp. 153, 163-165, 272.

in May 1941 in Krenau (Chrzanów) and sent to the Sosnowice Transit Camp, and then to Wiesau. After working with about 300 Jews on a highway about 125 km from Berlin, he was transferred to Klettendorf, near Breslau, from where he fled. Arrested by the German police in March 1944, he was interned in Auschwitz. The witness's account, which is written in German, continues as follows:²²⁰

"The Sonderkommando in Birkenau.

I was in quarantine in Auschwitz for about six weeks and was then sent to the Sonderkommando in Birkenau. Five crematoria existed there, where around 800 prisoners were employed, among them Jews, Russians, Poles and some German Kapos. The crematoria consisted of four specially constructed buildings and a makeshift room that used to be a farmhouse. About 180 prisoners were employed in each crematorium. On May 15, 1944, I began working there, at Furnaces Nos. 3 and 4. Up to this point – as I was told – the Polish Jews had been burned. Then it was the turn of transports from all parts of Europe.

Each furnace could burn about 800 bodies in 24 hours. But that was not enough. Further mass graves were excavated, which were 2 meters deep, 10 meters long and 5 meters wide, in order to burn people.

Our job was to bring the corpses to the furnaces on a stretcher and toss them into them. Four corpses were thrown in every 10 minutes. When enough ash had collected in the furnaces, we had to take it out – about once a week), crush it, and pour it onto trucks. The ash was then brought to the Wisla River (Weissel) and thrown into it.

I would like to note here that people from smaller transports were shot and then burned in the furnace. But when the large transports of people from Hungary and the Lodz Ghetto arrived from May 1944 on, and there were 10,000 people a day for each crematorium, they were gassed and thrown into the graves, where 2,000 people were burned in the course of 2 to 3 hours.

My hometown Jawozno is only 18 km distant from Auschwitz. The Christian residents constantly saw the smoke, and knew exactly what was going on in Auschwitz.

Reception of the Jews in Auschwitz.

When a transport of people arrived at Auschwitz, they were received by a special group from the department called 'Canada.' The luggage was taken away from the people immediately, and the people were only left with the things they had on their bodies and with small carry-on luggage. I was told that in 1942 and 1943 SS men received the transports of people. With jeering, hitting with rifle butts, stabbing with bayonets and howling of dogs they had panicked the new arrivals and driven them into the crematorium.

²²⁰ Joshuah Rosenblum, declaration headlined with "Haifa, den 23.11.1970. Zeugenaussage. (Betrifft das Sonderkommando in Birkenau)." Friedmann Archive, Haifa. Underlining in the original. I kept the numerous repetitions of the text.

The SS later used another method that made their work easier by persuading the new arrivals to take a shower in order to get cleaned up after the long journey. This task was then taken over by the Sonderkommando that had the task of calming down the people. If asking the question why Jews did this and thus misled the people, the answer is that the people were in a slaughterhouse from which there was no escape, and everyone clung to their life.

The SS men had tormented the people terribly when chasing them into the gas chambers. So, the Jews saw that it would be better to spare the victims this agony by taking over the function of the SS men, and they rendered to these doomed inmates their last service. So, the Jews in the Sonderkommando did their jobs for psychological reasons.

However, the Jews from the Sonderkommando were not spared. Again and again, some of them were shot, because the witnesses shouldn't stay alive too long either. Two German Kapos were also on duty at every crematorium.

At the beginning of our work at the Sonderkommando, we Jews could not always remain silent, and told the new arrivals what fate awaited them – that they were to be gassed. The poor people panicked terribly. They went insane, so we later preferred to remain silent.

So, after the arriving people were taken to the square next to the crematoria, they had to completely undress, because they were told to go into the shower. The SS then drove them – often with beatings – into the so-called bath, which was actually the gas chamber. This was a hermetically sealed room that was about 80 square meters in size and about 2.25 m high. It had two doors – one was the entrance, the other was used to remove the corpses. An SS man poured the cyclone gas from a can into the room through two small windows that were located close to the roofline. The death throes of the people lasted about 15 minutes. To this day, I can still hear the terrible screams of these people in my mind, and I cannot free myself from them.

Those shot are thrown into the fire.

When the four crematoria were no longer sufficient to exterminate the increasingly numerous transports – once 10,000 Gypsies came from the Opole area [=Opole/Oppeln] – we had to throw the corpses into burning pits where they were burned. The Germans found out that – in order to save gasoline – the corpses could also be doused with human fat, which flowed into a pit at a deeper spot. We poured the human fat with buckets onto the people who were supposed to burn faster. We worked here from May 1944 until October 1944. We worked 12-16 hours a day, with four SS men next to each crematorium, with around 180 inmates who had to help them. The fire burned incessantly – day and night.

I lived in D-Block No. 13. There were about 300 Jews who operated furnaces 3 and 4.

The name of the SS chief of this Sonderkommando was Hauptscharführer Moll, who was around 40 years old. His right-hand man was Unterscharführrer Georgi – around 45 years old, who probably came from Westphalia. Georgi's task was mainly to personally shoot the people, one by one, after they had undressed and laid down next to the pits, and it often happened that the shot was not fatal, and the poor victims would then run around on the burning pit, and screamed terribly without getting the coup de grace. This mainly happened when smaller transports of each around 120 people arrived, which were not worth gassing. In this context I remember a very young girl who had this fate. It was a terrible sight. The girl pleaded that she should be shot with another bullet.

The smaller transports consisted mostly of partisan groups or so-called Muselmen who came from labor camps where they had been selected for extermination because they could no longer work. Among such a group, I once met a cousin of mine who begged me to help him. However, I could only tell him that there was no salvation. 'Today you, tomorrow I' – was all I could tell him. He then asked me which death was quicker – the one by gassing or by shooting. I told him that being shot was better, and since he was part of a small group, he would likely be shot. I then found his corpse among those shot. At first Georgi usually stood behind the door, had the next victim brought out by two of us, and shot the same from behind with a shot in the nape of the neck. Later he became bolder and more brutal. He had the Sonderkommando bring the victims to the burning pit, where they were ordered to lie down, and he shot them one by one. Georgi killed thousands of people in this way.

Once a transport of around 60 Polish partisans arrived from Warsaw. We believed that the opportunity had now come to make an uprising together with the partisans. But the partisans had no courage, and did not want to. They went to their death indifferently. They were shot one by one by SS man Georgi and thrown into the fire.

Hungarian Jews, Jews from the Lodz Ghetto, the German Gypsies, all the Muselmen from the labor camps, etc. – all of them went despondently to the gassing.

The uprising in Birkenau.

We were about 800 prisoners in Sonderkommando in Birkenau. After mass transports no longer arrived, the SS wanted to liquidate 300 of the 800 people in the Sonderkommando. The block elder – a French Jew whose name I no longer remember – was ordered to draw up a list of 300 Jews under the pretext that they were needed in a tailor's shop.

But since we knew what this was about, we did not want to volunteer. Thereupon there was a roll call of about 400 prisoners from Crematoria 3 and 4, and when the SS men started counting them, we put up a fight, started screaming and lashing out around us. We tore apart the fence in order to escape. Thereupon the SS men shot into the crowd. Meanwhile, a prepared resistance group blew up Crematorium No. 3 with dynamite. In the meantime, reinforcements came from the SS, and we received the order from a Kapo to run together to the area in front of Crematorium No. 4.

As I learned later, eleven SS men were killed in this uprising. During the uprising, around 600 of the Sonderkommando were shot, most of them by Georgi himself. I myself was among the group who gathered in front of Crematorium 4. Only around 120 of us were left, who were ordered to take completely apart all the crematoria.

I stayed in Birkenau until January 18, 1945. On that day, the order arrived to evacuate Birkenau, as the Russians were approaching and were already in Krakow. There was no more time to liquidate us, and we were taken on a march towards Gleiwitz."

During the evacuation march, Rosenblum escaped with another inmate, and ran into Soviet troops in Mislowitz.

"In February 1945, I visited Auschwitz with a Russian commission, where I was questioned about the fate of 30 Russian senior officers who had been murdered there. I told everything I knew about it, and also about the general fate of the inmates."

This is followed by a half page of two unimportant anecdotes.

It should be noted that this witness numbered the Birkenau crematoria with the Arabic numerals 1 through 4.

According to him, there were five crematoria in Birkenau, consisting of four buildings and a "makeshift room," a farmhouse, which should be the elusive "Bunker 2/V," of which, however, he knew nothing and never associated it with gassings. Each crematorium employed 180 "Sonderkommando" inmates, with 800 in total, although five times 180 equals 900. Rosenblum began working "at Furnaces Nos. 3 and 4" on May 15, 1944, which probably refers to Crematoria IV and V, although he cannot have worked in both at once, hence it is unclear in which of the two.

He explains that "Each furnace could burn about 800 bodies in 24 hours." If "furnace" refers to muffle, the result would be $(800 \times 46 =) 36,800$ cremations within 24 hours. But if "furnaces" referred to an entire crematorium, the statement is no-less-false, absurd and contradictory. False because Crematoria II and III each had five triple-muffle furnaces while Crematoria IV and V each had just one 8-muffle furnace, so that it is impossible that all the crematoria had the same capacity. The contradiction concerns the data indicated by the witness: four corpses per muffle every 10 minutes – clearly an absurd duration for cremations – hence 24 corpses every hour, and 576 within 24 hours, not 800. However, this capacity is irreconcilable both with the 15 muffles of Crematoria II/III ($576 \times 15 = 8,640$, not 800), and with the 8 muffles of Crematoria IV/V ($576 \times 8 = 4,608$). Such capacities for the four crematoria would corresponds to $(576 \times 46 =) 26,496$ bodies in 24 hours for all of them taken together, which is patently absurd.

The introduction of cremation pits was due to the fact that, at the height of the deportations, “there were 10,000 people a day for each crematorium,” hence at least 40,000 people were exterminated and cremated every day (or even 50,000, if Rosenblum included “Bunker 2/V” in this), which is a simple folly even from an orthodox perspective. In this context, Rosenblum mentions the transport to Auschwitz of “10,000 Gypsies” who “came from the [Oppeln] area,” which is a pure figment of his imagination.

Regarding the cremation pits, the witness does not say how many there were, nor where they were located, but he indicates their size and capacity: 10 m long \times 5 m wide \times 2 m deep, with a presumable total capacity of 2,000 corpses in two to three hours, which is just more madness.

According to Rosenblum, Crematoria IV/V each had a single gas chamber, with an area of about 80 square meters and two doors, one for entry and one for exit, which, as I have shown earlier, is in direct conflict with Jankowski’s (and Dragon’s) deposition and with F. Piper’s opinion resulting from them.

Speaking of cremation pits, the witness does not abstain from repeating the absurd tale of the recovery of human fat, which was then thrown “with buckets” onto the burning corpses. In this context, he also mentions the “Nyiszlian variant” of these pits, according to which the deportees were brought to the edge of the cremation pits, killed with a blow to the nape of the neck, and then unceremoniously thrown in. However, the evil SS villain who “had the Sonderkommando bring the victims to the burning pit, where they were ordered to lie down, and he shot them one by one,” was not Moll, according to the most-common iteration of this fable, but a certain “Georgi,” an unidentified person whose name may have been Johann Gorges, or Goger, or Gorger, or Gorgies (Piper 2000, p. 235), from which we can already deduce how “secure” the (exclusively testimonial) information about him is.

The account relating to the revolt of the “Sonderkommando,” an event of which the witness does not even indicate the month, contains imaginative data and is in conflict with the other testimonies examined above: it cost the lives of 600 inmates and 11 SS (according to the orthodox version, 451 inmates and three SS men); Crematorium IV was blown up with dynamite (instead of being burned down), and 120 prisoners remained alive instead of 212.

11.3. Aaron Pilo

Former Auschwitz inmate Aaron Pilo, a Greek Jew with the Registration Number 113204, made his statement in Traunstein, Germany, on June 12, 1945. I take his statement from a book by the Auschwitz Museum’s historian Piotr Setkiewicz, who added some personal comments in square brackets marked with his initials P.S. (Setkiewicz, pp. 47f.):

“For a period of two years, from January 1943 to January 1945, I was imprisoned in the Birkenau concentration camp in Poland and in that time I was forced to work in one of the crematoria located there. In the Birkenau camp there were four crematoria in all, and each of them was capable of burning 3,000 corpses in the course of a day. For two years, during which I was forced to work by my German masters, I estimate that five million human corpses were burned in those four crematoria [an elevated estimate – P.S.]. Trains full of prisoners arrived in Birkenau each day. At that point the commandant together with the doctors segregated the prisoners into two groups. One was made up of relatively healthy persons between the ages of twenty and thirty. The other group was small children, older people, and women [rather: mothers with children and visibly pregnant women – P.S.]. Next, the SS men ordered the people designated for this second group to disrobe and fold together the clothing they had removed. In order to allay their anxiety, the SS men informed them that they would now be bathed, and their clothing taken for delousing. At this point the SS crowded those small children, old men, and women into a great chamber, shoving them and beating them with clubs. Up to three thousand people at a time fit into such a chamber. At that point one of the SS men closed the gas-tight door leading to the chamber and a second with a gas mask on his face opened little hatches in the ceiling and poured the lethal gas into the chamber. After the passage of three minutes all of those inside the chamber died, poisoned by the gas. The process of mass murder occurred daily over the period of the two years of my stay in Birkenau. The Kommando [Sonderkommando – P.S.] of prisoners, chosen from among other groups of new arrivals in the camp, prepared the bodies of those killed for cremation. They dragged the bodies out of the gas chamber and, on orders from the SS men, inspected them in a search for gold dental fillings and jewelry that might be found there. After the bodies were stripped of all valuables and the hair was shaved from the heads of the victims, the hair was used for the production of material from which hats were later made [unconfirmed – P.S.], and the bodies were transported to the crematoria, where they were placed in a pile in the elevator that raised them to ground level. There a prisoner poured gasoline on the bodies and threw them into the fire. The four crematoria worked twenty-four hours a day on two shifts and they burned bodies at the rate of 120 per hour.”

The daily cremation capacity of the Birkenau crematoria – ($4 \times 3,000 =$) 12,000 corpses – is absurd on two counts, first for the figure itself, and because it attributes to Crematoria II/III, each equipped with fifteen muffles, the same capacity as to Crematoria IV/V, each equipped with eight muffles each.

The five million cremations in two years are a ridiculous propaganda story.

The number of people crammed into the chamber (3,000 in a room of 210 m² = 14.3 per m²) is physically impossible.

The witness's "knowledge" of the extermination procedure clearly stems not from his own experience, but from other sources: the description is vague ("a great chamber," "little hatches"), while the duration of the victims' agony, merely three minutes, is practically impossible. The witness did not even know that the crematorium team was to be called "Sonderkommando."

The treatment of corpses in the furnace room borders on madness:

"There a prisoner poured gasoline on the bodies and threw them into the fire"!

Here Setkiewicz feels compelled to provide an "explanation" (ibid., FN 5, p. 47):

"In accounts by former prisoners mention can be found of pouring methanol or heavy fractions of refined petroleum over the bodies of the victims stacked on the burning pyres in order to make them burn more readily. It would seem that it was rather wood that was used to start the fires in the crematoria. There are several extant receipts for the delivery of small amounts of wood to the crematoria during the periods when the burning pyres at Birkenau were not in use. Pilo may also have witnessed water being poured on the corpses. The stokers, members of the Sonderkommando working in the furnace hall, did so in order to make it easier to drag bodies across the damp floor."

These observations are irrelevant and inconclusive. The claim by some witnesses that methanol or oil residues was poured on the corpses on the "burning pyres" has no relation to the scene described by the witness, which is set in the furnace room!

Considering that gasoline has a pungent and unmistakable odor, only a demented person could have mistaken plain water for gasoline.

Setkiewicz pushes his attempt to explain away this absurdity a little too much, because the witnesses who related anecdotes about water being used to facilitate the dragging of corpses in the furnace room did so in a more sensible way, such as Shlomo Venezia (Venezia 2007, p. 91; cf. Mattogno 2017):

"In David Olère's drawing, you can see a water groove in front of the furnaces that was used to transport the bodies more easily between the elevators and the furnaces. We were bailing water into that groove, and thus the bodies were sliding without much effort."

Therefore, if there was a sort of groove in the furnace-room floor to drag the corpses, it would have made much more sense to pour the water into that groove rather than onto the corpses. Moreover, the German "technical genius" apparently hadn't thought of a cart to transport the corpses to the furnaces, but had them be dragged one by one across the floor!

11.4. David Fliamenbaum

This witness, who is completely unknown to Holocaust historiography, was born in 1924 in Garbatka, near Radom, and was most-likely a Polish Jew. On March 1, 1945, he was interrogated by Captain Popov of the Soviet military prosecuting authority. Although, as is clear from the translation I present below, Fliamenbaum did not explicitly declare himself a member of the “Sonderkommando,” a term he did not even know, he still claimed to have witnessed gassings in the Birkenau crematoria, which makes him a (self-proclaimed) eyewitness by any measure. I omit his answers to the formal questions (name, surname, family status, etc.) and go directly to the relevant contents of the interrogation.²²¹

“I was arrested on June 12, 1942, and immediately interned in the Auschwitz Camp. I spent a month at the camp, and in July 1942, I was sent to the masons’ school in the Birkenau sector along with 600 boys aged 16 to 21. There we were instructed for two months. Of us 600 apprentices, 400 perished or were killed during the training by the teachers and block elders (Blockältesten). I personally saw that the elder Kapo of the block, Albert Gernerle [or Hemerle²²²], who had the Number 15649, and his assistant Alfred Kin, who had the Number 11112, killed many of us apprentices. They killed the French, the Belgians, the Dutchmen, whose names I don’t know.

At the end of the [instruction] courses, we were left in various places for work. Along with 19 other apprentices, I was sent to the construction of the new crematoria, which on the plans have the Numbers 2 and 3. The construction was directed by Kapo Wilhelm Herkules, who was one of the great criminals. He personally beat the workers, and killed several of them. Every day he killed 15-20 inmates of the 200 people who worked on the construction of the crematorium. Among those killed, a colleague of mine perished, Number 48885; I do not know his name. Wilhelm was assisted in killing people by his assistant, who had the Number 15667, whose name I do not know.

The construction of these two crematoria lasted from August 1942 to March 1943. The crematorium consisted of the following parts: the first part was the undressing room, followed by a corridor, then a hall with a shower system that had three hermetically closable windows in the ceiling, and the last part were the cremation furnaces. In March 1943, both crematoria were put into operation. The first test was carried out with corpses brought from the camp. 60-80 of these corpses were brought from camp, which in our presence [в присутствии нас: v prisutstvi nas] were introduced into the furnaces and burned. After the furnaces had been tested, the first transport of Greeks arrived at the crematorium, 2,000 people, who were told in my presence [в моем присутствии: v mojem prisutstvii] that they were going to the bathhouse. All the Greeks received towels and soap. The Greeks undressed in the undressing room, and through the corridor entered the hall where they had to bathe, although they could not. Once inside the hall, one of the SS, whose name I do not know, climbed with cyclones [с циклонами:²²³ s tsiklonami] onto the roof of the hall where the people were, and in all probability threw gas through the windows existing on the ceiling, and the people were asphyxiated by the gas. Then a lifting crane [подъёмный кран: pod'jemnyj kran] went into operation, the corpses went upstairs, and were taken to the cremation furnaces. So, before my eyes [на моих глазах: na moikh glazakh], all 2,000 Greeks were exterminated.

Later I saw [я видел: ja vidjel] that thousands of people were brought to this crematorium with new transports that arrived every day. I saw [я видел: ja vidjel] that the transports of Hungarians which arrived were brought there.

Question: How many transports arrived, and how many people from each transport were brought to the crematorium.[?]

Answer: I can tell for 4 months of 1943: in June, July, August and September, an average of 3 to 6 transports arrived per day. Each transport contained from 1,000 to 1,500 people, of whom no less than 85-90% went to the crematorium, the rest went to the barracks, where they were assigned numbers. Those who went to the crematorium, however, did not receive numbers.

Question: Do you know where the Germans took the ashes from the crematoria?

Answer: At first the crematorium workers [работы крематория: raboty krematorija] scattered the ashes of cremated people on the ground, but then, when there was a lot of them, they carried them with horses [на лошадях: na lošadjakh] to the Vistula and Soła Rivers. I personally saw that five inmates, whose names I do not know, accompanied the ashes loaded onto a cart [на повозку: na povozku] and unloaded it. An SS man with a rifle escorted them; I don't know his name either.

Question: What else can you tell?

Answer: I can add that, when I was building the crematorium, I saw a table in it that was inexplicable to me. I asked my partner Kokhan [Johann?] Bernat what that table was. Kokhan replied to me that he had seen 4 German doctors, whose names he did not know, who extracted the gold teeth of the people killed on this table. Kokhan was later shot by the Germans.

I can add to my statements about the extermination of people in the gas chamber, that, when large transports arrived and people did not enter the gas chamber all together [for lack of space], I then saw personally [то лично я видел: to lično ja vidjel] that the Germans took a hose, and doused the people with cold water. This forced people to move closer together, to stand tightly. In this way, they crammed the gas chamber, and asphyxiated people with gas.

[Continuation of the interview report of witness David Fliamenbaum]

²²³ The term is in the plural, instrumental case.

Question: Do you know the influx capacity [cremation capacity] of each furnace of Crematoria Nos. 2-3 and 4-5.[?]

Answer: In Crematoria Nos. 2 and 3, each furnace [muffle?] received 6 corpses at a time, which burned within 15 minutes, and there were 5 furnaces in a crematorium. Therefore, a crematorium had an influx of 120 bodies per hour. The Crematoria Nos. 4 and 5 had the same influx capacity.

Question: How were the corpses introduced into the furnace.[?]

Answer: From the chamber, the corpses were loaded onto a platform [на площадку: na ploščadky] which, by means of a lifting mechanism, carried them upstairs and carried them to the crematorium [furnaces]. There it was lowered, was put on rails, and along the rails it reached the furnaces. Next to each furnace, there was a rotating disk, on which the cart that was located near its iron sleeve^[224] turned towards the furnace, and the corpses were introduced into the furnace by means of an electric mechanism. This is how the furnaces were loaded.”

The masons' school was established by SS Oberführer Richard Glücks, at the time inspector of the concentration camps, with a letter dated November 1, 1940 to the commandants of the then-existing concentration camps.²²⁵ The historian Halina Jastrzębska wrote a detailed article with documents on the masons' school of Auschwitz (Jastrzębska 2008). The school was run by inmates. The director was August Kolodzik (Inmate No. 11067), who also performed the function of Kapo. He was joined by Albert Pawłowski (No. 23475), who was a secretary; Władysław Heybowicz (No. 24801), Igor Trochanowski (No. 24725) and Władysław Moszyński (No. 22699) taught construction techniques, Jan Mosdorf (No. 8230) mathematics, Zygmunt Waszniewski (No. 710) material science, and finally Herbert Puscher (No. 25476) and Franciszek Świgost (No. 8628) were involved in teaching the German language (ibid., p. 276).

The article mentions no David Fliamenbaum (nor any phonetically similar name), nor any Albert Gernerle or Hemerle, whose presumed registration number (15649) belonged to Inmate Martin Mikolajczak instead, while Alfred Kin, whose name was actually Kühn (No. 11112), had nothing to do with the masons' school.

A “Report on the activity of the masons' school for the period from July 16, 1942 to November 21, 1942” dated November 23, 1942 and written by the school's director provides essential information to assess the veracity of Fliamenbaum's related statements.²²⁶

The school was opened on July 16, 1942; the number of enrolled apprentices varied as follows:

- July 16, 1942: 302 apprentices
- July 31, 1942: 501 apprentices; new admissions: 343; discharges: 144
- August 31, 1942: 712 apprentices; new admissions: 312; discharges: 101
- September 28, 1942: 522 apprentices; new admissions: 9; discharges: 199

The report explains that the apprentices discharged from school were either sick or considered unsuitable. The first labor units of apprentices (Arbeitskommandos) were the following:

- Arbeitskommando I: 30-46 apprentices, formed on August 14, 1942
- Arbeitskommando II: 30-40 apprentices, formed on August 14, 1942
- Arbeitskommando III: 15-50 apprentices, formed on August 19, 1942
- Arbeitskommando IV: 15-40 apprentices, formed on August 20, 1942
- Arbeitskommando V: 15 apprentices, formed on August 20, 1942
- Arbeitskommando VI: 15-30 apprentices, formed on August 20, 1942
- Arbeitskommando VII: 100 apprentices, formed on September 20, 1942

On September 28, 1942, the school was moved from Birkenau to the Auschwitz Main Camp. On September 29, the strength was 201 apprentices; on October 31, it was 144 (8 new admissions, 65 discharges); on November 21, they numbered 129 (8 new admissions, 23 discharges). The labor units were organized as follows:

- Arbeitskommando I: 20-100 apprentices on October 12, 1942
- Arbeitskommando II: 11 apprentices from October 30 to November 17
- Arbeitskommando III: 10 apprentices from November 4 to 12
- Arbeitskommando IV: 4 apprentices on November 4, 1942

Fliamenbaum's account of his admission to this school in July 1942 with 600 other apprentices, of whom 400 perished or were killed, is therefore untrue.

Jastrzębska informs us that on March 25, 1943, after two months of training at the masons' school, a group of Polish-Jewish apprentices were sent to work at the Riedel & Sohn Company, which was engaged in the construction of Crematorium V. In Jastrzębska's opinion, others apprentices were probably also employed in the construction of the other three crematoria (ibid., p. 284).

Fliamenbaum stated that, at the end of the training course in August 1942, he was sent to work at Crematoria II and III. But at that time only Crematorium II was under construction.²²⁷ Construction work on Crematorium III began on September 14, 1942.²²⁸ However, there is no evidence that the apprentices from the mason's school were assigned to work in Crematorium II as early as August 1942. At the time, there were 80²²⁹ or 60²³⁰ inmates working there. A Kapo Wilhelm Herkules is completely unknown, and the claim that every day he killed 15-20 inmates assigned to the construction of Crematorium II is a grotesque fabrication.

Fliamenbaum knew nothing of a “Sonderkommando” in charge of the crematoria, as he simply called its members “the crematorium workers,” nor did he claim to have been part of this group. Despite this, he claimed to have witnessed alleged criminal events from inside in March 1943 and even later, as if he had been a member of the “Sonderkommando.”

With a few imaginative additions, Fliamenbaum’s description of Crematoria II/III follows the fable en vogue in 1945, whose literary development I have outlined in another study (see Mattogno 2021).

The gas chamber had “a shower system” – it is unknown whether he thought it to have been real or fake – and according to the propaganda theme of that time, the Greek victims who entered the chamber were given “towels and soap.” The ceiling was not equipped with the canonical four openings closed by wooden or concrete lids, but had three windows that could be hermetically closed.

The testing of the furnaces of Crematorium II was carried out with 60-80 inmate corpses from the camp (according to Henryk Tauber, with 45 corpses of men gassed in “Bunker 2”),²³¹ after which the first gassing was carried out, which involved 2,000 Greeks. However, according to Danuta Czech’s Auschwitz Chronicle, this was not the first but the third gassing (2,191 Greek Jews were allegedly gassed on March 20, 1943; Czech 1990, p. 356), having been preceded by two alleged gassings of Jews from Krakow (1,492 on March 13, and 959 on March 16; ibid., pp. 352, 354), of which Fliamenbaum, who claims to have been present at the event, knew nothing.

The gassing of the 2,000 Greeks allegedly took place by throwing the cyklones [!] through the three aforementioned windows. Then the corpses were carried upstairs (the witness does not explicitly say that the undressing room and the gas chamber were underground or in the basement) with a crane! The transport system of the corpses was imaginatively complicated: they were placed on a “platform” that carried them up with a “lifting mechanism” (the crane). Upstairs, the “platform” was lowered and placed on rails, through which it reached the furnaces. The “rotating disk” was none other than the turntable or rotating platform (Drehscheibe), which I have already described earlier (see p. 22). In this context, the meaning of the “iron sleeve” is difficult to grasp. The witness may have referred to the iron frame equipped with four wheels that ran on the tracks. However, the introduction of the corpses into the muffles was manual, so there was no “electric mechanism.”

For Fliamenbaum, the capacity of Crematoria II and III was six corpses per muffle within 15 minutes, thus 120 per hour for each facility. However, this presupposes the presence of five muffles, although there were in fact 15. The witness evidently did not know that there were five furnaces with three muffles each. This means that, with six corpses cremated within 15 minutes per muffle, the actual capacity of one crematorium would have been $(4 \times 6 \times 15 =)$ 360 bodies per hour, or 8,640 within 24 hours. Fliamenbaum did not even know that Crematoria IV and V each had eight muffles, because he claimed that these plants “had the same influx capacity,” which is nonsense.

The version of the handling of the ashes told by Fliamenbaum is in sharp contrast with that of the other witnesses: they were first scattered on the ground, then they were brought to the Vistula River, yet not by trucks, but by horse-drawn carts.

As regards the transports, the witness referred in particular to the months of June through September 1943, although he was also present in or near the crematoria during the deportation of the Hungarian Jews (“I saw that the transports of Hungarians who arrived were brought there”).

If we follow Fliamenbaum, then an average of three to six transports with 1,000 to 1,500 people each arrived at Auschwitz in the aforementioned four months, i.e. from a minimum of $(3 \times 1,000 \times 120 \text{ days} =)$ 360,000 to a maximum of $(6 \times 1,500 \times 120 \text{ days} =)$ 1,080,000 deportees. At least 85% of them were allegedly gassed, i.e. from $(360,000 \times 0.85 =)$ 306,000 to $(1,080,000 \times 0.85 =)$ 918,000. According to Czech’s Auschwitz Chronicle, however, only about 78,000 deportees arrived at the camp during this period, of which approximately 52,000 were allegedly gassed.

The autopsy table in the dissection room, which already appears on Plan No. 2197(p)1 of Crematorium II dated March 19, 1943, and on Plan No. 2036 of Crematorium III dated February 22, 1943 (Pressac 1989, pp. 305f.), was used not for dissections according to Fliamenbaum, but instead by “4 German doctors” in order to extract gold teeth from corpses!

Finally, the system invented by Fliamenbaum and attributed to the SS to cram the victims into the gas chambers is truly brilliant: not harassing with dogs, not bludgeoning, not shooting, but... spraying them with cold water!

11.5. Samij Karolinskij

On February 22, 1945, in Auschwitz, Soviet Major Kotikov interrogated a former prisoner who claimed to have been a member of the “Sonderkommando.” This witness is completely unknown to Holocaust literature, so his brief deposition is published here for the first time. From its context it is clear that the witness had already delivered a letter to the Soviet authorities, which is not attached to the documents containing the interrogation protocol. I present here only the following few extracts:²³²

“Question: How many meters did you work from the gas chamber when the Germans exterminated people?”

Answer: At 15 meters, I worked on sawing wood for the crematoria and fires for 7 months, and saw all of this with my own eyes.

Question: Did you see if [there was] a large number of children who were pushed into the gas chamber?”

Answer: I wrote everything in my letter; there is the truth.

Question: How do you know that the gas chamber also had rooms [КОМНАТЫ: komnaty]?”

Answer: When the gas chamber was not working, the condemned were waiting for preparations to be made; when there was once a heavy downpour, we of the Sonderkommando sheltered from the rain in the gas chamber. At that moment, the SS were not there. Contributing to this was the fact that the Sonderkommando was separated from the remaining inmates. They were happy to see us and told us about the crematorium [sic].

Question: How many people were there in the crematorium?”

Answer: 100 people worked there at night, as many during the day, and all the crematoria were served by 800 people.”

Only in 1944 did the strength of the crematorium staff increase to 800 inmates and more, so the witness is clearly referring to events in 1944. It is not clear whether the witness was part of the already-mentioned Holzabblader Kommando 61-B – the wood-hauling unit. If, however, this wood was also meant to be used by the “fires” (meaning pyres), he cannot have worked there for seven months, because the alleged activity of the outdoor fires began only in May 1944, hence would have lasted until December, while it ended on August 30, 1944 according to Czech (1990, p. 700). It is not known how it is to be understood that the “gas chamber also had rooms,” but it is rather laughable that members of the “Sonderkommando” entered it by chance when it rained, and that they were left completely unsupervised by the SS – unless of course their activity was innocuous!

Conclusions

As this study has abundantly documented, there can be no doubt that the “eyewitnesses” of the “Sonderkommando” examined here were liars and perjurers. Filip Müller was moreover a blatant plagiarist. Unfortunately, they are not alone.²³³

The analysis of the testimonies has shown that they are essentially false, absurd and mutually contradictory. The contradictions, however, have a much wider relevance than what I have pointed out – and any attentive reader will be able to identify many other such contradictions, in particular with regard to the “gas chambers,” the crematoria (here we can also add Höss’s declaration that the crematoria became useless “within 8-10 weeks”), and to the cremation pits. This suggests that we are not at all dealing with “eyewitness accounts” here, but with macabre Holocaust myths. To realize this, a brief comparison of the testimonies on the cremation pits near Crematorium V is sufficient:

- F. Müller: there were five pits of 40-50 m × 8 m × 2 m or 40 m × 8 m × 2.5 m, each with a capacity of 1,200-1,400 corpses in 24 hours; on the bottom of the pit was a layer of wood, then a layer of 400 corpses, up to a total of three layers, which contained 1,200 corpses; such a pyre protruded some 0.5 meters above the surrounding ground, and it burned in 5-6 hours.
- S. Jankowski: there were two pits measuring 20 m × 2 m × 2 m, each with a capacity of 2,000 corpses per day.
- H. Tauber: a layer of wood was arranged on the bottom of a pit, above which 400 corpses alternating with branches were placed, all of which was doused with petrol and set on fire; then other corpses were thrown onto it; the cremation lasted 48 hours.

²³³ See in particular Mattogno 2017; 2019, Part 3, Chapter 10, “Critical Analysis of Henryk Tauber’s Testimonies,” pp. 331-375; 2020a; 2021, 2021a.

- H. Mandelbaum: an unknown number of pits measured 25 m or 30-35 m × 15 m × 2 m or 1-1.5 m; in them, a layer of wood and one of corpses were arranged alternately up to ten layers, and a total number of 150-180 corpses, thus reaching a height of 2-3 meters above the surrounding ground; the cremation lasted 24-48 hours.
- J. Rosenblum: an unknown number of pits measured 10 m × 5 m × 2 m and could cremate 2,000 corpses within 2-3 hours.
- L. Nagraba: in the whole camp there were 18 pits, and on average 8,000-10,000 corpses could be cremated in one pit.

For F. Müller, the total number of pits was eight (three of which in the area of “Bunker V”), and they had a total capacity of (1,200 to 1,400 × 8 =) 9,600 to 11,200 bodies per day.

The statements of these “eyewitnesses” at best have a place in a Holocaust Haggadah or in a collection of short stories in the genre of horror fiction, but certainly not in history books. The attitude which orthodox historians show towards them, panegyricizing them as repositories of historical truth, is a disconcerting fact.

As early as 1982, Jean-Claude Pressac wrote in an incredibly benevolent way (1982, p. 127):

“F. Müller’s book (published under the title ‘Sonderbehandlung/special treatment’ in Germany, of which the Auschwitz Museum has a copy) contains certain passages whose veracity seems doubtful, but which in no way detracts from the reality of the testimony. Moreover, the author [Pressac] learned from the curator of the [Auschwitz] archives that Filip Müller had never visited the Museum Archives, if only to have the dates of the written sequences verified, which are themselves real and very present in his memory, but whose distance in time necessarily distorts the chronology...” (Pressac’s emphasis)

Above I documented that Müller’s entire book is actually a mere fable that grossly misrepresents reality, and the fact that this self-styled “eyewitness” had not previously visited the Auschwitz Museum is completely meaningless, because he drew his chronology from the first German edition of Danuta Czech’s Kalendarium.

At the trial of Ernst Zündel, which took place in Canada in 1985, Raul Hilberg, with reference to Müller’s book, declared:

“I regard it as rather accurate, yes. I have been through this book page by page, and I am hard-put to find any error, any material significant error in this book. It is remarkable.”

Asked by defense attorney Douglas Christie whether he considered “this an accurate historical account of an eyewitness,” Hilberg simply said “Yes” (District Court, p. 1138; Rudolf 2020a, p. 200). A little later, this famous orthodox Holocaust historian defined Müller as “a remarkable, accurate, reliable person” (ibid., p. 1159/203). These incredible attestations of esteem and consideration fully confirm Hilberg’s credulity and ignorance, who was all-too-kindly characterized by Robert Faurisson as “a paper historian” (see Mattogno 2021b). But other characters of the same mindset can be mentioned, such as Gideon Greif, who wrote about Müller (2005, p. 80):

“Filip Müller’s book, published in German and English, is an important historical source, foremost because Müller was one of the first prisoners in the Sonderkommando and he served in it for a lengthy period of time.”

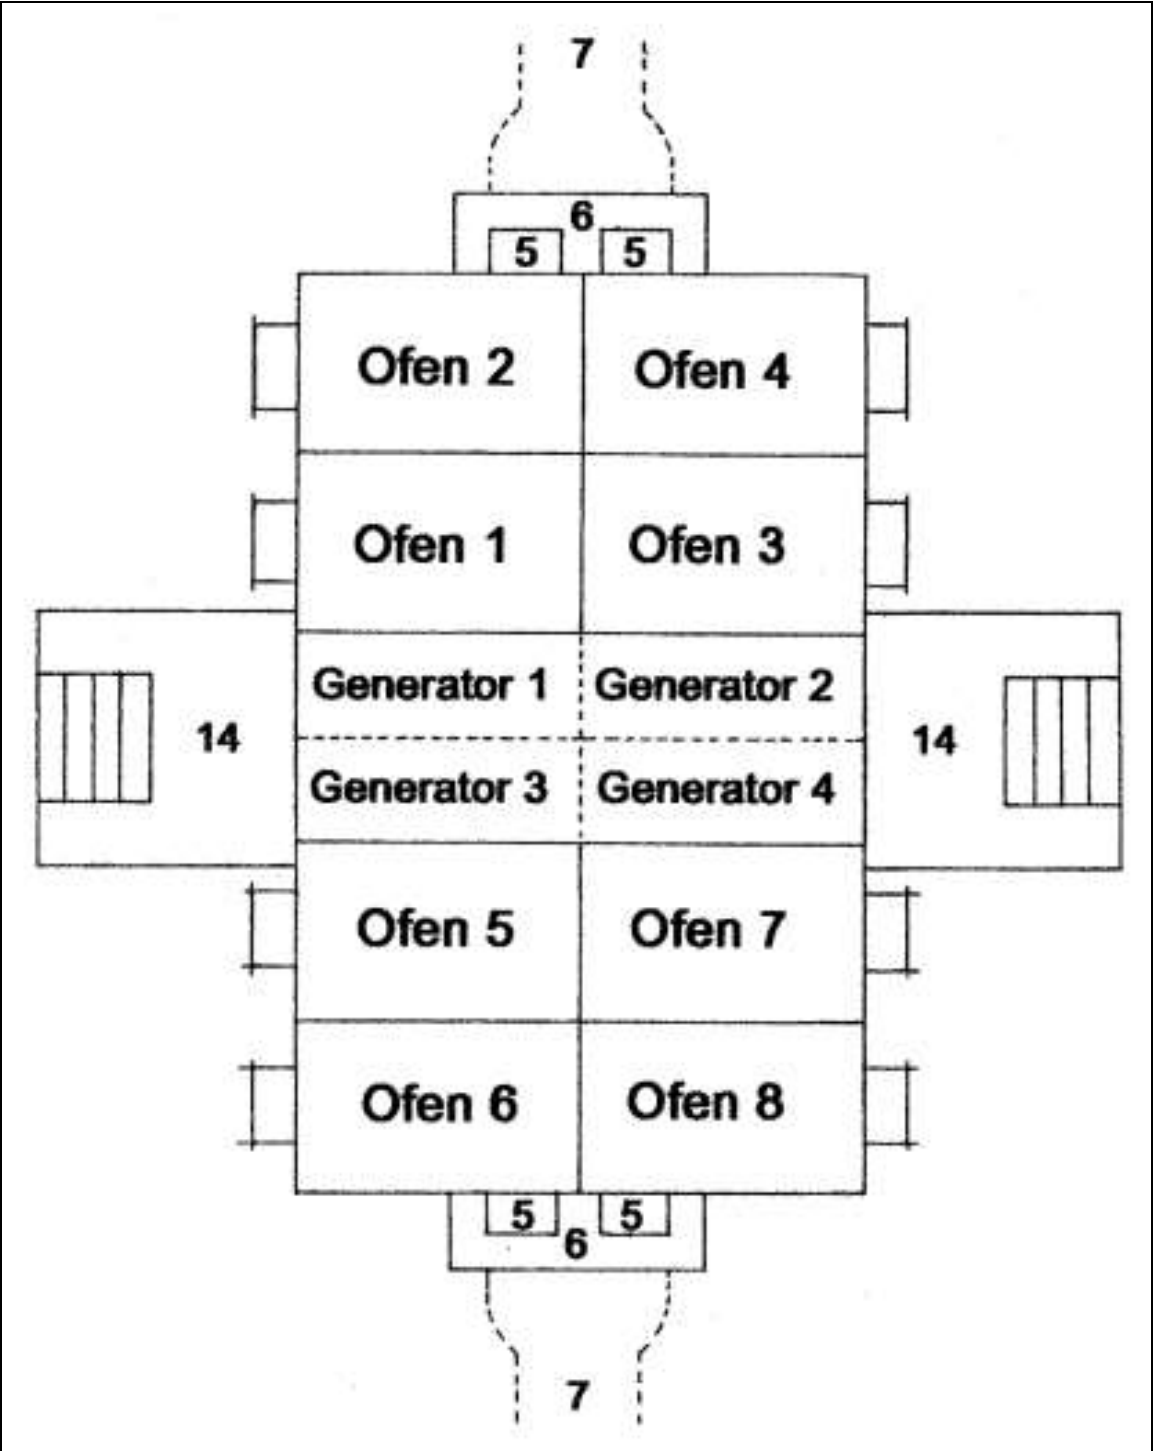

Such reckless judgments apply in general to all “eyewitnesses.” It is clear that these historians have a somewhat singular conception of what an accurate historical account and a reliable historical source are: in fact, they profess a fundamentalist conception of Holocaust history that sees in the “eyewitnesses” a sort of holy prophets invested with a divine mission who enjoy the prerogative of infallibility. Therefore, these historians flee with horror from the critical analysis and comparison of these testimonies as if it were a sacrilegious and blasphemous act, and limit themselves to putting together litanies consisting of fragments of contrasting testimonies, taking care only to eliminate or smooth out the contradictions that are too glaring, in order to create a vacuous and fictitious “concordance on the essential.”²³⁴

They intentionally and knowingly deny the normal, obvious, banal critical method, so they are, yes, the real negationists.

²³⁴ See, for example, Gerald Reitlinger’s and Franciszek Piper’s mendacious mental acrobatics when dealing with Nyiszli’s “eyewitness” accounts: Mattogno 2020a, Chapter 5.1. pp. 349-363; and the no-less-fallacious maunderings by Jean-Claude Pressac and Robert Jan van Pelt on the Wetzler-Vrba Report and on the statements of Ada Bimko: Mattogno 2021, Chapters 5.2.-5.4., pp. 425-441.

nen das Totengebet zu sprechen.

Oberscharführer Mußfeld hatte diese unsinnige Begründung akzeptiert und ihn zum Kommando „Kanada“ versetzt, dessen Aufgabe es ist, die Habseligkeiten der Neuankömmlinge zu sortieren und zu magazinieren.

Der Dajen spricht jetzt:

„Brüder! Ein unerforschlicher Wille hat unser Volk in den Tod geschickt. Das Schicksal hat uns als grausamste Pflicht auferlegt, bei der Vernichtung unseres Volkes mitzuwirken, ehe wir selbst zu Asche werden. Der Himmel hat sich nicht geöffnet, kein Regen ist gefallen, der stark genug gewesen wäre, die von Menschenhänden errichteten Scheiterhaufen zu löschen. Mit jüdischer Ergebung müssen wir uns in das Unabänderliche fügen. Es ist eine Prüfung, die der Herr uns geschickt hat. Nach den Gründen zu suchen, ist nicht Aufgabe von uns Menschen, die wir ein Nichts sind gegen den allmächtigen Gott.

Fürchtet euch nicht vor dem Tod! Welch einen Wert hätte für uns noch das Leben, wenn es uns durch Zufall erhalten bliebe? Wir kämen wohl in unsere Städte und Dörfer zurück. Aber was würde uns dort erwarten — leere, ausgeplünderte Wohnungen. Unsere tränenblinden Augen würden vergeblich nach unseren vernichteten Angehörigen suchen. Wir wären allein. Ohne Familie. Ohne Verwandte. Allein und verloren würden wir in der Welt umherirren. Nirgends fänden wir Ruhe und Frieden. Schatten unseres einstigen Ichs und unserer Vergangenheit. Und so würden wir dann eines Tages einsam sterben...“

Tiefes Schweigen. Hin und wieder ein Seufzer, ein Atemholen.

Wir haben Abschied genommen. Abschied von unseren Toten. Abschied vom Leben.

Die schweren Türen werden aufgerissen. Oberscharführer Steinberg, begleitet von zwei SS-Männern, kommt herein.

„Ärzte raustreten!“ brüllt er.

Mit meinen zwei Kollegen und dem Anatomiediener verlasse ich den Raum.

Wir werden bis zum Tor von Krematorium I zurückgebracht und erhalten den Befehl, in unser Zimmer zu gehen und es nicht zu verlassen.

Am nächsten Morgen fahren Lastwagen in den Hof des Krematoriums. Sie bringen meine toten Kameraden vom „Sonderkommando“.

Eine dreißig Mann starke, neu eingeteilte Gruppe schleppt die Leichen in den Verbrennungssaal und legt sie vor die Ofen. Die Körper sind mit furchtbaren Brandwunden bedeckt, die Gesichter entstellt.

Meine Kameraden sind durch Flammenwerfer vernichtet worden...

Uns vier hat man am Leben gelassen. Wahrscheinlich, weil uns Dr. Mengele noch braucht...

ter strenger Aufsicht verbrannt wurden. Alles deutete darauf hin, daß es mit dem Dritten Reich zu Ende ging.

Ende November 1944 wurde mit der Demontage der Krematorien II und III begonnen. Gleichzeitig fand die letzte Selektion in unseren Reihen statt. Alle Häftlinge des Sonderkommandos – wir waren jetzt noch etwa zweihundert – hatten sich auf dem Hof des Krematoriums II versammelt. Dieses Mal waren von der Lagerleitung Vorkehrungen getroffen worden, daß sich ähnliche Vorkommnisse wie bei der letzten Selektion nicht wiederholen konnten. Hinter dem Stacheldrahtzaun standen Hunderte von bewaffneten SS-Posten mit zahlreichen Hunden. Von der Politischen Abteilung waren die Unterführer Boger und Houstek anwesend, die zusammen mit den Kommandoführern die Selektion leiteten.

Zuerst schickte man die drei Pathologen mit ihrem Gehilfen weg. Dann wurden die dreißig Häftlinge, die im Krematorium V untergebracht waren und zu denen auch ich gehörte, zurückgeschickt. Zum Schluß wählten die SS-Schergen noch eine dritte Gruppe von etwa 70 Häftlingen aus, die das Abbruchkommando bildeten. Den übrigen wurde erklärt, sie kämen in das Lager Großrosen. Was mit ihnen geschah, haben wir nie erfahren. Aber es war jedem klar, daß ihre letzte Stunde geschlagen hatte.

Während sich die rund 100 Todeskandidaten uns gegenüber versammelten, trat der Dajan, jener Hilfsrabbiner, der auf dem Dachboden des Krematoriums II im Haartrockenkommando gearbeitet hatte, vor die Menge.

Zuerst wandte er sich an Oberscharführer Muhsfeld und erklärte ihm: »Sie haben jetzt genug geredet, lassen Sie mich auch einmal zu Wort kommen!« Dann begann er, mit fester und erhobener Stimme eine kurze Ansprache zu halten: »Brüder!« rief er, »nach Gottes unerforschlichem Ratschluß treten wir jetzt unseren letzten Gang an. Ein grausames und schreckliches Schicksal hat uns gezwungen, bei der Ausrottung unseres Volkes mitzuwirken, bevor wir jetzt selbst zu Asche werden. Es ist kein Wunder geschehen. Der Himmel hat keine strafenden Blitze gesandt, er hat auch keinen Regen fallen lassen, der stark genug gewesen wäre, die Brände der von Menschenhänden errichteten Scheiterhaufen zu ersticken. Mit jüdischer Ergebenheit müssen wir jetzt das Unabänderliche hinnehmen. Es ist die letzte Prüfung, die uns der Himmel geschickt hat. Nach den Gründen zu fragen, steht uns nicht an, denn wir sind nichts gegen den allmächtigen Gott. Fürchtet euch nicht vor dem Tod! Was für einen Wert hätte denn das Leben noch für uns, wenn wir es durch einen Zufall retten könnten? Vergeblich würden wir nach unseren vernichteten Angehörigen suchen. Wir wären allein, ohne Familie, ohne Angehörige, ohne Freunde, ohne Heimat, und müßten ohne Ziel in der Welt herumirren. Nirgends gäbe es noch Ruhe und Frieden für uns, bis wir dann eines Tages einsam und verlassen irgendwo sterben würden. Deshalb, Brüder, laßt uns stark und tapfer in den Tod gehen, den Gott jetzt beschlossen hat!«

Die SS-Leute hatten den Dajan während seiner Ansprache nicht unterbrochen. Offenbar hatten auch sie erkannt, daß seine Worte beruhigend auf die Todgeweihten wirken würden und geeignet waren, ihnen ihr Mordhandwerk zu erleichtern. Nachdem der Dajan geendet hatte, herrschte tiefes Schweigen in den Reihen der Selektierten. Hin und wieder konnte man Husten und Räuspern aus der Menge vernehmen. Offensichtlich hatten die Kameraden beim Anblick der Gewehrmündungen, die von allen Seiten auf sie gerichtet waren, die Hoffnungslosigkeit ihrer Lage eingesehen und erkannt, daß es keinen Zweck hatte, sich gegen das unabwendbar gewordene Schicksal aufzubauen. Auch der Dajan hatte sie mit seinen Worten von der Sinnlosigkeit jeglichen Widerstandes überzeugt.

Unter den verzweifelten Kameraden, die von der Selektion betroffen waren, erkannte ich auch Dr. Pach, den selbstlosen, hilfsbereiten Arzt des Sonderkommandos, und die beiden Zahntechniker Feldmann und Katz, deren Aufgabe es gewesen war, das Zahngold einzuschmelzen und zu Barren zu formen. Solange sie dem Sonderkommando angehörten, hatten

Introduction

The subject of the gas chambers of Auschwitz, after a very troubled genesis and development, which in the years 1942-1944 saw the creation and propagation of the most-absurd stories by the various resistance groups inside the Auschwitz Camp, was revised by the Soviets in February-March 1945, and received its first official sanction of historical “truth” in their “Communiqué of the Extraordinary State Commission for the Investigation and Research of the Crimes of the German-Fascist Invaders and their Accomplices,” which was published by Pravda on May 7, 1945. Later accepted by the Nuremberg International Military Tribunal (IMT) as Document 008-USSR, it constituted the archetype of all subsequent historiography.¹ The story of the alleged extermination by gassing was based on the interrogations of two self-styled members of the Sonderkommando, Henryk Tauber and Szlama Dragon, whose statements were also summarized in this presentation:

“Two former prisoners who were interrogated as witnesses, SHYLOMA DRAGON (a resident of the small town of Zitovnin of Warsaw Province) and GENRICH TAUBER (from the town of Krzanow in Poland), who worked in a Sonderkommando operating the gas chambers and crematoria, testified as follows:” (IMT, Vol. 39, pp. 241-261, here p. 245)

Dragon had been interrogated on February 26, 1945, Tauber the next day. With regard to the alleged exterminations these two witnesses – and to a lesser degree also Henryk Mandelbaum and Stanisław Jankowski, whom I have dealt with (together with other witnesses of the Sonderkommando) in another study (Mattogno 2021a) – were the two most important witnesses at the trial held in Warsaw by the Polish authorities from 11 to 19 March 1947 against Rudolf Höss, the former commandant of the Auschwitz Camp. However, for unknown reasons, neither of them participated directly in the trial, nor did they appear at the subsequent trial against the Auschwitz camp garrison, which took place in Krakow from 25 November to 16 December 1947. Tauber's testimony, which was attached to the records of the Höss Trial, was the protocol of a deposition he had given to the Polish investigating judge Jan Sehn during the interrogation of 24 May 1945. Dragon had been interviewed by the same judge even earlier, on 10-11 May 1945.

These two testimonies constituted the essential basis of the judicial reconstruction of the alleged extermination process carried out by the IMT, were also used by the emerging Polish historiography for its historical reconstruction: Tauber thus became the most-important guarantor of the claimed homicidal gassings in the Auschwitz crematoria, while Dragon assumed the same role for the imaginary "bunkers" of Birkenau.

After his extradition to Poland on 25 May 1946, Höss began to be extremely "cooperative" with the local authorities, reworking most of the ramblings he had previously uttered to the British and American investigators, and adapting them to the "historical" perspective of his new jail masters (see Matogno 2020a for details). But while Höss's testimony became accessible to Western historiography as early as 1958 (Broszat 1958; English: Höss 1959), Tauber's was ignored for another three decades, until Jean-Claude Pressac rediscovered it in the proceedings of the Höss Trial and published it in 1989. In his ponderous work on Auschwitz, the French historian presented a complete English translation, accompanied by an accurate commentary (Pressac 1989, pp. 481-502). The translation, while not perfect, came from Pressac's adaptation of two French translations made for him, one by Dorota Ryszka, the other by Adam Rutkowski (ibid., p. 481).

Dragon's testimony became known in its entirety only in 1993, when it appeared in German translation in a book by the Auschwitz Museum's chief historian Franciszek Piper (Piper 1993, pp. 203-225).

Also in 1993, Szlama Dragon, who then called himself Shlomo, and his brother Abraham were interviewed by Israeli historian Gideon Greif (Greif 2005, 122-180). Abraham claimed that he, too, had been assigned to the Sonderkommando of the "bunkers." But with regard to Auschwitz, Szlama mentioned him only twice in passing in his Polish testimony (pp. 2, 13). Greif expressed his admiration for the prodigious memory of the two brothers, whom he interviewed 48 years after the claimed events (ibid., p. 124):

"Both brothers have amazing powers of recall."

But twenty-one years earlier, on 2 March 1972 during the 26th Session of the Austrian trial against the architects Walter Dejaco and Fritz Ertl in Vienna, Szlama Dragon, after having confused Crematorium I with "Bunker 2" (!) the day before, was forced to confess (Pressac 1989, p. 172):

"I can't remember today after 30 years..."

Therefore, in 1993, Szlama miraculously remembered perfectly what he could no longer remember in 1972! This is a specific reason for not considering these testimonies in detail, in addition to the general reason that very late testimonies (in this case dating back forty years after the alleged events) are necessarily influenced by too many external factors, which alter the genuine memories, if they exist in the first place.

Pressac's assessment influenced all subsequent orthodox historiography, which hastened to dust off Tauber's testimony. In 1995, Franciszek Piper, at that time director of the Auschwitz Museum's historical department, reproduced it in the original language in the Museum's five-volume history of the camp (Długoborski/Piper 1995, Vol. III, pp. 189-208), which was later translated into German and English (idem 1999, 2000).

Robert Jan van Pelt took it in 1999 as the historical-technical basis of the alleged homicidal gassings and cremations in his expert report on Auschwitz for the libel trial of British historian David Irving against US-American scholar of Jewish religion Deborah Lipstadt (11 January to 11 April 2000). This report, which is known as "The Pelt Report," was later released as a book in a revised and expanded edition. When assessing Tauber's testimony, van Pelt went far beyond the limits Pressac had set for himself, writing in that book in open contradiction to revisionist historians (van Pelt 2002, p. 193):

"All of Tauber's testimony up to this point can be confirmed in the blueprints or by means of other documents in the archive of the Auschwitz Central Construction Office. Only the division of the gas chamber of Crematorium 2 into two spaces cannot be traced in the archives. Negationists use this to refute the validity of the whole of Tauber's testimony."

There is no need to point out that no revisionist researcher has ever dreamed of refuting the entire testimony in question on the basis of this detail alone. This is therefore a pathetic lie. Van Pelt continues (ibid., p. 205):

"Given [Enrique Aynat] Eknes's difficulty in discrediting Tauber's testimony, it is not surprising that negationists preferred to bury it in silence. Yet we do well to attach the highest evidentiary value to it, not only because of its internal consistency. Tauber's statements were largely corroborated by the contemporary testimonies of Jankowski and Dragon and by the later memoirs of Filip Müller." (Emphasis added)

And finally, here is how van Pelt summarizes his assessment of the testimony in question (ibid., p. 204):

"Tauber's statement was extremely specific, it did not contain contradictions, and it did not contain improbable allegations. In fact, negationists have not been able to discredit him as a witness." (Emphasis added)

Regarding Dragon, he wrote (ibid., p. 188):

“Dragon was precise and reliable when he talked about what he had witnessed in person, and none of the details he told were part of the Soviet report.” (Emphasis added)

The last part of this statement is clearly wrong, since the Soviets summarized “Shyloma Dragon’s” statements in the report in question (the Communiqué mentioned above).

These utterances of van Pelt perfectly characterize their author, who is completely devoid of any critical sense and hopelessly afflicted by a staggering credulity, as I have amply demonstrated in a separate study (Mattoigno 2020). The fact that van Pelt, who posed as an “expert” on Auschwitz during the Irving vs. Lipstadt Trial, completely ignored the Soviet interrogations of Tauber and Dragon is undermining his credibility even more.

The present study constitutes the revisionist response to van Pelt’s claims. It is so little “negationistic” of truth and facts that it brings into the historiographical debate two important documents hitherto not only unpublished, but – because of their very content – actually completely unknown even to Auschwitz specialists: The first statements ever made by Tauber and Dragon.

Although Tauber and Dragon are universally considered by orthodox Holocaust historians to be witnesses of extraordinary importance, none of them, starting with Jean-Claude Pressac, Robert Jan van Pelt and Franciszek Piper, ever bothered to obtain their first testimonies, whose existence was known since 1945, since they were explicitly mentioned in the report of the Soviet Commission of Inquiry on Auschwitz, as I mentioned earlier. After the opening of the Soviet archives, the retrieval of these testimonies (and of others, such as Mandelbaum’s) was within the reach of any willing researcher and, in fact, Jürgen Graf and I found them in Moscow about 25 years ago without too much difficulty.² These testimonies are therefore presented here for the first time in a Western language.

There is also another brief, practically unknown testimony by Tauber, which he gave in 1945 to the Jewish Historical Commission of Krakow, the precise date of which is not indicated (Tauber 1945).

This study is devoted to an examination of the testimonies of Henryk Tauber and Szymon Dragon mentioned above. In Part One I, present the English translation; in Part Two, I present a critical historical-technical analysis of the testimonies in order to establish whether they really have a “very high probative value,” and how we are to assess the judgments expressed in this regard by Pressac and van Pelt.

² The only exception, but always too late, is Russian historian Pavel Polyak, who recently published a transcript of the two statements’ original texts (Dragon: Polyak, pp. 590-600; Tauber: ibid., pp. 605-613). Polyak’s merits in this context are purely editorial in nature, because he insists on the veracity of these witness accounts with obtuse credulity.

Striving for completeness, I pick up what I already stated in my “Critical Analysis of Henryk Tauber’s Testimonies” published in another study (Matogno 2019, pp. 331-375), and I will elaborate on this in more detail here.

There is also an Italian translation of Tauber’s testimony of 24 May 1945 (Saletti, pp. 59-82), which, besides being second-hand in nature, is also riddled with so many errors and inaccuracies as to be historiographically unusable.

In the translations I have tried to maintain, as far as possible, the rough and repetitive style of the original texts, even if the resulting prose is anything but polished. This way the reader can get a more-precise idea of Tauber’s and Dragon’s way of expressing themselves than other translations, which are more elegant, but at the same time less adherent to the original.

I have added in the text, between square brackets, everything that serves to better clarify the meaning of certain terms, and the correct spelling where they are misspelled. In footnotes, I have provided necessary contextual explanations and the translations of the words or expressions mentioned in German.

With this book I add another study to my cycle of critical analysis of the “eyewitness accounts” of the self-styled members of the Sonderkommando that I have undertaken over the years and have collected mainly in the works listed below:

- “La verità sulle camere a gas”? Anatomia della “testimonianza unica” di Shlomo Venezia. Effepi, Genoa, 2017;³
- An Auschwitz Doctor’s Eyewitness Account: The Tall Tales of Dr. Mengele’s Assistant Analyzed. 2nd ed., Castle Hill Publishers, Uckfield, 2020;
- The Making of the Auschwitz Myth: Auschwitz in British Intercepts, Polish Underground Reports and Postwar Testimonies (1941-1947). 2nd ed., Castle Hill Publishers, Uckfield, 2021;
- Sonderkommando Auschwitz I: Nine Eyewitness Testimonies Analyzed. Castle Hill Publishers, Uckfield, 2021

In these works, I have critically examined five general categories of witnesses, which I enumerate in order of importance:

1) Self-proclaimed eyewitnesses of the Sonderkommando:

André Lettich, Shlomo Venezia, the authors of the clandestine manuscripts (“Author Unknown,” Chaim Herman, Salmen Gradowski, Leib Langfus, Salmen Lewental, Marcel Nadsari [Nadjari]), Szaja Gertner, Polish Anonymous Witness of 1945, Roman Sompolinski, Charles Sigismund Bendel, Milton (Meilech) Buki, Miklós Nyiszli, Polish Anonymous Witness of 1946, Arnošt

³ The contents of this book will be included in another study on self-proclaimed members of the Auschwitz Sonderkommando which is currently evolving and will be Volume 46 of the series Holocaust Handbooks; editor’s note.

(Ernst, Arnold) Rosin, Filip Müller, Dov Paisikovic, Stanisław Jankowski, Henryk Mandelbaum, Ludwik Nagraba, Joshua Rosenblum, Aaron Pilo, David Fliamenbaum, and Samij Karolonsij.

2) Witnesses who worked in the crematoria without being part of the Sonderkommando:

Four Hungarian anonymous authors: Protocol No. 90 (23 June 1945); Protocol No. 151 (27 June 1945); Protocol No. 182 (30 June 1945); Protocol No. 2114 (26 August 1945), and Lieberman (1945).

3) Testimonies of detainees who allegedly escaped gassings:

Abraham Cykert (1945), Regina Bialek (1945), Sofia Litwinska (1945), Bruno Piazza (1956).

4) Casual witnesses to the gas chambers:

Ada Bimko (1945), Jeannette Kaufmann (1945), Regina Plucer (1945), Hermine Kranz (1945), Fritz Putzker (1945), Isaac Egon Ochshorn (1945), Anonymous French Jewish Witness (1946), Helena Bard-Nomberg (1946)

5) Witnesses who received information directly from members of the Sonderkommando:

Alfred Wetzler and Rudolf Vrba, Sofia Kaufmann Schafranov (1945), Marie Claude Vaillant-Couturier (1945), Marc Nahon (1945), Chaim Frosch (1945).

[p. 1] Witness Interrogation Protocol⁴

27 February 1945

Operating Army

The deputy military prosecutor of the First Ukrainian Front, Major of [Military] Justice Pakhomov, questioned the person named below as a witness under Sections 162-168 of the Code of Criminal Procedure of the Russian Socialist Federative Soviet Republic⁵ through the Polish-to-Russian interpreter Ekaterina Maksimovna Samsonova, a former prisoner.

1. Last name, first name, father's name – Tauber Genrik [Henryk] Abrakham [Abraham].
2. Citizenship – Polish
3. Ethnicity – Jew
4. Year and place of birth – 8 July 1917, Kshanov [КШАНОВ, in Polish: Chrzanów], from this same district
5. Social background – lower middle class
6. Degree of Education – 7 grades.
7. Party affiliation – non-partisan
8. Family status, family members, and their place of residence – single.
9. Place of work and office held –
10. Military rank and from what year in the Red Army –
11. Decorations and honors –
12. Participation in combat, when, where and with what rank –
13. Criminal record – no criminal record
14. Permanent residence and exact address – Kshanov, Trunwaldskaja [Grundwaldzka] Street 1

The witness, informed of the criminal nature of giving false testimony or refusing to testify under Section 95 of the Code of Criminal Procedure of the Russian Socialist Federative Soviet Republic, stated:

⁵ The Russian abbreviation is RSFSR.

[p. 2] I speak Polish well and will give my testimony in Polish.

I was arrested by the Gestapo on 14 October 1942 in the City of Krakow, where I was in the ghetto. I was arrested because I was Jewish. I was held under arrest by the Gestapo for two months, and I was interned in the Auschwitz Prisoner Camp on 19 January 1943.

At first, I was housed in a section of the Birkenau Camp, but after three days I was transferred to a section of the Monowitz Camp.

In Monowitz, one of our transport fell ill with typhus, after which all of us, 1,200 people, were sent back to Birkenau.

On the third day after our return to Birkenau, a German named Groll, Unterscharführer, Arbeitsdienst – labor service manager – came to us in Block No. 27 and asked us who could work as painters, carpenters and locksmiths. I and 19 others declared our profession – I am a locksmith by trade – and all 20 of us were taken to Block 11 of the Auschwitz Camp, the camp prison.

We spent one night in the prison, and in the morning we were all taken to work in the crematorium. We did not know that we were going to work in the crematorium. The crematorium was located at the Political Department. The 20 men were all of Jewish nationality. At the crematorium, a total of 33 people worked with us, of whom 26 were Jews and 7 were Poles.

At the crematorium there was a Kapo who supervised the cremation work, a Pole named Metik Morawo [Mieczysław, aka Mietek Morawa], from Krakow, who was also a prisoner. The highest-ranking German was the head of the crematorium, Obersturmführer Grabner.

I worked for a month at the crematorium. At the crematorium we cremated corpses that were brought to us by truck.⁶

[p. 3] In my presence, live people were neither gassed nor cremated at the Auschwitz crematorium, but only corpses were cremated. These corpses came from the camp area; these people had died of natural causes or had been shot and killed by the Germans.

In the crematorium there were three furnaces with two openings each. Five bodies were placed in each opening at a time. The process of cremating one load⁷ took an hour and a half.

The 20 of us worked at the crematorium as apprentices 12 hours, from 6 a.m. to 6 p.m., and the crematorium generally was in operation almost all day long. During this period, that is, during operation, 250-300 corpses were cremated per day in the crematorium.

In the crematorium there was a gas chamber, which measured 7 x 15 x 2 m in height, perhaps even a little larger.⁸ That it was a gas chamber, I learned from the conversations of the comrades, and [I apprehended it] also because on the ceiling there were openings [ljuki] with lids through which the gas was thrown into the chamber, and [because] the doors were hermetic, with peep holes.

⁸ The room actually measured 17 m × 4.60 m × 2.86 m.

Similar gas chambers I later saw in other crematoria in the camp. There were cases in which 30-40 people were brought to the crematorium 2-3 times a week alive; there they were shot by Gestapo members, and we cremated them. The furnaces of the crematorium had two muffles /retorts/, they were heated with dry generator gas. The gas generator was located behind the furnace. Each furnace had two gas generators, – one muffle, one gas generator. Coke was burned in the gas generator. The temperature in the retort reached 1,200-1,500°C.

This crematorium was in operation from the beginning of 1940 to February 1943.

The ashes from the furnaces were taken away by trucks, but I do not know where. At the crematorium, the corpses were cremated without clothes. I don't know where they were stripped. The corpses were lean – mere skin and bones. These people had all been tormented by the Germans, at work, at roll call, during inspections, etc.

[p. 4] During the work, we were severely tormented; in March [1943], only 9 were left of us 20 people, the rest had been exterminated – slain, shot and cremated. Also in March, we were all assigned to work in the Birkenau Camp crematorium. This crematorium was numbered No. 2, and at that time had just been completed. This crematorium was located on the left side of the railway. From 15 March 1943 on, transports of people began to arrive, whole groups of people, they began to be taken to the crematorium, gassed and cremated. Until 15 March, we heated the furnaces, or rather we dried them. From 15 March 1943 onward, transports of people – entire convoys – began to appear [and the Germans] began to take them for the most part to the crematorium, to gas them and to cremate them. The first transport that arrived at the crematorium contained 4,000 people, sent from the Krakow City Ghetto. They were all gassed at the same time and cremated. There were mothers with children, old men and women. In the crematorium, there were two large underground rooms, one of which, larger, served as an undressing room, the other, smaller, for poisoning with gas. At the entrance of the crematorium, it was written at the top in all languages “Disinfection room and bathroom”. In the gassing hall, 4,000 people were gassed at a time. People arrived at the crematorium dressed and carrying small bundles of their belongings. All other things were taken away from them on the ramp, where the human transports were unloaded.

In the changing room, there were numbers, people undressed, hung up their clothes, and went through a door along a corridor into the gas chamber. There were installations there like in shower rooms, i.e., there were shower heads overhead. When the gas chamber was full of people, the door was sealed, and all the people were gassed. The gas was thrown in through four openings that were in the ceiling. People would die in 20-30 minutes, and we would cremate them.

[p. 5] In the gas chamber there were two fans, one suction, the other pressure. We took people away for cremation after the ventilation of the gas chamber. We entered the gas chamber wearing gas masks. After the gassing, people appeared in various ways, i.e., in various distorted poses, with distorted faces, clinging to one other, mothers to children, etc.

Zyklon gas was diffused into the gas chamber through wire-mesh columns that formed a square channel with double mesh layers. There were five triple-muffle furnaces in this crematorium. Four to five corpses were introduced into each muffle. The corpses burned within 20-25 minutes. This crematorium was in operation from March 1943 until October 1944, that is, one year and eight months. After the gassing, people were taken by elevator to a special room, a room on the second floor [sic]; gold earrings, watches and rings were removed from the people and golden teeth pulled. All this was put in separate boxes, and the people were transported on carts to the furnaces, where they were introduced and cremated.

Before being put on the elevator, the women had their hair cut, which was taken to a special warehouse. When people entered the room that was the undressing room, they found many SS men with dogs and truncheons; if someone resisted or did not want to enter the gas chamber, they forced them to enter with the dogs, beat them with sticks, sprayed them with jets of water.

A total of 70 inmates worked in the crematorium, in the so-called Sonderkommando. There were up to 7 SS men guarding us and keeping order. In the crematorium there were 4 doctors, who were also inmates. They dissected the bodies of the dead, etc., but [p. 6] not the gassed people, and kept a kind of accounting. All Sonderkommando personnel lived at the camp, in Block 2. If there were transports, the crematoria operated twenty-four hours a day. People were mercilessly exterminated by the thousands. On average, 3,000 people a day were exterminated.

In the spring of 1943, three more crematoria were built, which also began to exterminate people by gassing and cremation. Next to Crematorium No. 2, Crematorium No. 3, of exactly the same type and capacity as Crematorium No. 2, began to operate. Crematoria Nos. 4 and 5 followed; they were of a different type. In each crematorium, there was an 8-muffle furnace. 4-5 persons were introduced into each muffle. The duration of cremation was 35 minutes. One furnace cremated 1,200-1,500 people per day. In the summer of 1944, many people were exterminated; 4 crematoria and 4 big pyres [костра, kostra] were in operation for the extermination; French resistance fighters and Hungarians were exterminated. I worked all the time in the Sonderkommando, and had to work in all crematoria and at the pyres, so I know everything in detail. In all crematoria, there were gas generators which operated with coke.

Question: How were the gas chambers set up in Crematoria 4 and 5, and how did the Germans poison people there?

Answer: Crematoria 4 and 5 had an annex about 20 meters long. Inside, the construction was divided into three parts, each of which was a gas chamber. In order to pour the “Zyklon” into the chamber, there were hatches with grates⁹ in the walls at a height of approximately two meters, which could be closed hermetically with shutters. In each gas chamber, there were two hermetically closable doors. The rooms of the gas chambers were connected by a corridor to the dressing room, which had an area equal to that of the [p. 7] three gas chambers together.

Depending on the number of people arriving, the Germans poisoned them concurrently in one, two or three chambers.

The process of poisoning people took place in a similar way to that which the fascists used in the gas chambers of Crematoria Nos. 2 and 3. The difference was that “Zyklon” was poured by the SS through the aforementioned openings, which were made in the walls, not in the roof, as in Crematoria Nos. 2 and 3. Furthermore, in the gas chambers of Crematoria Nos. 4 and 5, there was no ventilation [system], so the ventilation of the chambers was carried out by opening doors and small windows. After poisoning, the corpses were taken away in two directions: either they were deposited in the undressing room, or – as was done for some time in Crematorium 5 – they were taken through the outer door into the crematorium courtyard, where they were cremated on pyres.

If a new group of people arrived when the undressing room was full of corpses, and if at that time another group of people arrived at the crematorium, they were undressed in the courtyard, and were then poisoned according to the usual procedure in the gas chambers.

Question: Tell us when Crematorium 1 ceased its activity.

Answer: The Germans closed Crematorium 1 in March 1943 and stopped cremating people there.

Question: How long did each of the Crematoria 3, 4 and 5 operate?

Answer: Crematorium 3 started operating in April 1943 and remained in operation until October 1944. In November, the Germans started to demolish it, I do not know for what reason. Crematorium 4 was put into operation at the end of March 1943 and remained active until and including August 1944; part of it burned down at the beginning of October, and in October it began to be demolished.

[p. 8] Crematorium 5 went into operation in May 1943 and operated until 20 January 1945.

The questioning was suspended until the following day.

The testimony was transcribed correctly, it was read to me and in confirmation of this I signed it – Signature.

The interrogation was conducted by:

The Deputy Military Prosecutor of the First Ukrainian Front, Major of [Military] Justice Pakhomov.

Continuation of the interrogation of Tauber Genrik Abrakham (Henryk Abraham).

28 February 1945.

The witness, who had been informed of the criminal nature of false testimony, testified:

Question: Say when the Germans stopped poisoning people with gas in the gas chambers at Birkenau.

Answer: At the end of October 1944. In Crematorium 5, they cremated people until 20 January 1945. People who had been tormented and shot by the Germans were cremated there.

Question: How many workers were there in the crematoria, how were they divided according to tasks, and what shifts did they work in the crematoria?

Answer: In each of Crematoria Nos. 2 and 3, 60 camp inmates who had become part of the so-called Sonderkommando – special squad – normally worked in one shift. One shift worked 12 hours. Two shifts were in operation over a 24-hour period. These 60 persons in Crematoria Nos. 2 and 3 were distributed according to specialization as follows:

[p. 9] 1. Collection of items left in the undressing room, loading on trucks, cleaning the premises	15 men
2. Removing bodies from the chamber and transport to elevator	15 men
3. Placement of the bodies in the elevator	2 men
4. Barbers – shearing of female corpses	4 men
5. Dentists – extraction of gold teeth from corpses	2 men
6. Operating the gas generators	2 men
7. Operating the corpse elevator	2 men
8. Removing corpses from the elevator	2 men
9. Transport of the corpses to the furnaces retorts [muffles]	2 men
10. Introducing corpses into retorts (2 groups of 5 men)	10 men
11. Assistants of the supervisor	4 men
	<hr/> 60 men

In Crematoria Nos. 4 and 5, 30 men worked in one shift. In all four crematoria, there were also three goldsmiths who melted down the gold teeth extracted from the corpses.

Question: How many men were in the Sonderkommando in all crematoria at different times in 1943?

Answer: In March-April 1943, there were 400 men in the Sonderkommando; they were distributed among the crematoria as follows: 240 men worked in Crematoria Nos. 2 and 3. 120 men in Crematoria Nos. 4 and 5;¹⁰ in addition, there were 40 men who were sick or were assigned to various tasks. The numerical strength of the Sonderkommando changed all the time, because the Germans systematically killed a part of the workers, mainly by burning [sic], and replaced them with others.

[p. 10] In May 1944, the number of Sonderkommando workers was increased by the Germans to 1,000, because then they began to cremate the corpses on pyres at Crematorium 5. The Separate Gas Chamber No. 2¹¹ was restored and put into operation, and the chambers¹² next to it.

The above-mentioned 1,000 men of the Sonderkommando were assigned to work from May onwards as follows:

Crematorium 2: 120 men, 60 men each shift

Crematorium 3: 120 men

Crematorium 4: 60 men

Crematorium 5: 300 men

Separate Gas Chamber No. 2¹³ and pyres next to it: 300 men.

Question: Apart from the above-mentioned crematoria and pyres, did the Germans exterminate people in any other way?

Answer: In addition to the crematoria, the Germans built separate gas chambers Nos. 1 and 2 in Birkenau and pyres next to them,¹⁴ where they exterminated people. I do not know when they began to operate, but I do know that the Germans stopped exterminating people there in April 1943.

From May to October 1944 inclusive, Gas Chamber No. 2 and the pyres next to it worked intensively, and also the pyres next to Crematorium 5.

Question: How many hours per day did the crematoria and the pyres operate?

Answer: Crematoria Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5 and the cremation pyres and gas chambers operated twenty-four hours a day. In Crematoria Nos. 2 and 3, the cremation of corpses in the furnaces was carried out during the entire day, except for a break to remove the slag, but for at least 21 hours.

Question: Tell how the Germans exterminated the Sonderkommandos, or if they did not exterminate them.

Answer: The Germans exterminated a large part of the Sonderkommandos by cremation in the crematoria, by [p. 11] beating them and by setting the dogs on them. But sometimes they suddenly withdrew several hundred men and sent them away. In August 1944, the Germans exterminated 200 men in one fell swoop. They were all killed in the Auschwitz 1 Camp, in a disinfection chamber. In place of those exterminated, the Germans put others.

I know of one case where 200 men of the Sonderkommando were separated out and burned in Lublin-Majdanek. I was able to save myself because I escaped from the transport during the evacuation. I cannot say anything more in this regard.

My statements were transcribed accurately and read to me.

I, Tauber Genryk Abrakhom [sic] declare moreover:

The pyres for cremating corpses were arranged in pits, at the bottom of which a channel for air supply had been dug along the entire length of the excavation. From this channel, there was a branch to a pit 2 x 2 x 4 meters deep. During the cremation of the corpses on the pyres, the fat dripped into this pit: with this fat the corpses on the pyres were sprayed so that they burned better. At first, wood was put in the pit, then 400 corpses, alternated with branches, were sprinkled with gasoline, and the fire was started. Then the remaining corpses from the gas chambers were thrown in, and from time to time the fat from the corpses was poured in.

They were cremated on a pyre for about 48 hours. If the Germans had [p. 12] poisoned a larger number of people, and it was impossible to cremate them on one pyre, they had subsequent pyres set up.

1.2. Statement to Investigating Judge Jan Sehn (24 May 1945)¹⁵

[p. 1/122] Auschwitz, 24 May 1945. Krakow Investigating Judge Jan Sehn, a member of the Commission of Inquiry into German-Hitlerite Crimes at Auschwitz, questioned on the initiative, in the presence and with the participation of Deputy Prosecutor of the Krakow District Court Edward Pęchalski, pursuant to Section 254 in connection with Sections 107, 115 of the [Polish] Code of Criminal Procedure, the former inmate of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp No. 90124, who stated the following:

¹⁵ AGK, NTN 93 (Höss Trial), Vol. 11, pp. 122-150. In the translation I indicate both the typescript's page number and the page number of the court document, See Document 4.

My name is Henryk Tauber, born on 8 July 1917 in Chrzanów, son of Abraham Tauber and Minda née Szajnowic, unmarried, of Jewish religion, Polish citizenship and nationality, shoemaker by profession,¹⁶ domiciled in Chrzanów, 1 Grunwaldzka Street, no criminal record.

Until the outbreak of war in 1939, I lived in Chrzanów with my immediate family of 12 people. From this family, I and one of my brothers-in-law survived. So far, I have no news about the fate of one of my brothers who emigrated to Russia. As a result of massive relocation and deportation actions, our family was separated, and I found myself in the Krakow Ghetto. There, I was arrested in November 1942 and imprisoned in the prison of the Jewish Public Order Service at 31 Józefińska Street. On 19 January 1943, I was transferred to Auschwitz with a transport of 400 Jews from the Krakow Ghetto and 800 Aryans from Montelupi.¹⁷ There were about 800 men and 400 women in this transport. The women were already separated at Auschwitz Station and quartered in the women's camp at Birkenau; I, on the other hand, went to Block 27, Sector Bib, together with a group of 250 Jewish prisoners and about 550 Aryans. This block was not yet finished; it had no windows, no doors and no cots. I then went, in that order, to Block 22 [and then to Block] 20 of this same camp sector; I was for a couple of days in Buna,¹⁸ from where I was transferred back to Birkenau, because typhus had been discovered among the inmates of the group to which I belonged, and I was assigned to Block 21 of Sector BIb.

[p. 2/123] The registration was carried out in the meantime, during which I presented myself as a qualified locksmith and mechanic. At the beginning of February 1943, Unterscharführer Groll, *Arbeitsdienst*¹⁹ and Arbeitseinsatz,²⁰ [and] the inmate Mikusz came to [our] block, and they chose qualified inmates [workers] from among those staying in our block, ostensibly to work in the workshops of Auschwitz. Twenty young Jews were chosen. We were taken to Block IV,²¹ where we underwent a medical examination, and were all found to be in good health. On the same day, we were taken by truck, escorted by the SS, to Auschwitz and housed in Bunker [w bunkrze] No. 7 of Block XI.²² The next day, accompanied by a large number of SS men, we were taken to the bunker, which, as it turned out later, was Crematorium No. 1.²³ There we found seven Jews, including Jankowski, and three Poles. The Kapo was Mietek Morawa from Krakow. He was a tall, blond, slender man, judging by his appearance about 24 years old. One of his brothers was a boxer in Krakow. I heard that Morawa's family lived in Dębni. ²⁴ At first, while working there in the first Auschwitz crematorium, he was a very strict Kapo, carrying out to perfection the work ordered by the Germans. He later moved on to Crematoria II and III at Birkenau as Oberkapo. There he tried to live in harmony with us, because there were about 400 of us, we had already worked for a very long time at the crematoria, we were disillusioned and ready for anything, and therefore we did not let anyone step on our toes.

On the first day after our arrival at the crematorium, an SS Unterscharführer whose name I do not remember gave us a speech. He told us that we would perform an unpleasant job, but we would nevertheless have to get used to it, and after a while it would [no longer] present any difficulties for us. He spoke in Polish. During the whole speech, he did not make a single mention of the fact that we would be assigned to the cremation of human corpses. He concluded this speech with the order "Los an die Arbeit," ²⁵ and by hitting us on the head with a whip. In the company of Mietek Morawa, we were pushed into the bunker [morgue] of Crematorium I, where we saw several hundred corpses. They were piled one on top of [p. 3/124] the other, dirty, frozen; many corpses were bloody, with their skulls smashed, others with their stomachs open, evidently as a result of an autopsy. These corpses were frozen; we had to separate them from each other with axes. Pushed and prodded by this Unterscharführer and by Kapo Morawa, we dragged these corpses to the hajcownia, ²⁶ where there were three furnaces, each of which had two muffles. ²⁷ I call muffles, according to the terminology accepted by the Soviet Commission, the retorts ²⁸ for the cremation of corpses. In the "heating [furnace] room" we placed the corpses on a cart on rails that ran between the furnaces. ²⁹ From the door leading to the bunker where the corpses were kept [the morgue], this cart went on a disk ³⁰ that rotated in all directions, and moved across to the "heating room" on wider tracks. From these wide tracks, narrow tracks led to each muffle, on which the cart ran towards the muffle. This cart moved on four metal wheels. It had a sturdy supporting surface in the shape of a box. Into this [sort of] box we put stones and iron to weigh it down. The upper part of this [sort of] box was a metal stretcher about 2 meters long. ³¹ On this stretcher, we placed five corpses: the first two corpses with their legs facing the furnace and their bellies up, then two more corpses in the opposite direction, and these corpses also had their bellies up. The fifth corpse was placed with its legs towards the furnace and its back up. The arms of this fifth corpse would hang down as if embracing all the corpses lying beneath it. Since sometimes such a load had a weight greater than that of the cart's support surface, we supported the stretcher beam from underneath so that the cart would not tilt and the corpses would not fall. Once the stretcher was loaded, we pushed it into the muffle. When the corpses were in the furnace, we would hold them [inside] by means of a sheet metal box that moved along the stretcher, and other inmates would pull the cart out from under the corpses.³² A special handle at the end of the stretcher allowed this moving box to be dragged [back].³³ Then we would close the [muffle] doors. In Crematorium I, as I mentioned earlier, there were three two-muffle furnaces. Each muffle could cremate five human corpses [at once].

[p. 4/125] So in this crematorium, 30 human corpses could be cremated at the same time. During the period in which I was serving in this crematorium, the cremation of such a load lasted one and a half hours. They were in fact emaciated corpses of people, real skeletons, which burned very slowly. From subsequent practice and observation of cremations in Crematoria II and III, I know that corpses of fat people burn considerably faster. The cremation process is accelerated by the burning of human fat, which produces additional heat [które wytwarza dodatkowy żar]. All of the furnaces in Crematorium I were located in a room that was called the “furnace room”. Near the entrance to this room was a furnace with the gasifier facing the entrance door and with the muffles facing the room. The [other] two that were further away were arranged exactly the opposite way, i.e., with the muffles facing the entrance door and the gasifiers toward the room, and were located at the back of the room. These furnaces were heated with coke. They were built by the company “Topf und Söhne” of Erfurt, as indicated by the inscription on the furnace doors and other metal parts. The cart for transporting the corpses was also manufactured by this company. Behind the “heating room” was a small coke-storage room,³⁴ next to it a small office,³⁵ and further to the right the urn storage room³⁶ for the human ashes. The entrance door that currently leads to the room that I called the “furnace room” was not built until later. During the period in which I worked at Crematorium I, this door did not exist. At that time, one entered the furnace room from the corridor to the left of the entrance. There were two such doors. The first door, on the right side of the corridor, led to an auxiliary storeroom where the spare grills were located. This is where the people undressed who arrived in small truck transports and who were shot in the bunker³⁷ of Crematorium I during the period in which I worked there. I call the bunker the part of the building in which people were gassed. Such transports arrived once or twice a week, and consisted of 30-40 people. These people were of all nationalities. During the shootings, we workers of the Sonderkommando were pushed into the coke-storage room. Then we would find the bodies of the people who had been shot in the bunker. On all the corpses we saw a [p. 5/126] gunshot wound in the skull /*Genickschuss*³⁸/. The shootings were always carried out by the same SS-Mann of the Political Department in company with another SS-Mann of the same department who recorded the deaths of those shot. Kapo Morawa was not with us in the coke-storage room during the shootings. I do not know what he was doing in the meantime. We used to carry the corpses of those shot from the bunker to the heating room when the bodies were still warm and dripping with fresh blood. The second door to the right in the corridor led to a small room in which the ashes of the corpses were collected. Through this small room, one entered the bunker proper, which was used during my stay to shoot the victims and previously to gas people. In December 1942, 400 inmates of the Sonderkommando were gassed in this bunker. I was told about this by the inmates I found working in Crematorium No. I when I was assigned to this work. I worked in Crematorium I from the beginning of February until 4 March 1943, i.e., for one month. All this time we were kept in the bunker of Block XI. We were 22 Jews, because two Czech dentists from Birkenau were added to our group that had arrived at the beginning of February. The seven Jewish inmates I found working in Crematorium No. I were similarly housed in Block XI, but in a different cell. Kapo Morawa and the Poles Józek and Wacek, who were already working with him in Crematorium No. I, were housed in Block XV, thus in an open block. In addition to these two Czech Jews, four Poles were assigned to our group during this month: Staszek and Władek, whose surnames I do not remember, as well as Władysław Biskup from Krakow and Jan Agrestowski from the parish of Pas, near Warsaw. I remember their surnames well because I wrote letters for them in German for their families. These four Poles mentioned above were also staying in Block XV. When they left for work, the old commando³⁹ which was employed in Crematorium I was called “Kommando Krematorium I”. Our group, i.e., the 22 Jews from Block XI and the four Poles assigned to our group, was called “Kommando Krematorium II”. We did not understand the meaning of this at the time.

³² The “box” (“pudło”) was a hollow half-cylinder made of sheet metal (Verschiebewagen, transfer cart), with the front part open, which slid over the stretcher; when the latter was introduced into the muffle, the half-cylinder was pushed forward until it enveloped the corpse; Then, using a poker, pressure was applied to the half-cylinder to hold it in place and at the same time the coffin-introduction cart (Sargeinführungswagen) was pulled back, so that the stretcher slid out under the corpse, which was placed on the grid of the muffle.

³³ Here Tauber is confusingly referring to the large handle that the coffin-introduction cart had at its rear to maneuver it; as I have already explained, in order to pull the stretcher out of the muffle, one had to pull back the entire coffin-introduction cart and not just the transfer cart.

[p. 6/127] Only later did we convince ourselves that we had been sent to practice for a month at Crematorium I in order to prepare us for work at Crematorium II.

I emphasize that the crematoria and the commandos assigned to their service were subordinate to the Political Department. The files of the inmates who worked in these commandos were located at the Political Department. The sick were not sent to the hospital, but to a closed block [where] an isolated hospital room had been set up for them. The block in which we were staying was isolated, and in Auschwitz we were kept in Block XI, which was closed. Release from one commando and transfer to another did not depend on the Arbeitsdienst, but could only take place by order of the Political Department. Our doctor was the French Jew Pach. He was a very good specialist, he treated [also] the SS, and with their protection, he managed to get himself out of the Sonderkommando block [and to go] to another block. When the Political Department learned of this fact, Pach was reassigned to work in our sick room, although he had been in a free block for a few months. During my work at Crematorium I, the supervision of our activity was carried out on behalf of the Political Department by, among others, Untersturmführer Grabner and Oberscharführer Kwakernak.⁴⁰ I remember that Kapo Mietek asked Grabner to assign him a prisoner for work, because one of our group had died. Grabner replied that he could not give him a “Zugang,” but if he killed four other Jews, he would give him five “Zugang”⁴¹ [Zugänge]. He also asked Mietek what he beat the inmates with. Mietek showed him a stick. Grabner then grabbed an iron grate [sic] and told Mietek that he had to hit the inmates with this. After the first day of work at Crematorium I, five [inmates] from my group called in sick and stayed in the block. The next day, as we were pulling the bodies out of the bunker of Crematorium I, we found their naked bodies with no traces of gunshot wounds. I suppose they had been killed by an injection. After a month of work at Crematorium I, only 12 of 22 Jews remained. On 4 March 1943, my group, together with Władysław Tomiczek from Cieszyn and the four aforementioned Poles (Biskup and the others), was transferred to [p. 7/128] Birkenau, where they were housed in Block No. II, Sector BIb. It was an isolated block. As I later learned, Tomiczek had already worked at the crematorium in 1941. He was an old inmate [with a serial number] around 1400. Before being assigned to our group, which took place in March 1943, he had worked for some time at the mill and at the slaughterhouse, where he had been arrested with a group of 49 other prisoners on charges of conspiratorial activity. The whole group was imprisoned in Block XI of Auschwitz, and sentenced to death by the SS Tribunal. Untersturmführer Grabner recognized Tomiczek shortly before the execution, and assigned him to our group. Tomiczek worked in Birkenau as Kapo of the Kommando employed in Crematorium II, and then in Crematorium IV. In August 1943, I believe, Tomiczek was summoned to the Political Department, from where Oberscharführer Kwakernak brought back his corpse on the same day, which we cremated in Crematorium V. Tomiczek's head was enclosed in a sack, but we recognized him anyway, because his robust build stood out. Kwakernak watched over us until Tomiczek's body was placed in the furnace, then he left immediately. We [then] opened the door of the furnace, took out the corpse, opened the sack, and from the face we recognized Tomiczek without any uncertainty. He was a very good man; he behaved decently with us; we had informed him about our conspiratorial activity.

On 4 March 1943, we were taken under SS escort to the area of Crematorium II. There, Kapo August, who had come at this time from Buchenwald where he had worked in that crematorium,⁴² explained the structure of the crematorium to us. Crematorium No. II had below ground an undressing room /Auskleideraum/ and a bunker, i.e., a gas chamber /Leichenkeller/ [=morgue]. To pass between these two basements, there was a corridor to which a set of stairs and a sloping trough [slide]⁴³ led from the outside to throw down the corpses brought from the camp to be cremated in the crematorium. From the undressing room, a door led into this corridor, and from there, through a door on the right, into the gas chamber. On the side of the entrance [p. 8/129] in the area of this crematorium, a second staircase led to the corridor. To the left of this staircase, in the corner, was a small room for hair, glasses and other things, to the right was a small room in which spare "Zyklon" cans were kept. In the right corner of the corridor, in the wall opposite the entrance from the undressing room, there was an elevator to bring up the corpses. From the courtyard of the crematorium, the entrance to the undressing room was via a staircase. This staircase was surrounded by an iron barrier [railing]. Above the door hung a sign with the inscription "Zum Baden und Desinfektion".⁴⁴ This inscription was written in several languages. In the undressing room, wooden benches and numbered wooden clothes hooks were placed along the walls. There was no window, and the light was always on. The undressing room also had a water supply and was equipped with a drain. From the undressing room, one went into the hallway through a door above which hung the words “Zum Bade” repeated in various languages. I remember there was also the word “Bania”.⁴⁵ From this corridor, you went through a door on the right into the gas chamber. It was a wooden door, made of two layers of short pieces of boards, similar to the arrangement of a parquet floor; between these [two] layers there was a mass [of a material] that hermetically sealed the edges of the door, and the joints of the frame were similarly covered with felt seals. In this door, at the head height of a man of average stature, was a round glazed little window. On the other side of the door, i.e., on the side of the gas chamber, this window was protected by a hemispherical grating. This grating was installed because it had happened that the people who were in the gas chamber, before dying, had broken the glass window. Since even the grating did not prevent this, and similar incidents occurred despite its installation, this window was then closed with sheet metal or a board. In this connection I would like to point out that the persons to be gassed who were in the gas chamber often damaged the electrical cables, tore them out, and damaged the ventilation system. This door was closed from the corridor side with an iron latch which, after the door was closed, was tightened for airtight closure by means of special keys. The ceiling of the gas chamber rested on [p. 9/130] concrete pillars in the center of its length. To the left and right of these pillars were four columns. The outer layer of these columns was made of a thick wire mesh⁴⁶ that went up to the ceiling and outside. Behind this layer was a smaller mesh netting, and within it, a third fine[r]-meshed [net]. In this third netting, there was a box, by which the powder [proszek],⁴⁷ from which the gas had already evaporated, was extracted with the help of a wire. There was also an electrical system in the gas chamber which ran along both walls of the supporting beam which rested on the concrete pillars. The ventilation system was installed in the walls of the gas chamber. From it [the ventilation duct] opened towards the inside of the [gas] chamber small openings equipped with nets [grates] of white sheet metal that were placed in the upper part of the side walls and [other] lower openings protected by a kind of iron muzzle [semi-spherical iron grate]. The ventilation of the gas chamber was connected to a system of ventilation pipes that were located in the undressing room. This ventilation, which also served the dissection room, was operated by electric motors located in the attic of the crematorium building. The gas chamber did not possess a water system. The water tap was located in the corridor, and a rubber hose was used to rinse the floor of the chamber. At the end of 1943, the gas chamber was divided in two by a masonry wall, so that it was suitable for gassing smaller transports. In this wall, there was a door similar to the one [that led] from the corridor to the entire chamber. The smaller transports were gassed in the rear chamber farther away from the entrance to the corridor. Above, both the undressing room and the gas chamber were covered by a concrete slab and were covered with earth seeded with grass. Above the gas chamber rose four openings like small chimneys, into which the gas was poured. These openings were closed by concrete lids with two-handed wooden handles.⁴⁸ Above the undressing room the ground was a little higher than the level of the yard and completely level. Ventilation pipes fed into the ducts and chimneys that were located in the part of the building that was above the corridor and undressing room. I emphasize that at first there were no benches or coat hangers in the undressing room, and in the gas chamber [there were] no showers. They were [p. 10/131] installed only in the fall of 1943 in order to disguise the undressing room and the gas chamber by presenting them as a bath and disinfection [room]. These showers were attached to pieces of wood that had been inserted into the concrete ceiling of the gas chamber for this purpose. No water supply was connected to these showers, so no water ever came out of them.

As I have already mentioned, an elevator, properly a freight elevator, carried the corpses to the ground-floor level. There, a door led from the elevator to the heating [furnace] room, where the cremation furnaces were located; another door led in the opposite direction to an auxiliary room for the corpses. There was also a corridor which was accessed by an entrance on the side of the entrance gate into the crematorium area. From this corridor, through a door to the right, one entered the dissection room. Between the dissection room and the auxiliary storage room for cadavers there was a toilet, which was accessed through a door from the dissection room. From the corridor, through a door on the left, one entered the heating room from the side of the cremation furnaces' gas generators. These furnaces were lined up next to each other at equal intervals; there were five of them, each fueled by two gas generators. On the other side, that is, the side where the elevator exit was located, these furnaces had three muffles. Each muffle could hold five human corpses. Each muffle could be closed by an iron door marked "Topf". Underneath each muffle was the ash box, which could also be closed with an iron door manufactured by the same company. Behind the furnaces, on the left side of the access to the crematorium courtyard, was the coke-storage room. Going to the end of the courtyard,⁴⁹ behind the coke-storage room, one came to a small and narrow corridor from which a door led to a small room for the SS; from it, a window opened onto the heating room, on the side of the muffles. Another window opened onto the rear courtyard of the crematorium. Next to this [small room] was the *Kommandoführer's*⁵⁰ room with a window facing the rear courtyard. Behind this room was a toilet and a small washbasin, and then the doctors' room, with a window facing the women's camp. From this small corridor, a staircase led to the attic, where there was a room for the people employed in the [p. 11/132] Sonderkommando. Also in the attic were the electric motors that ran the elevator and the ventilation. They were serviced by an inmate mechanic. On the side of the access to the crematorium courtyard, in the middle [of the wing] of the building that protruded from it at the front, there was an annex in which the furnace for burning garbage was located. It was the so-called "Müllverbrennung".⁵¹ It was a separate furnace [and] one descended to it via a set of stairs; it was surrounded by an iron railing and heated with coal. The entrance to the annex of the "Müllverbrennung" was on the side of the entrance to the crematorium area. This annex, in addition to the door, had a window on the front side and a window on the right and left of the entrance. At the corner to the left of the entrance, there was an opening through which, from an ash box in front of it on the outside of the annex, things to be burned were thrown into the annex. The furnace for burning these things was on the left of the entrance to the annex, the hearth for heating the furnace on the right. I would like to point out that it was in this furnace that the documents of the Political Department were burned all the time. From time to time, SS men would bring in whole trucks [loaded] with papers, documents and files, and these papers would be burned under their supervision. While burning these papers, I noticed that among them were whole piles of cards of dead people or "Totenmeldungen".⁵² We could not take any of these papers, because we were burning them under direct and careful supervision of the SS. Behind the annex of the "Müllverbrennung," at the back of the crematorium, there was a chimney which served all the cremation furnaces and the "Müllverbrennung" furnace. At first, there were three electric motors around this chimney to strengthen its draft. Because of the heat next to and in the vicinity of the furnace, these motors broke down, and once a fire even broke out, so they were later dismantled, and the ducts carrying the combustion gases from the cremation furnaces were connected directly to the chimney. From the annex of the "Müllverbrennung," a door led to the part of the building where the chimney was located. This part was located higher up, and was accessed via a set of stairs. After the motors had been dismantled, a washbasin was installed in this part next to the chimney for the [inmates] employed in the Sonderkommando [p. 12/133], and in the opposite part, the one closest to the undressing room, a room in which Oberkapo August sometimes slept. He stayed permanently in the Reichsdeutsche block, at first in Sector BIb, then in Sector BIId. In the attic, above the "Müllverbrennung" annex, the victims' hair clippings were dried, disentangled and packed in sacks. These bags were then taken away by truck.

As I mentioned above, Crematorium No. II had five furnaces. Each crematorium had three muffles for cremating corpses, and was heated by two coke-gas generators. The outlets of the fire ducts of these gas generators were located above the ash boxes of the two side muffles, so that the flame⁵³ first passed through the two side muffles, then entered the central muffle, from where the combustion gases went to the chimney through a duct running below.⁵⁴ The flue-gas channel started from under the cremation furnaces on the side of the muffle between the two gas generators. By virtue of this system, the process of cremation of the corpses in the side muffles and in the central one was different. Muslim corpses, i.e., emaciated and fatless corpses, burned faster in the lateral muffles and worse in the central one. On the contrary, the corpses of gassed people who were sent to the gas directly from the transport and therefore were not emaciated, burned better in the central muffle. During the cremation of these corpses, we used coke only for the ignition of the furnace. Fat corpses burned by themselves thanks to the burning of the fat present in the body. It also happened that, when there was no coke to heat the gas generators, we placed straw and wood in the ash boxes, which were located under the muffles, and as soon as the fat of the corpses ignited, the entire load⁵⁵ already burned with its own fire. The muffle inside did not have any iron parts; the grate was made of fireclay. [Any] iron parts would have melted in the heat, which reached 1,000-1,200°C. The fireclay grates in the muffle were arranged crosswise. The doors were smaller than the entrance openings of the muffle; the muffle itself was about 2 meters long, 80 centimeters wide and about 1 meter high. As a rule, 4-5 corpses burned in such a muffle.

[p. 13/134] But there were also cases in which we loaded more corpses into the muffle. As many as eight muslims could be accommodated [introduced] in there. We burned these larger loads during air raids without the knowledge of the crematorium chief, so that a larger fire came out of the chimney, and the airmen became aware of it. We thought that in this way we could change our fate in our favor. The iron parts and especially the iron grate that are currently in the camp area are components of the gas generators. Crematorium II had grids of thick iron bars. In Crematoria 4 and 5 there were pointed grates in the shape of a sword with a handle.

On 4 March [1943], we were in charge of firing up the gas generators. We kept them going from morning until 4 o'clock in the afternoon. In the meantime, a commission from the Political Department and senior SS officers from Berlin arrived at the crematorium. In addition to them, there were also civilians and engineers from the “Topf” Company. Of the members of this committee I remember Hauptsturmführer Schwarz, Lagerkommandant Aumeyer [Aumeier] and Oberscharführer Kwakernak. After the arrival of the commission, we were ordered to bring out corpses from the auxiliary room⁵⁶ and to throw them [!] ⁵⁷ into the muffles. In the auxiliary room, we then found about 45 corpses of only men, very well fed and fat. At that time, I did not know when these corpses had been deposited in the auxiliary room, and from where they had been taken. But then I learned that they had been selected from the people gassed at Bunker No. II, located in the woods. In fact, an officer from the Political Department had gone there [and] had ordered to select from the corpses of the gassed persons the corpses of well-developed and fat people, [then] had commanded to take these corpses away from the bunker area on a truck. The Sonderkommando inmates who were employed there did not know where these corpses had been taken. It turned out that they were used to test the efficiency of Crematorium No. II, which was to be put into operation at that time, and to demonstrate it to the many-member commission. We brought [up] these corpses through the elevator and the door leading to the heating room [p. 14/135], and placed them two or three at a time on a cart similar to the one I described when speaking of Crematorium No. 1, and loaded them into the individual muffles. After the introduction of the entire batch of corpses into all the muffles of all the furnaces, the members of the commission, watches in hand, observed the process of cremation of the corpses, opened the doors, looked at the watches, discussed among themselves, and marveled that the cremation lasted [so] long. Since the furnaces, because they were completely new, had not yet warmed up properly, although they had been operating since the morning, the cremation of this load lasted 40 minutes. With continuous operation, the crematorium cremated two loads per hour. According to regulations, we had to load new bodies into the muffles every half hour. Oberkapo August explained to us that, according to the calculations and plans of the crematorium, the cremation of a corpse in a muffle took 5-7 minutes. At the beginning, he did not allow us to load more than three corpses. With such a pace, we had to work non-stop, because after loading the last muffle [the load of] the first one was already burned. In order to have a break in the work, we loaded 4-5 corpses into each muffle. The cremation of such a load took longer, so after loading the last muffle, we had a few minutes of rest while the load of the first muffle burned [out]. We would use this time to wash the floor of the heating room, so the air would cool down a bit.

The commission departed after the cremation of this first test load; we tied up the crematorium, washed it, and were taken to Block 2 of the BIIb Camp. For the next 10 days, we went every day under SS escort to the crematorium and fired up the gas generators. During these 10 days, no transports arrived; we did not cremate any corpses, but only kept the gas generators running to heat the furnaces. Towards the middle of March 1943, after we had finished our work, the then [head] of the crematoria, Hauptscharführer Hirsch, arrived and ordered us to stay in the crematorium, because we had to carry out a job. As night fell, the first trucks arrived on which people of various ages and of both sexes were brought in. Among them were old men, women and many, many children. These trucks came there and [returned] back [p. 15/136] in the direction of the train station in about an hour, bringing more and more people. When the trucks started to arrive, we of the Sonderkommando were locked in the room where – as I explained in the description of the crematorium – the physicians assigned to the autopsies were staying. From this room, we could hear the crying and screaming of the people who had been unloaded from the trucks into the crematorium courtyard. These people were pushed into a barracks which was then situated perpendicular to the crematorium building, on the side of the entrance to the yard of Crematorium No. II. The persons entered this barracks through a door that was on the entrance side, and went down the staircase that was to the right of the “Müllverbrennung.” At the time, this barracks served as an undressing room. However, it was only used for about a week, and then it was dismantled. After the barracks had been dismantled, the people were pushed into the underground part of the crematorium by way of a staircase leading to the underground undressing room which I described earlier. After about two hours in the doctors’ autopsy room, we were taken out and ordered to go to the gas chamber. In this chamber, we found piles of naked corpses, in a position similar to sitting. The corpses were pink in color, in some parts redder, in others they were covered with greenish spots with drooling at the mouth, some had blood coming out of their noses, in most cases we could see excrement. I remember that many had their eyes open; many corpses were clinging to each other; the greatest number of crowded corpses were lying near the door. Near the wire-mesh columns, they were less crowded. From the arrangement of the bodies, it could be seen that people had moved away from these columns and had wanted to reach the door. It was very hot in the chamber, and there was such a stench that it was impossible to bear. Later we became convinced that many of the bodies in the gas chamber died of asphyxiation, of lack of air, even before the gassing. These people lay on the floor, and others walked over them. They were not sitting down, like the majority, but were lying on the floor. From this it could be seen that they had died before the others, who must have stepped on their corpses. After the people had been pushed into the gas chamber and had been locked in, [p. 16/137] and before pouring the “Cyklon,” air was extracted from the chamber, in fact the ventilation of the chamber lent itself to this purpose. It was a suction-pressure system. The undressing room had only suction ventilation. Although the ventilation was turned on after the door to the [gas] chamber was opened, in the first moments after entering the chamber, when there were gassed persons in the chamber, we worked on extracting the corpses while wearing gas masks. However, we did not remove the corpses from this first transport in mid-March 1943, because we had to return to servicing the furnaces. At that time, 70 inmates who were part of the Sonderkommando and in charge of cremating the corpses in the bunker pits were brought in from Block II. This group took the corpses out of the gas chamber into the corridor near the elevator, where a barber cut the women's hair, and then the corpses were taken up the elevator to the level of the heating room. There they were either deposited in the auxiliary room for corpses or were taken to the heating room and placed in front of the furnaces. There, two dentists under SS control extracted [the corpses' precious] metal teeth and dentures. They also removed rings from the corpses and tore earrings from their ears. The teeth were thrown into a crate that bore the inscription "Zahnarztstation,"⁵⁸ the jewelry into another crate. This crate had no inscription but was only marked with a number. Dentists who had been recruited from among the inmates looked into the mouths of every corpse except the children. When the mouths were pressed together [=clenched], they opened the jaws with pincers, which they used also to extract the teeth. As I have already mentioned, the work of the dentists was minutely controlled by the SS who assisted in this operation. Every so often, they would stop a load of corpses already treated by the dentists [headed] to the furnaces, look into [their] mouths, and in some cases note the presence of a gold tooth not extracted by the dentists. Such an oversight was considered sabotage, and the offending dentist was burned alive in a furnace. I personally witnessed a French Jewish dentist being burned in this way in Crematorium V. He defended himself and shouted, but the SS, there were a few of them, threw themselves on him, rendered him harmless, and put him alive in a furnace. The punishment of being burned alive was used quite often for the men of the Sonderkommando, but it was not the only one, because in addition to it, other punishments were inflicted, such as shooting on the spot, being thrown into a tub [full] of water, [p. 17/138] physical torment, beatings, rolling with the naked body on gravel, and other tortures. These punishments were inflicted before the eyes of the entire Sonderkommando staff in order to frighten them. I also remember another case that took place in Crematorium No. V in August of 1944. At that time a golden wedding ring and a watch were found on one of the ordinary workers, a Jew from Walbrom named Lejb, about 20 years old, dark-haired and wearing the number one hundred and eight thousand and more, during the change of shifts. All the Sonderkommando personnel employed in the crematorium were then assembled, and before their eyes, he was hung with his hands tied behind [his back] from an iron bar above the gas generators. He hung in this position for about an hour; then, after his arms and legs had been untied, he was led into an unheated furnace in the crematorium, where the ash box underneath was doused with gasoline and set alight, so that the flames reached the muffle in which this Lejb was located.

After a couple of minutes, the furnace was opened, and the doomed man escaped from it completely burned and was ordered to run around the courtyard of the crematorium and shout that he was a thief, then he was ordered to climb the barbed wires of the crematorium fence, which at that time, since it was daytime, was not electrified. When he was on top of the wires, the crematorium chief Moll shot him. Moll's first name was Otto.

Another time the SS chased an inmate who was dawdling at work at the crematorium into a pit in which there was boiling human fat. At that time, corpses were cremated in open-air pits, from which the fat flowed into a separate tank dug into the earth.⁵⁹ This fat was used to sprinkle on the corpses to speed up the burning process. This unfortunate man was pulled out of that grease tank still alive and was shot. To complete the formalities, the corpse was taken to the block, where the "Totenschein,"⁶⁰ was issued, and the corpse was taken to the crematorium area only the next day and cremated in a pit.

During the cremation of the corpses from that first transport in mid-March 1943, we worked non-stop for 48 hours, but we were not able to cremate [p. 18/139] all the corpses, because in the meantime a Greek transport arrived, which was also gassed. But since we were tired and completely exhausted, we were taken to the block, and the work was taken over by another shift of the Sonderkommando, which at that time also operated the two bunkers [and] numbered about 400 inmates. I worked in Crematorium II until the middle of April. During this time, Greek, French and Dutch transports arrived. Also during this time, we cremated the corpses of the people who had been gassed as a result of the selection made at the camp. We worked in two shifts, day and night. I am not in a position to give a figure for the number of people gassed and cremated during this period.

On average, 2,500 bodies were cremated per day. During this time, I did not have the opportunity to observe the procedure by which the victims were pushed into the undressing room, and then from the undressing room into the gas chambers. When the transports arrived, we of the Sonderkommando were locked up in the coke-storage room. However, two [inmates] remained in the heating room to operate the gas generators. It happened that I also took part in this service. From a window in the heating room, I observed how the "Cyklon" was poured into the gas chamber. Each transport was followed by a car bearing the insignia of the Red Cross. The camp doctor Mengele and Rotenführer Scheimetz arrived in this car at the crematorium. They took out of this car with the insignia of the Red Cross in which they had arrived some cans of “Cyklon” [and] took them to the small chimneys for pouring the “Cyklon” into the chamber; there, Scheimetz opened them with a special chisel and hammer, poured the contents of the can into the chamber, and covered the opening with a concrete lid. As I have already mentioned, there were four such small chimneys. Into each of them, Scheimetz poured the contents of a smaller can⁶¹ of “Cyklon”. They were cans with a yellow label glued around them. Before opening a can, Scheimetz would don a gas mask. He opened the can of “Cyklon” with the mask on, and with the mask on, he poured the contents of the can into the opening that led into the gas chamber. This operation was carried out not only by Scheimetz, but also by other SS men designated specifically for this purpose who belonged to the “Gesundheitswesen,”⁶² whose names I do not remember. At each gassing, [p. 19/140] a camp physician was present. I mentioned Mengele because I met him very often during my work. In addition to him, the camp physicians König, Tilo [Thilo] and a tall, slender young man, whose name I do not remember at this time, also attended the gassing. During the selection, this one sent everyone to the gas. I remember that once Mengele appealed to Scheim[e]tz to feed the victims who were in the gas chamber more quickly, so that they [Mengele and Scheimetz] could then go to Katowice. He then told him verbatim: “Scheimetz, gib ihnen das Fressen, sie sollen direkt [sic] nach Kattowitz fahren.”⁶³ This meant that Scheimetz had to hurry up⁶⁴ and pour the “Cyklon” into the chamber. While working at Crematorium No. II, I also noticed that the SS men who escorted the transports arriving at the crematorium area were leading dogs and were holding whips.

⁵⁹ "Ziwnego," literally "of the earth".

⁶⁰ Death certificate.

In Crematorium II, the cart for loading the corpses was used only for a short time, and was then replaced by iron stretchers /in German they were called Leichenbrett[er]/ which were inserted [all the way] to the bottom of the muffle on iron rollers⁶⁵ mounted on the lower edge of the muffle door. This was done because the use of the cart delayed the loading of the bodies into the furnace. This new device was invented, I believe, by Obercapo August. It was then used in all the other crematoria. In the furnaces of Crematoria II and III, there was only one pair of rollers for all three muffles of a furnace; they moved on an iron bar⁶⁶ in front of the muffle doors. In Crematoria IV and V, each muffle had its own fixed rollers installed in front of its door. Each crematorium had two iron stretchers⁶⁷ for loading the corpses into the furnaces.

These planks [stretchers] were placed in front of the muffle. Two inmates would place the corpses on them. The corpses were arranged in such a way that the first corpse lay with its legs in the direction of the muffle with its back down and its face up. On top of this corpse, another one was placed, also with the face up, [but] with the head turned towards the muffle. This was done so that the upper corpse would clasp the legs of the corpse lying below, so that it was not necessary to push the legs of the upper corpse into the furnace, but they would glide in by themselves. [p. 20/141] Two inmates would load the corpses onto the stretcher. Two others stood by the ends of a pole placed under the stretcher near the muffle. While loading the corpses onto the stretcher, one of them would open the muffle door, the other would set up the rollers. A fifth inmate would lift the stretcher by the handles and, after also being lifted by the other two and being placed on the rollers, the stretcher would enter the muffle. When the corpses were now inside the muffle, a sixth inmate with an iron scraper would hold them inside the muffle, and the fifth would pull the stretcher out from under them. This sixth inmate's duties included washing the stretcher with water after it had been pulled out of the furnace. He would do this to cool the stretcher, which became hot in the furnace. It was also [to make sure that] the bodies that had just been placed on the stretcher did not stick to it. Soap was dissolved in this water so that the corpses would slide well on the sheet of the stretcher. The second load to be cremated in the same muffle was loaded in the same manner as this [first load], but with this second pair of corpses we had to hurry, because the corpses loaded earlier were already burning in the meantime, their arms and legs were rising, so that in case of a delay, we found it difficult to load the second pair of corpses into the furnace. During the loading of this second pair of corpses into the furnace, I had the opportunity to observe the process of burning of the corpses. It seemed as if the corpses straightened the trunk of the body, that [their] hands rose up and contracted, the same thing happened with the legs. Blisters formed on the body, and with older corpses, which sometimes lay up to two days in the auxiliary room after the gassing and were bloated and swollen, the abdominal diaphragms burst, and the entrails came out. I could also observe the burning process when a scraper was operated in the furnace to accelerate the burning of the corpses. By the way, after each loading, the SS Kommandoführer checked whether the furnaces were loaded properly. We had to open the doors of each muffle for him, and at that time we saw what was going on inside. We cremated the corpses of children along with those of older, adult people. First, we loaded the corpses of two adults into the furnace, then as many children as would fit into the muffle. Most of the [p. 21/142] times the corpses of 5-6 children. We did this so that the children's corpses would not lie directly on the grates, which were placed wide apart,⁶⁸ because the children's corpses could fall through them into the ash pit. Women's corpses burned much better and faster than men's corpses. Therefore, if a load was burning badly, we would look for a woman's corpse [and] load it into the furnace to speed up the burning process. In the early loads, when the furnaces were heated only by the gasifiers, cremation took place more slowly. But then, as more loads were cremated, they [the muffle walls] were brought to red heat by the embers that were produced by the cremation of the corpses, so that during the cremation of fat corpses, generally the gasifiers were shut down. From the corpses placed in the furnace thus brought to red heat, the fat immediately dripped into the ash box; in the ash box, it ignited and burned the corpse. During the cremation of muslims, it was necessary to constantly feed the gasifiers. The *Vorarbeiter*⁶⁹ wrote down in a notebook the number of corpses cremated with each load, and an SS Kommandoführer checked these notes, and took the notebook to himself after the cremation of an entire transport. With each shift of our Sonderkommando came more SS guards and more Kommandoführer. Among the Kommandoführers I remember Gorgies, Knaus, Kurschuss, Schultz, Köln and Keller. Scheimetz, whom I have already mentioned, was also Kommandoführer in Crematorium IV for some time. All Kommandoführers ruthlessly mistreated the inmates of the Sonderkommando working in the crematorium. Sometimes this took on such a form that, for example, the crematorium chief Voss, who was transferred from this post to another one after a short time, reproached Kommandoführer Gorgies, who mistreated us in a beastly manner for the sole reason that there was no work at the crematorium, because no transports had arrived. Then he said to him: "Wenn du hast nicht was zu umlegen, dann bist du wild. Ich habe dass schon genug" [sic].⁷⁰ In addition to the aforementioned Voss, at various times the heads of the crematorium were Unterscharführer Steinberg, Hauptscharführer Hirsch and Moll, Scharführer Puch and Oberscharführer Musfeld [Muhsfeldt] who came from Lublin after the liquidation of the local crematorium.

[p. 22/144]⁷¹ The most-depraved of them all was Hauptscharführer Otto Moll. Even before my arrival at the camp, he was the director of works in the bunkers, where those gassed were cremated in pits. Sometime later, he was transferred to another sector. In view of the preparations for the arrival of Hungarian mass transports in 1944, he was entrusted with the direction of all the crematoria. He organized the entire extermination of the people who arrived with these transports. Even before the arrival of the Hungarian transports, he ordered the digging of pits next to Crematorium V, and put Bunker No. 2, which was then inactive, and its pits back into operation. yard of the crematorium, he hung signs on poles with inscriptions; according to their content, people who had arrived by transport were to go to the camp, where work awaited them, but first they had to bathe and undergo disinfection. For this purpose, they had to undress [and] deposit all valuables in baskets placed in the courtyard for this very purpose. He also repeated these instructions⁷² personally in speeches he gave to the people who arrived with the transports. These transports were very numerous, and it happened that the rooms of Crematorium V could not contain all the [people in the] transports that arrived.

The remaining people, who did not fit in the gas chambers, were most often shot by him personally. In many cases, he threw people alive into the burning pits. He [also] practiced shooting people from a distance. He mistreated and beat the Sonderkommando inmates, and treated them like animals. The female inmates who were assigned to him⁷³ for his personal service recounted that he used an iron wire to take gold valuables⁷⁴ out of the crate in which he stashed the valuables stolen from the people who had arrived by transport, and put them in a bag. From among the objects left by the gassed people, he took for himself furs and a lot of foodstuffs, especially fat. On these occasions, he would turn to the SS men around him with a smile and tell [them] that it was necessary to stock up on foodstuffs because lean days would also come. On his orders, the Sonderkommando was enlarged to about 1,000 inmates. At first, when I was assigned to work [p. 23/145] in the Sonderkommando, it numbered about 400 inmates, and maintained this strength until January or February 1944. In one of these months, a transport of about 300 inmates was sent to Lublin. In the meantime, about 50 prisoners per week were assigned to the Sonderkommando, however, we were dying in such numbers that, in the initial period of my work, despite these weekly arrivals, the Sonderkommando did not have more than 400 prisoners. After this transport was sent to Lublin, there remained approximately 100 of us. From Lublin, 20 Russians and the German Karol as Kapo were sent to our group. In addition, a few dozen inmates were also assigned to the Sonderkommando, among them⁷⁵ gold smelters⁷⁶ and stokers from Crematorium I in Auschwitz. In April 1944, therefore, the Sonderkommando numbered about 160 inmates. At the end of the month, in anticipation of the Hungarian transports, it was increased to 1,000 inmates. By their behavior, their treatment of us and the type of work during the mass cremation of the Hungarian transports, Moll and the SS men around him reduced us to despair. After contact was established with the camp [resistance] and the outside world, we decided to organize an uprising and win our freedom or die. We set a deadline of June 1944 for the uprising. I do not remember the exact date. However, the uprising did not take place, although everything was already prepared for its launch, and even people from whom we had kept the preparation of the uprising a secret participated in the secret action. This affair caused us a lot of damage, and after it was discovered, it claimed many victims. The first to be shot shortly after the deadline for the uprising was set was our Kapo Kamiński. After that, we were transferred to Crematorium IV in order to make any contact with the [outside] world impossible. Of the personnel housed there, about 200 inmates were selected and sent to be gassed. They were gassed in the delousing [chamber]⁷⁷ of “Kanada” in Auschwitz, and cremated in Crematorium II; this cremation was carried out by the SS men in charge of the crematorium themselves. The situation became more and more serious for us, and although we were watched and monitored with doubled vigilance, [p. 24/146] we decided to escape from the camp at any cost. After the preparations, the uprising in Crematorium IV took place in September 1944; it also involved [the staff of] Crematorium II. During the uprising in Crematorium IV, we killed 20-30 SS men, and fled in all directions. First, we set Crematorium IV on fire and blew it up. An alarm was sounded at the camp, the SS surrounded all the crematoria, and almost all the escaped inmates were captured. As a result of the uprising, only about 190 of 1,000 [inmates] remained alive. We were all housed in Crematorium III, then transferred to Block 11 of Sector BIId. From here, 100 inmates left by transport, 30 were assigned to cremation [work] in Crematorium V, and 60 were housed in Block 11 and worked in the Abbruchkommando.⁷⁸ This Kommando was involved in the demolition of Crematoria II and III, [the reusable parts of] which were to be transferred to Gross Rosen. After some time, the 30 stokers from Crematorium V were also housed in Block 11, so that, when the camp was liquidated, there were approximately 90 inmates of the Sonderkommando in Block 11. On 18 January 1945, we were taken to Auschwitz together with inmates from other blocks, and driven in the direction of the Reich. After about 20 km, I escaped, and in this way saved my life.

As I mentioned earlier, four forensic physicians were also part of the Sonderkommando. Initially, they stayed with us in the block, but later they were placed in the room next to the coke-storage room in Crematorium II. These doctors performed autopsies on corpses in a room on the first floor of Crematoria II and III. In these rooms, there were two large solid-stone tables on which the doctors performed the autopsy. They dissected the corpses of inmates who had died in the hospital [and] some corpses of people who had been shot in the corridor between the undressing room and the gas chamber. Most of the time, these shootings were carried out by Moll personally. Inmates who came from the bunkers of Block 11 or from outside Auschwitz were shot. Very often, when the inmates were brought in to be shot, an Unterscharführer, whose name I do not know, arrived at the crematorium, and cut the fat meat off the corpses of those shot. [p. 25/147] He put the severed thighs and buttocks into boxes or a bucket, and took them away from the crematorium in a car. I do not know for what purpose he did this. The medical detainees, after performing the autopsy, drew up an autopsy report; this report was then taken away by an SS doctor.

In April 1943, in the middle of the month, I was assigned to work in Crematorium No. IV, which at that time was the second to come into operation. Later, also in the first half of 1943, Crematorium No. V and finally Crematorium No. III came into operation. Crematorium III was built in the same way as Crematorium II, with the difference that in this crematorium the cart for loading the corpses into the furnace was not used right from the start. In the room next to the coke-storage room where the doctors were housed in Crematorium No. II, in Crematorium No. III the goldworkers⁷⁹ worked, who melted the artificial teeth into gold bars.

Crematoria IV and V were also built according to the same plans and were located symmetrically on both sides of the road between Camp BII and “Mexico,”⁸⁰ in the direction of the new sauna.⁸¹ These crematoria each had two furnaces with four muffles. The muffles of each furnace were arranged two by two [= in pairs] on each side. In these furnaces, each gasifier heated the two muffles located in the middle of each furnace. Each furnace had its own chimney. Both the dressing room and the gas chambers in Crematoria IV and V were on the first floor [ground level]. The building in which they were located was much lower than the heating room, so that it looked like an annex to the crematorium. From the heating room, in the direction of the undressing room, there was a narrow corridor with four internal doors. They led from each end of the corridor to the heating room and the undressing room. The undressing room had four small windows protected from the outside by iron grates.⁸² Another door led from the undressing room to a corridor in which there was a door leading in from the crematorium courtyard. In this same wall, next to the entrance door, there were two windows. Opposite the entrance door to the corridor, a second door led into a room with a window in which the kitchen for the SS [p. 26/148] crematorium attendants was located. The food in this kitchen was prepared by Sonderkommando inmates. The Sonderkommando inmates’ room was adjacent to this room. In Crematorium V, the Sonderkommando shoemakers, tailors and carpenters worked in this room, while in Crematorium II [IV], the hair cut from the corpses of the gassed persons was stored in this room. The third door in this corridor led to a smaller corridor, which in turn had a door to the crematorium courtyard and a window with a grating. From this corridor, the door to the right of the entrance led into the first chamber, through the door opposite into the smaller chamber, from which a door led into the last chamber, the largest. This second corridor, like the other three rooms mentioned above, was used as a gas chamber for gassing people. All [the rooms] had gas-tight doors, windows fitted with gratings on the outside⁸³ that could be closed from the outside by gas-tight shutters. These small windows,⁸⁴ which a standing man could reach with his hand raised, were used to pour the contents of the “Cyklon” cans into the gas chambers filled with people. The gas chambers were about 2 meters high, had electric lighting that ran along the walls, but no ventilation system. The Sonderkommando employed in removing the corpses from the gas chambers worked with gas masks. The corpses were dragged along the floor through the entrance corridor, where the barbers cut [their] hair, then through the undressing room, which in these crematoria served as an auxiliary room for [storing] the corpses. It was a large hall in which the corpses were put to clear the gas chambers. From the undressing room, the corpses were dragged through the narrow corridor between the heating room and the undressing room. At each end of this corridor was a dentist who would tear the corpses’ gold teeth out. The loading of the corpses from the heating room into the muffles was done by means of iron stretchers, which I described earlier. Behind the heating room was the Kommandoführer’s room, next to it a smaller room for the remaining SS men, a small corridor, a bathroom and toilet for the SS men, and the coke-storage room. The entire building was made of masonry and had a wooden frame roof covered with asbestos panels and tarred cardboard. The courtyards of all the crematoria were separated [p. 27/149] from the outside world by a thick wicker and live hedge, over which straw mats were also spread. In the courtyard, there were watchtowers, from which SS men with machine guns kept vigil; the entire grounds were also surrounded by barbed wire charged with electricity; the courtyards were illuminated by powerful floodlights.

In May 1944, the SS ordered us to dig five pits in the courtyard of Crematorium V, in the part between the drainage ditch and the crematorium building, in which the corpses of the gassed people from the Hungarian mass transports were cremated. Indeed, a railway track was built between these pits, but we did not use these carts, [because] the SS considered them inconvenient, and the inmates of the Sonderkommando dragged the corpses of the gassed persons from the gas chambers directly to the pits. During this same period, the old Bunker No. 2 and its pits for cremating corpses were put back into operation. I did not personally work in Bunker No. 2. Since it was felt that the pits were better suited for cremating corpses, the crematoria were closed down one by one when cremations in the pits began. First, Crematorium IV was shut down, I think in June 1944, then in October 1944, I think, Crematoria II and III. Crematorium V remained in operation until the retreat of the Germans. Eventually, it was used to cremate the bodies of dead or murdered inmates. The gassing of people ceased in October 1944.

Today, I am unable to give an exact figure of all the people who were gassed and cremated in the crematoria and pits. Individuals from the crematorium staff secretly wrote down the most dramatic figures and events concerning the gassed persons. These notes were buried in various locations near the crematoria. Some of these notes were dug up during the stay of the Soviet Commission, which took them away. However, the vast majority must still be hidden in the ground, and this material could be recovered. Among other things, there are buried photographs of people gassed in the gas chamber, as well as of a transport that arrived at the crematorium for gassing. According to my assumptions, the total number of persons gassed in the Auschwitz crematoria during the period in which I served in these crematoria as a member of the Sonderkommando, [p. 28/150] is approximately 2 million. During my stay in Auschwitz, I had the opportunity to talk to various inmates who had worked in the crematoria and bunkers of Auschwitz before my arrival there. From them, I learned that by the time I started to work in the crematoria, approximately two million people had already been gassed in Bunkers Nos. I and II or in Crematorium No. I. In total, therefore, I calculate the total number of people gassed at Auschwitz at about 4 million. This figure includes various transports from the most diverse group of European countries, both Jews and Aryans, as well as persons who were assigned from the camp force to be gassed in the course of selections.

Demolition of the Auschwitz crematoria began in the fall of 1944. The dismantled parts were taken to the siding,⁸⁵ where they were loaded onto trains. Part of the disassembled crematorium material remained at Auschwitz, and is currently still located in the construction area of the so-called “Bauhof” at Auschwitz I. The Germans did not have time to ship this material. There are the carts I mentioned earlier, also a part of the ventilation system, the frames of the cremation furnaces of Crematoria IV and V, the iron doors of these crematoria [furnaces], the ash boxes, the grates, the iron window grates, the furnace grates, a gas-tight door of a gas chamber, clothes hangers and benches of the undressing room and other metal or wooden parts.

1.3. Statement to the Jewish Historical Commission of Krakow (1945)

This is the typewritten statement, registered under No. 26, which is titled “Tauber Hirsch, born in 1917 in Chrzanów” (“Tauber Hirsch ur. w roku 1917 w Chrzanowie”), and consists of four typewritten pages.⁸⁶ The account is written in the third person. The text is very short and sparse. For this reason, it is preferable to follow the text, written in the first person and more articulate, which appeared in a publication of the just-mentioned Commission in 1945.⁸⁷ I omit the first page and a half, which narrates earlier personal events of Tauber’s life that do not have a close connection with the vicissitudes of his deportation to Auschwitz, and I add the final lines of the typewritten statement.

“Revolt in the Crematorium

From the prison in Montelupi, the train took us to Auschwitz. In our transport, there were women and men. Any attempt to escape on our part generally failed. We entered the Auschwitz area surrounded by SS men. We were brought down [from the railway cars] with sticks and dogs. Some corpses were already lying on the ground as a result of the blows and beatings. Some people took their own lives. The men were separated from the women. I was led to the camp, into a block that was not [yet] completed, which could hold 1,000 people. A drunken chief [Kapo] joined us. We waited there until midnight. At that time, we were taken to Block Aufnahme [admission block]. We were registered and tattooed. The Jews, from whom 20 [young] men and 150 older men were chosen, were taken separately to the Straßkommando [penal squad], where they were hanged in turn, meaning that one hanged the other [mianowicie jeden wieszał drugiego]. All were recorded in books.

The rest of the transport was transferred to Buna, to the chemical plants I.G. [Farben]. There, we were to spend a three-week quarantine and then go to work. However, during the first week, there were two cases of typhus. We were sent back to Birkenau as contagious elements. We stayed there for one day. The Arbeitsdienst [labor service] requested 25 specialists, blacksmiths, bricklayers, etc., to work there. I introduced myself as a blacksmith. We were taken to the camp, first to Block 11, then to the prison. There, we spent the night in the basement.⁸⁸ The next day at roll call, we were called, the 25 of us, and taken to the crematorium, where others were also working. We were met with a beating. We had to cremate corpses.

We worked for four weeks. We stank to high heaven. Of the 25, only 3 remained. [The others] died of beatings and disease. Those who reported sick were already dead the next day. They were poisoned at the hospital. For fear of torture and death, the [sick] men worked with a temperature [fever] of 40 degrees [centigrade = 104°F].

After four weeks, we were sent back to Birkenau. We were assigned to the Sonderkommando. There, we had to burn the corpses of the gassed people. We worked [there] for 20 months. The transports, exclusively Jewish, arrived continuously. The columns of those condemned to be gassed, they pretended to send to the bath. People were undressed, beaten and pushed into the crematorium with dogs. During the gassing, they were locked up. One could hear [their] screams. After half an hour, they were corpses. Two thousand people perished at a time. Then we would be called to cremate the corpses. There were five crematoria available, and two sites designated for pyres. Between 400 and 1,000 men were assigned to this work. This Kommando^[89] was liquidated after a few months, and the men who were in it were gassed. At the most, a few remained.

After some time, mass transports arrived from Hungary. These people rebelled and threw themselves on the SS. Then, 40 SS men died. A crematorium was blown up, the fences of the women's camp and other [camp sectors] were cut. The insurgents intended to liberate the entire camp. However, soldiers surrounded the escapees, and 800 people fell. This happened in September 1944. The remaining 190 [men] of this Kommando, who had come out of hiding, were taken to the camp; 100 were rounded up in a transport to be shot. I was among the remaining 90. We were employed in the demolition of the crematorium. From then on, no more cremations took place there. The Kommando for the cremation of corpses had connections with the secret organization of the camp, which in turn had contacts with the outside world. From this organization, we were given information on what to do.

In this organization, there were also Russians who were in charge of loading broken aircraft. They supplied us with weapons. This Kommando worked in the Union [gunpowder] factory, from where girls procured the powder. Powder was used to make grenades that were used during the uprising. As a result of the uprising, four girls were arrested and hanged. The demolition of the crematorium lasted until 19 January 1945.

The typewritten statement ends as follows:

“During the general evacuation [Tauber] escaped from the road [from the marching column]. Before the evacuation, the boss [szef] arrived and ordered to prepare a separate transport. There was confusion, they did not succeed, the camp [lager] from Birkenau to Auschwitz [sic]. There he mingled with the crowd, donned other clothes, and fled.”

The witness, informed of the criminal nature of giving false testimony, or refusing to testify under Section 95 of the Code of Criminal Procedure of the Russian Socialist Federative Soviet Republic, stated:

[p. 2/15] On 7 December 1942 I was taken to the Auschwitz Camp in the Birkenau Sector with a transport of 2,500 persons. Upon arrival in the Birkenau sector, 400 persons, young and healthy men, of [these] 2,500 persons were selected and sent to the camp, and all remaining women of this number [transport] were sent to be burned in ditches [для сожжения во рвах, dlya sozhzheniya vo rvakh].

The selection of people for cremation was the responsibility of the SS fascist Mengele, a doctor, and SS [man] Mol [Moll], who directed the mass cremation of people arriving from various countries and of various nationalities, regardless of gender and age.

The SS-Pljage [Plagge], who had the German rank of Rapportführer, directed the people to the camp who had been selected for work. Mol had the rank of Hauptscharführer.

On 8 December 1942 I, together with other inmates of the camp, were tattooed – [I received] the number 80359 on my left arm – and were housed in Barracks No. 14.

On 10 December 1942, the SS men Plage and Mol selected 200 people from among the healthiest men, and told them that those selected would be sent to work in a rubber factory; at the same time all 200 people were given watery cabbage soup as a supplementary ration at night, so as not to arouse suspicion in them in any way about being sent to the rubber factory.

On 11 December 1942, after all [the others] had been taken from Barracks 14 to work, the Barracks Elder [Blockälteste], a Pole named Jup, announced that all those selected for the rubber factory were to remain in the barracks. Then Mol arrived and, addressing the 200 selected inmates, said that they should all line up to go to work [p. 3/16] at the rubber factory. At the same time, Mol divided those selected into two groups. Each group was escorted by 30 armed SS men and 8 SS men with dogs. It turned out that they had all been deceived: they were not escorted to a rubber factory but taken to two gas chambers [к 2-м газокамерам, k 2-m gazokameram].

I, who was part of one of the two groups, was taken to the gas chamber which was called Gas Chamber No. 2 [в газокамеру, которая именовалась газокамера N 2, v gazokameru, kotoraya imenovalas' gazokamera No. 2], the second group was taken to Gas Chamber No. 1.

At first, none of the 200 people knew that we were going to work at the gas chambers. I and all the others learned about it when we were taken there.

From Barracks No. 14, all those selected for the Sonderkommando /Special Kommando/ were transferred to Barracks No. 2, which was located approximately one kilometer away from the gas chamber. Barracks No. 2 was fenced off with 1.5-2-meter-high iron wires. SS guards armed with submachine guns escorted the Sonderkommando from the barracks to work and back to the barracks. No member of the Sonderkommando had the right or means to communicate with other camp inmates who were not working in the Sonderkommando; however, some found a way and, risking their lives, made contact with the camp inmates.

The group that had been brought to work in Gas Chamber No. 2 was divided up by Mol into various jobs: 12 persons were to remove the corpses from the gas chamber itself, among them myself; 30 persons to load the corpses onto the carts, 10 persons to carry the corpses to the carts, 20 persons to throw the corpses into the pits, 28 persons to carry wood to the pits to cremate the corpses, 2 persons to remove the corpses' gold teeth, rings, earrings, etc., which was done in the presence [p. 4/17] of two SS men, and 2 to cut the women's hair in the presence of an SS man. Mol personally set the pyres on fire.

After working one day in Gas Chamber No. 2, I became ill, so I was assigned to cleaning and other work in Barracks No. 2. I worked in the barracks until May 1943, and then I was assigned to the job of collecting bricks from the brick basements and brick half-basements that had been blown up by the Germans. I worked there until February 1944; at the same time, I worked in Gas Chamber No. 2 for about two months; a few days in Gas Chamber No. 1.

Gas Chambers No. 1 and No. 2 were about 3 kilometers apart in the area of the former settlement of Brzezinka [Birkenau], which had been burned down by the Germans.⁹¹ The gas chambers had been converted from two houses, whose windows had been made airtight. In the gas chamber named Gas Chamber No. 1 [в газокамере, именуемой газокамерой № 1: v gazokamere, imienuemoy gazokameroy No. 1], there were two rooms, in Gas Chamber No. 2, there were 4. About 500 meters away from Gas Chamber No. 1 were two standard wooden barracks, and at a distance of 150 meters from Gas Chamber No. 2 were two more similar barracks. In these barracks, the men, women and children undressed, and then they were pushed naked into the gas chambers; they were forced in there all together, and with the help of dogs.

In each of the rooms of Gas Chamber No. 1, there were two doors: through one door, the naked people were brought in, and through the other, the corpses were brought out. On the outside of the entrance door was the inscription "To disinfection," and on the inside of the exit door was the inscription "Entrance to the bathroom." Next to the door through which people entered was a square opening measuring 40 x 40 cm, through which Zyklon, which contained hydrogen cyanide, was poured into the chamber from a box [sic]. Meanwhile, the SS man donned a gas mask. One can contained 1 kg. The empty cans were taken away by the SS.

[p. 5/18] In the gas chamber – there were two of them – up to 1,500-1,700 people were pushed. The duration of the gassing was 15-20 minutes. Gas Chamber No. 1 had [an area of] 80 square meters. Zyklon was poured into the chamber through the opening by several SS men, one of whom was named Scheimetz. The removal of the corpses from the chamber, as I have already explained, was carried out in turn by 12 persons, every 15 minutes [they] removed them in [sets of] 6 persons. It was difficult to remain in the gas chamber for more than 15-20 minutes, because the smell of Zyklon, despite the open doors, did not disappear immediately. The clearing of the chamber lasted 2-3 hours. [Then] gold teeth were extracted from the corpses, and rings, earrings, brooches, etc. were also removed, and the women's hair was cut off.

In the pockets of the corpses' clothes, they searched for valuables, especially gold. At the haircut, there was an SS man. 500 meters away from Gas Chamber No. 1, there were four pits where the people were burned, each 30-35 meters long, 7-8 meters wide and 2 meters deep. The corpses were transported to the pit by five carts on a narrow-gauge railway. Each cart was loaded with 25-30 corpses. The duration of the transit of one cart in both directions [round trip] was about 20 minutes. At all the pits, 110 people worked in shifts day and night. In 24 hours, 7,000-8,000 people were burned in the pits.

Gas Chamber No. 2 had [an area of] about 100 square meters, each room – there were four – had two doors. Gas Chamber No. 2 could hold 2,000 people. The gassing lasted 15-20 minutes. Zyklon was introduced into each room of Gas Chamber No. 2 in the same manner as in Gas Chamber No. 1. The clearing of the chamber took no more than two hours, because it was carried out through each door; in addition, the narrow-gauge railway ran on both sides of Gas Chamber No. 2, next to the doors; with this railway, the corpses were transported to the pits in 7-8 [p. 6/19] cars. At a distance of 150 meters from Chamber No. 2, there were 6 pits of the exact same size as those [located] at Chamber No. 1. 110-120 people were working at the clearing of Chamber No. 2 and the burning of the corpses. In 24 hours, in all the pits of Gas Chamber No. 2, at least 10,000 people were burned. In 24 hours, in all 10 pits, an average of no [less than] 17,000-18,000 persons were burned, but on certain occasions the number of persons cremated in 24 hours amounted to 27,000-28,000 persons, arriving by transport from various countries and belonging to various nationalities, especially Jews.

To support the combustion of the pyres, the wood, when lit, was soaked in a liquid – low-quality gasoline – but also human fat. The human fat came from the pits in which people were burned through special channels that went to another small pit, where the fat dripped, which was collected by the SS themselves [сам CC: sami SS].

In February 1944 I was sent to work in Crematorium No. 4. I have to say that everyone in the Sonderkommando worked in constant fear of death, because the SS men burning the corpses were very perfidious toward those of this Sonderkommando who performed any work regarding gassing and cremation of people. I, and together with me 4 other persons, carried /introduced/ the corpses into the cremation furnaces. The corpses were brought into the furnace on iron stretchers which were placed on frames. On a stretcher, we put 3 and 2 corpses at a time. In each furnace [=muffle], 5 corpses were introduced. The corpses were put into the furnace [=muffle] from the iron stretchers by means of special hooks, after which the stretchers were pulled out. On the territory of the Birkenau sector, there were and operated four crematoria – Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5. Crematoria Nos. 2 and 3 were [p. 7/20] built in the same manner and had 15 furnaces, Crematoria Nos. 4 and 5 were also built in the same manner, but were less capacious in size and technical refinements, and each had 8 furnaces. There were gas chambers in each crematorium, and at the same time, Gas Chamber No. 2 operated, from which the corpses were transported to the pits for cremation. Gas Chamber No. 2 operated mainly when 6-7 transports of people arrived, then the corpses were cremated also on the pyres, and not just in the crematoria.

Crematorium No. 1 was located on the territory of the Auschwitz-Osviet-sim [Oświęcim] Camp. As in Gas Chambers No. 1 and 2, in the gas chambers of the crematoria, the corpses had their gold teeth extracted, earrings and brooches removed, [which were] placed in a special case.

In the Birkenau Sector, transports of people arrived who were then cremated; they also arrived from other camps, in particular from the “Majdanek” Camp in Lublin. Almost all the Russians were burned, and in the last period, before the arrival of the Red Army and the liberation of the inmates of the Auschwitz Camp, mainly only Russian children were burned, who had been torn away from their parents; the adults instead were used for work in the camp. In particular, many children who had arrived with their parents from Lithuania were burned. Men, women and children were gassed together in the gas chambers. In 24 hours, 10,000-12,000 people were cremated in all the crematoria. At first, the ashes of the cremated corpses were poured into special pits which were then filled with earth, but after some time – after some months, I do not remember [exactly] – the pits were reopened, the ashes were taken out of them and thrown into the river. In the area of the pits that had been filled with ashes, roads were built; however, two pits remained intact, along which the country road runs.

Around July or August 1944, Crematorium [p. 8/21] No. 4 did not work [anymore], due to a failure of the chimneys.

In the Birkenau Sector, within the Sonderkommando, there was a group preparing a revolt and the burning of the crematorium. The group was led by a Red-Army colonel, a prisoner of war, who was in contact with a major and a lieutenant belonging to the Sonderkommando. I do not know the surnames of the colonel, the major and the lieutenant; the given name of the PoW lieutenant was Viktor. The group preparing the uprising had procured some [gun] powder and made primitive grenades. The powder had been supplied by prisoners working in war factories that were located near the camp.

In September or August [sic] 1944 – I do not remember exactly – the management of the crematorium – I do not know how – learned about the preparation of the uprising, and transferred the entire Sonderkommando to Crematorium No. 4, where they stayed for one month. In the first days of October 1944, the group that had prepared the uprising set fire to Crematorium No. 4, killed some SS men, and organized the escape. Among the SS killed was a guard standing on a watchtower, at which the major threw a grenade. At that time, the Sonderkommando counted about 700 people. The camp headquarters organized the capture of those Sonderkommando men who had managed to escape a short distance, and captured them all in a camp [sector] not far from the crematorium, and 500 Sonderkommando men were shot. Approximately two weeks after the uprising and after Crematorium No. 4 had been put out of action, another 100 people from the Sonderkommando were shot, and the remainder were distributed among Crematoria No. 2, No. 3 and No. 5.

I was transferred to Crematorium No. 2, where I worked at one of the furnaces for about 5-10 days.

In May, June, July and August 1944, the cremation of corpses was carried out simultaneously in all crematoria and on the pyres in the pits, because [p. 9/22] every day there was a great influx of people – 5-7 transports. In these months, all transports arrived from Hungary. The furnaces of the crematoria alone could not cremate all the people gassed in the gas chambers. At each crematorium, there were storerooms where bodies were put that could not be cremated on the gassing day. In the second half or at the end of October 1944, I do not remember exactly, all gas chambers ceased to operate, and of the operating furnaces of Crematoria Nos. 2, 3 and 5, only Crematorium No. 5 worked. The dead, but especially those who had been shot at the camp, were cremated. The crematoria were heated with coke, the pits with wood.

I note that the strength of the Sonderkommando was continually replenished with new arrivals, replacing those who had been shot or killed in the gas chambers and then cremated.

Approximately in August or September 1944, I do not remember exactly, 200 persons of the Sonderkommando were led on foot to the “Osvietsim” Main Camp and gassed during the night. The same night, all the remaining Sonderkommando were sent to a barracks, and the 200 gassed persons were cremated by the SS themselves. I was informed of it two or three weeks after the cremations. In November 1944, the demolition of all crematoria began. Particularly from the furnaces, the structures of the muffles were dismantled and taken somewhere else. Then, notches were broken [holes were drilled] through the walls of the crematoria, into which explosive charges were placed, but in this way, they did not succeed in blowing up the crematoria, so other methods began to be used, and Crematoria Nos. 2 and 3 were blown up; No. 5 was blown up a day or two after the retreat.

[p. 10/23] On 18 January 1945, I was evacuated from the camp with 100 men of the Sonderkommando in the direction of Germany, but I escaped on 20 January 1945.

I note that, after the uprising organized by the Sonderkommando group, the SS hanged four girls, inmates of the camp, for providing them with explosive materials – the powder for those who had organized the uprising.

Among the 500 Sonderkommando men shot was a Jew from the town of Luna, Gradowski, who unbeknownst to the SS kept [a notebook with] a record of the transports with the people who arrived and were burned.

In the last months before the Sonderkommando set fire to Crematorium No. 4, Gradowski, fearing that someone from the Sonderkommando would discover the writings [he had] always with him, began to hide the writings in the ground so that they would be preserved. To me personally, Gradowski handed over some of his writings, which he put inside a German canteen, to hide them, which I buried in the ground; I can point to this place. This was in October or September 1944. I also know where the grenades were buried that were made by the Sonderkommando groups that had prepared the uprising and the escape. I can point to this place.

Question: How were the gas chambers of Crematoria Nos. 2 and 3 set up, and how did the poisoning of persons take place there?

Answer: In each of Crematoria Nos. 2 and 3, there was one gas chamber which was located in one of the underground rooms of the crematorium, and was about 30 meters long. The second underground room, 50 meters long, was used as an undressing room for the people, before the Germans took them to the [p. 11/24] gas chamber.

In order to pour Zyklon into the chamber, four square openings were arranged on the roof of the chamber in the manner of a chessboard, above which stood a low square chimney, about 30 cm high, which was covered by a layer of felt and a heavy removable concrete lid. Beneath these openings,⁹² in the gas chamber, false columns were installed resembling the real ones present there. These false columns were internally empty, and their walls were made of iron plate [из листового железа: iz listovogo zheleza] with perforations, like the common grates that covered the ventilation openings. In the gas chamber, there were also false showers – shower devices [showerheads] – which were used to deceive people entering the gas chamber, so that it would appear to the people that they were really going to bathe there. Ventilation was provided in the gas chamber. The entrance door could be closed hermetically. If necessary, the gas chambers were heated with transportable coke burners [выносными коксовы жаровнями, vynosnymi koksovy zharovnyami].

The poisoning of the people who had arrived at the crematorium took place in the following way: from the undressing room, the naked people were crowded very tightly into the chamber, because dogs were set upon them. When the entire gas chamber was tightly packed with people, the door was closed hermetically, and for a few minutes the ventilators sucked the air out of the chamber. Then the fans were turned off, and an SS man opened the box with Zyklon, climbed onto the roof, moved the lid of the opening described above, and poured Zyklon into the chamber through the opening.

After about 15 minutes, the aeration-deaeration⁹³ ventilators were started, the poisoned air was sucked out, and the door was opened.

Since there were so many people in the gas chamber [p. 12/25], their bodies remained upright after the poisoning, because there was no place to fall, i.e., the bodies were tightly packed together.

Question: Tell how the gas chambers of Crematoria Nos. 4 and 5 were set up, and how the process of poisoning people took place there.

Answer: In Crematoria Nos. 4 and 5, there was an annex construction about 20 meters long. Inside, this construction was divided by walls into three parts, each of which was a gas chamber. In order to pour the Zyklon, on the outer walls of the gas chambers, at a height of about 2 meters, were arranged hatches with grilles [люки с решотками, lyuki s reshyotkami], which could be closed hermetically with covers. In each gas chamber, there were two doors that could be closed hermetically. Adjacent to the gas chambers, through a corridor, was the undressing room, the size of which was equal to the area⁹⁴ of all three gas chambers [together], i.e., 12 x 20 meters. Depending on the number of those who entered, they were poisoned simultaneously in two, three chambers. The process of poisoning people was carried out in a similar way as in the gas chambers of Crematoria Nos. 2-3. The difference was only that the SS poured Zyklon through the aforementioned hatches in the wall, not through the roof as in Crematoria 2-3. Furthermore, in the gas chambers of Crematoria Nos. 4-5, there was no ventilation [system], so the ventilation of the chambers was done by opening the doors and [window] openings. After poisoning, the corpses could be taken away in two directions: they were either deposited in the undressing room or, as was done for some time in Crematorium No. 5, they were taken through the outer doors into the crematorium courtyard, where they were burned on pyres. When the undressing room was full of corpses and another [p. 13/26] group of people arrived at that time, they were undressed [sic] in the courtyard of the crematorium, and then poisoned in the gas chambers in the usual manner.

Question: Do you know when Crematorium No. 1 stopped working?

Answer: Crematorium No. 1 was closed down, and cremation stopped in March 1943.

Question: For how long was each of Crematoria Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5 used?

Answer: Crematorium No. 2 was put into operation in March 1943, on the very day of the arrival of the first transport of people from Krakow /Poland/, and was used up to and including October 1944; in November 1944, the Germans started demolishing the crematorium.

⁹³ Literally, "of influx-suction."

⁹⁴ Literally: room, locality.

Crematorium No. 3 was put into operation in April 1943, and was used up to and including October 1944; its demolition began in November 1944.

Crematorium No. 4 was put into operation at the end of March 1943, and was used up to and including August 1944; a part of it burned down at the beginning of October 1944, [and] in October 1944 – but it may have been November 1944 – I do not remember exactly, its demolition began.

Question: How many Sonderkommando workers were employed in the crematorium, how was the work distributed among them, and how many shifts were there?

Answer: In each of Crematoria Nos. 2 and 3, 60 camp inmates, who had been assigned to the Sonderkommando, normally worked in each shift. A shift worked for 12 hours. In 24 hours, there were two shifts. These 60 workers in Crematoria Nos. 2-3 were assigned to perform certain work as follows:

1. Collecting the stuff left in the undressing room, loading it onto cars [trucks] and [p. 14/27] tidying up the room: 15 men.
2. Removing the bodies from the room and transporting them to the freight elevator: 15 men.
3. Placing [the bodies] on the freight elevator: 2 men.
4. Barbers / cutting the hair of the women's corpses: 4 men.
5. Dentists / extraction gold teeth from corpses: 2 men.
6. Operating the gasifiers: 2 men.
7. Operating the freight elevator for the corpses: 2 men.
8. Picking up the corpses from the freight elevator: 2 men.
9. Moving the corpses to the muffles: 2 men.
10. Loading the muffles, two groups of 5 men: 10 men.
11. Helpers of the overseer: 4 men.

In Crematoria Nos. 4 and 5, 20 persons worked in one shift. For all four crematoria, there were also three goldsmiths who melted down the gold teeth from the corpses.

I cannot state anything else; the report in my own words was transcribed exactly, was read to me, and I signed it. Signature.

The interrogation was carried out in the presence of the interpreter, former Auschwitz camp inmate Dr. Steinberg, who was advised of the responsibility for false translations. The translation was performed from Polish to Russian.

[p. 1/102] Protocol

Auschwitz, 10 and 11 May 1945. The investigating judge of the Krakow District, Jan Sehn, member of the Commission of Inquiry into German-Hitlerite Crimes in Oświęcim, at the initiative and in the presence of the Member of this Commission Deputy Prosecutor of the Krakow District Court Edward Pęchalski, and with the participation of the expert Dr. Jan Zygmunt Robel, in accordance with Section 254 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, questioned as a witness the former inmate no. 80359 of the German concentration camp in Auschwitz, who stated the following:

My name is Szlama Dragon, born on 19 March 1920 in Żeromin, Sierpc District, son of Daniel and Małka Beckerman, both deceased, unmarried, tailor, of Mosaic religion, Polish nationality and Polish citizenship, residing before arrest in Żeromin, Biezuńska Street No. 16, now I will probably settle in Żeromin, Mławska 10.

I arrived in Oświęcim on 7 December 1942 by train, in a transport of 2,500 Jews of different genders and ages from the Mława Ghetto. At the station, this transport was received by Lagerführer Plage [Ludwig Plagge, SS Oberscharführer], Raportführer Palitsch [Rapportführer Palitzsch] and Camp Physician Mengele. Already at the station, they carried out the selection, separating the women and children into one group, the men into another. From the group of men, 400 persons were selected. I was also in this group. The 400 of us were taken on foot to Brzezinka [Birkenau]. The rest, i.e., all the women and children and the men who were not part of our group, were taken by cars [autami] in an unknown direction, however, outside the camp. Our group was housed in Block 3 of that camp section, which was later turned into a women's camp. Then, I was transferred in succession to Block 22, to the old "Sauna," and to Block 14 of this same camp sector. On 9 December 1942, in the evening, Moll, Plage, Palitsch and Siwy,⁹⁶ as well as Arbeitseinsatz[führer] Mikus⁹⁷ came to Block 14. Moll declared that he was going to make a selection of workers [p. 2/103] for a rubber factory. Each of us approached him, Moll asked him his profession, observed him carefully; if he was healthy and strong, he assigned him to this group who, according to his statements, were to go to work in the rubber factory. My brother and I declared that we were tailors by profession, and [we] were also assigned to this group established then by Moll and his comrades.

On the morning of the next day, i.e., 10 December 1942, immediately after all of the Kommandos [komando] had left for work, Moll came to Block 14 and ordered: “Sonderkommando raus [outside].” From this we learned that we were part of a certain “Sonderkommando,” and not of the Kommando assigned to the rubber factory. We did not realize what that Sonderkommando was, because no one had explained it to us. On Moll’s orders, we presented ourselves in front of the block, where SS men surrounded us and led us out of the camp in two groups of 100 people. We were taken to a forest, where there was a masonry cottage [chalupa], covered by a thatched roof. The windows were bricked up. On the door leading into this house was fixed a sheet-metal plate with the inscription “Hochspannung – Lebensgefahr” [High Voltage – Danger of Death]. Two wooden shacks were located at a distance of about 30-40 meters from that little house. On the other side there were 4 pits, with dimensions of 30 meters long, 7 meters wide and 3 meters deep. The edges of these pits were sooty and burned. We were lined up in front of the house; Moll came over and told us that we would work there cremating old and lice-infested people; as for us, we would be fed; at night we would be taken back to the camp, and we would have to work, because otherwise those who did not want to work would be beaten and would be left to the [= mistreated with] sticks and dogs. The SS men who were escorting us actually had dogs. Then we were divided into various groups. I, along with 11 others, was assigned to the group that, as it turned out later, had to extract the corpses from that little house. All 12 of us were fitted with [gas] masks and led to the door of the cottage. Moll opened this door, and only then did we see that in this small house lay naked corpses of people of various ages and both genders. Moll ordered us to transport these corpses from inside the house to the courtyard in front of the door. We began to work in this manner, four of us carrying one corpse. This irritated Moll, [who] rolled up his sleeves and threw a corpse in front of the door into the courtyard. When we declared in spite of this lesson that we could not manage to work like this, he divided us up into groups of two. As the corpses were lying in the courtyard, a dentist, assisted by an SS man, pulled out the [gold] teeth, a barber – supervised by an SS man – cut the hair, [p. 3/104] then another group loaded the corpses onto carts [na wózki /rollwagen/[sic]]. These carts were placed on narrow rails [a narrow-gauge track] that went all the way to the edge of the pits. These rails ran between two pits. Another group was engaged in preparing the pits to burn the corpses. At the bottom of the pits, they first placed large [pieces of] wood, then smaller and smaller wood [pieces] in a crisscross pattern, and finally dry branches. Another group picked up the corpses brought in on carts at the edge of the pits, and threw them into the pits. When all the corpses had been transported from the cottage to the pits, Moll sprayed these corpses with petroleum at the four corners of the pit, set fire to a rubber comb and threw it into an oil-soaked spot. The fire flared up and the corpses burned. While Moll lit [the pyre], we stood in front of the house and watched carefully. After all the corpses had been removed from the house, we had to clean it thoroughly, wash the floor with water, then sprinkle it with sawdust and whitewash the walls. This house inside was divided by cross walls into four rooms. One [the first], which could hold 1,200 undressed people, in the second one 700 people entered, in the third 400, and in the fourth 200-250. In the first room, the largest one, there were two small windows in the wall. The other three had one small window each. These windows were closed by wooden shutters. Each room had a separate entrance. On the entrance door was posted a sign, which I mentioned earlier, with the inscription “Hochspannung – Lebensgefahr”. This inscription was only visible when the entrance door was closed. When the door was open, this inscription could not be seen, but one could see the second inscription “Zum baden [sic]” [To the bathroom]. Those gassed [sic] who were inside the chamber could see another inscription placed on the exit door of the chamber. This sign read “Zur Desinfektion” [To Disinfection]. Behind the door on which this last inscription could be seen, there was of course no disinfection, because it was the exit door of the chamber through which we carried the corpses to the yard. Each chamber had a separate exit door. The chamber I described was accurately drawn on the basis of my statements by Engineer Nosal, from Oświęcim. This chamber was called Bunker No. 2 [Komorę tę nazywano Bunkrem nr. 2].

Apart from it, at a distance of about half a kilometer, there was another chamber that was called Bunker No. 1 [druga komora, oznaczona jako bunker nr. 1]. It was also a brick house, but it consisted of only two chambers, which together could hold less than 2,000 undressed people. These rooms had only an entrance door and a small window each [po jednym okienku]. In the vicinity of Bunker 1 was a small barn and 2 barracks. The pits were located far away, and tracks for carts led to them.

In the evening of the first day, after the end of work, we were brought back to the camp. We were not placed in Block 14, from [p. 4/105] which we had been sent to work, but in Block 2. This block also included the other group, which, as it turned out, had been working that day in Bunker No. 1. This block was enclosed and surrounded by a wall to isolate it from the other blocks. We were not allowed to communicate with the inmates in another block.

Not the entire Kommando was used for gassing the people. The gassing took place mainly at night. At that time, about 20 people from our Kommando were chosen to help with this work. As a rule, in fact, the gassing was carried out by the SS themselves. This was done in the following way: people were brought to the barracks by truck [samochodami, vehicles]. We, who had been assigned to assist, helped the sick to get off the vehicles and undress in the barracks. In fact, everyone who had been brought [there] undressed in the barracks. The barracks and the space between the barracks and the chamber were surrounded by SS men with dogs. The people, after undressing, went naked from the barracks to the chamber. The SS men standing by the front door pushed them in with clubs. When the chamber was full of people, the SS closed the door, and Mengele ordered his aide, Rottenführer Scheinmetz, to begin the gassing. He said, "Scheinmetz mach das fertig" [Scheinmetz, finish the job]. Then Scheinmetz took a gas can, a hammer and a special knife out of the Red-Cross car, which followed every transport of inmates destined for gassing, put on the [gas] mask, opened the can with the help of the knife and the hammer, poured its contents into the chamber through the small window. Then he closed the window and took the can, hammer, knife and mask back to the car. The Germans among themselves called this car "Sanker."⁹⁸ I myself heard Mengele several times ask his aide: "Ist der Sanker da?" [Is the Sanker here?]. After this, Mengele and the adjutant left in the medical car, and we were driven back to the block.

I do not know how it was at first, but later, after such a night-time gassing had been carried out, SS guards remained at the bunker and especially at the barracks. In fact, it happened that, when such a bunker was left unguarded until the morning, the crates with the gold teeth, which were kept in the barracks together with other things, had been stolen. The corpses of the gassed persons lay in the bunker until morning, when the Kommando arrived and burned them. The course of the cremation was like the one I described in [connection with] my first day of work in Bunker No. 2. The next day, a special Kommando took away the things left in the barracks from those gassed, sorted them, and transported them to the Effektenkammer [personal-effects warehouse] in Oświęcim. We emptied the ash pits generally about 48 hours after cremation. In the ashes, there were remnants of bones; you could see [p. 5/106] skulls, knees, and long bones. We threw the ashes with shovels over the edge of the pit; cars [trucks] arrived on which the ashes were loaded and taken to the River Soła [River]. We were also employed to unload the ashes from the cars at the River Soła. Of course, this was done under the supervision of the SS. We had to cover the ground between the car and the water with tarpaulins so that no ashes would fall on the ground. The SS ordered us to throw the ashes into the water so that they were swept away by the current and did not settle to the bottom. After unloading the vehicle, we shook the dust off the tarpaulin into the water, and carefully swept the entire unloading site with brooms.

When the chamber was opened, the corpses of those gassed lay mostly sprawled out. When they were crowded together, they were lying on top of each other, leaning against one other, some of them standing upright with their trunks inclined. In very many cases, I saw white drool on the mouths of the gassed people. In the chamber, after the opening, it was very hot, and you could feel the gas; it was suffocating, and it was sweet in the mouth, pleasant. The gas cans were made of metal, with a yellow label. They were the same as those used later in the crematorium. In the two bunkers, first of all, people who arrived with transports from Poland were gassed as well as Lithuanians, Frenchmen and Jews from Berlin. Bunker No. 1 was already completely demolished in 1943. After the construction of the crematorium called No. 2 in Brzezinka, the barracks at Bunker No. 2 were dismantled, and the pits were filled in. The bunker itself was maintained until the end, and after a very long pause, it was used again for the gassing of the Hungarian Jews. Then new barracks were built and [more] pits were dug. At that time, they worked in two shifts in this bunker, meaning day and night. I myself worked there two days, I think. During this period, we pulled the corpses out of the bunker chambers shortly after the gassing had ended, so that it also happened that, when we entered the chambers, we could still hear moans, especially when we grabbed a corpse by the hands and pulled it out of the chambers. Once we found a living child in the chamber. The child's head was also wrapped in a pillow. When we moved the pillow away, it turned out that the child had its eyes open and gave the impression of being alive. We took this child along with the pillow to Moll, telling him that the child was alive. Moll snatched it from us [grabbing it] by the arm, took it to the edge of a pit, laid it on the ground, put his heel on its neck, and then threw it into the fire. I saw this whole scene with my own eyes and noticed that, at the moment when Moll put [the boot] on the child's neck, the child moved its arms. The whole time, this child did not cry out; I cannot say whether it was breathing, because I did not examine it, however [p. 6/107] it struck us that it looked different from the lifeless corpses.

The capacity of Bunkers Nos. 1 and 2 was about 4,000 people. Bunker No. 2 could hold over 2,000 people in all of its gas chambers at the same time, Bunker No. 1 less than 2,000.

In 1943, we were transferred from the Women's Camp to the BIId Camp, and housed there first in Block 13, then in Block 11. In the fall of the same year, I was again employed in the Sonderkommando. In between my work at the bunkers [and his reassignment to the Sonderkommando] I was employed in the Abbruchkommando [Demolition Squad].

I worked at Crematorium No. V. until May 1944, [when] we were assigned to work in the gardens, to split wood, to transport coke, because at that time the furnaces of Crematorium No. V were not yet in operation [piece krematorium nr. V, nie były jeszcze wówczas czynne]. This crematorium was not put into operation until May 1944, when transports of Hungarian Jews began to arrive. The work in the crematorium was directed by Moll; Kommandoführer Gorger⁹⁹ carried out his orders; another Kommandoführer was Eckhardt;¹⁰⁰ the SS [men] Kurzschluss¹⁰¹ and Gutas¹⁰² stood guard. This crematorium was built identically to Crematorium IV. These two crematoria had 4 furnaces on two sides. Three corpses were placed in each furnace. Undressing rooms and gassing chambers /bunkry [bunker]/ were located at ground level. In these crematoria, the gassing itself took place as in Bunkers No. 1 and 2. The persons were brought to these crematoria by automobiles [trucks], and later, after the activation of the railway branch line to Brzezinka, they were also taken on foot from the railway ramp to Crematoria IV and V. They arrived, entered the undressing room, Gorger pushed them forward telling them, “Do it faster, because food and coffee will get cold.” People were in fact asking for water. Gorger replied to them that the water was cold, they could not drink it, so that they would hurry, and, when they came out of the bathroom, they would receive tea, which was ready for them. When everyone was now in the undressing room, Moll stood on a bench and gave a speech to the people assembled. He told them that they would go to the camp, where the strong would be sent to work, the sick and the women would remain in the blocks. At the same time, he pointed to the buildings in Brzezinka and said that, before entering the camp, everyone had to bathe, because otherwise the camp authorities would not let them in. When everyone had undressed, they were pushed naked into the gas chamber. At first, there were 3 gas chambers, but later a fourth was installed. The first could hold 1,500, the second 800, the third 600, and the fourth 150 people. From the undressing room, people passed into the rooms through a narrow corridor. The rooms were marked “Zur Desinfektion” [To Disinfection]. When the room was full, the door was closed. This was done by the SS guards, very often Moll personally. Then, Mengele gave the order to Scheinmetz, who, as in the bunkers, went to the Red-Cross vehicle, took out the gas [p. 7/108] can, opened it and poured its contents into the chamber through a small window in the side wall. This little window was quite high, so that he reached it [by climbing] up a [step] ladder. And here, too, as at the bunkers, he did it with a mask. After a while, Mengele announced that the people were no longer alive, saying: “Es ist schon fertig” [It is already done], and he left in the Red-Cross car together with Scheinmetz.

Then Moll opened the door to the gas chamber, we put on our masks, and dragged the corpses from the individual chambers through a small corridor into the undressing room, and through the undressing room and the next small corridor to the furnaces. In the first corridor, which was next to the entrance door, the barbers cut the hair, in the second corridor the dentists pulled out the [gold] teeth. In front of the furnaces, we put the corpses on metal stretchers, which we then introduced into the furnace on rollers installed at the furnace doors. We placed the corpses on the stretchers in this way: when the first one lay with its head forward, we placed the second one with its head back. In each furnace we loaded three corpses. When we loaded the third corpse, those [the two corpses] introduced earlier were already burning. I saw that the arms of these corpses rose, then the legs rose. Besides, we were proceeding very quickly, and I could not accurately observe the entire burning process. We had to hurry, because if the extremities of these already burning corpses rose strongly, we had difficulties getting the third corpse into the furnace [=muffle]. We used the stretchers in this way: two inmates lifted the stretcher, one by the end farther from the furnace, the other by the end that entered the furnace first. After the stretcher was introduced, one of the inmates held the corpse in place with a long poker, we called it a hoe [gracq], forked at the end, and two other [inmates] pulled the stretcher out from underneath the corpse. After loading the furnace, we closed the door and loaded the next furnace. The cremation took 15-20 minutes. After that time, we opened the doors of the furnaces and introduced more corpses.

During the period when the Hungarian transports arrived, we worked at Crematorium V in two shifts. The day shift from 6:30 am to 6:30 pm, the night shift from 6:30 pm to 6:30 am the next day. This work lasted 3 months. However, as the crematoria were not very productive, pits were dug next to Crematorium V for the cremation of the gassed Hungarians. There were 3 larger and 2 smaller pits. The burning process in the pits at Crematorium V was the same as at Bunkers 1 and 2. Also here, Moll was the one who set fire to the corpses. The ashes were extracted from the pits in the same way as at the bunkers, crushed into powder with special tampers, and brought to the River Soła. The ashes from the crematorium were at first buried in pits dug for this purpose. Then, however, at the beginning of the Russian offensive, Hoss [Höss] ordered the cremation ashes to be extracted from these pits and [p. 8/109] to be taken to the Soła as well.

Due to scheduling conflicts, the questioning of the witness was interrupted on 11 May 1945 at 5 p.m.

17 May 1945 in Oświęcim. The witness Szlama Dragon /[already] known in the proceedings/ continues to state the following.

The chambers of Crematorium No. 5 used for gassing were about 2.5 meters high. Anyway, with my arm raised high, I could not touch the ceiling. From the top of the door to the ceiling, there was still 70 cm. An adult man of average height could reach with his arm raised to the lower edge of the opening of the small window through which the contents of a Cyklon can were poured into the chamber. Scheinmetz, however, had a special ladder on which he stood when pouring the Cyklon into the chamber. Other SS men, whose surnames I do not know, also performed this operation at various times. I know Scheinmetz's surname from the fact that he had initially been Kommandoführer of our Sonderkommando. I do not know his first name. He was a man of medium height, shorter than me, blond, I think he was about 26 years old. He always had at [his] service girls from Slovakia. I don't know whether he spoke to them in Slovak or in German. The head of Crematoria IV and V and Bunker No. 2 was Hauptscharführer Moll. He was a man of medium height, with a strong body build, blond, combed with a part. I believe he was about 37 years old. His wife and two children /a son about 10 years old and a younger daughter about 7 years old/ lived in Oświęcim. Lagerarzt Mengele very often witnessed the gassing. He was a man of my height, I think he was about 40 years old, with brown hair. He always arrived in the medical car carrying the Cyklon and, like the other inmates employed in the Sonderkommando, I saw that during the gassing of the people he stood by the door [p. 9/110] leading to the gas chamber. This door was equipped with a peephole. When the gassing was over, the door was opened on Mengele's order. When the bodies were removed from the chamber, Mengele was already gone, because he left immediately after ascertaining that the victims had been gassed, and giving the order to open the gas-chamber door. He drove away in this same medical car. I never saw Mengele examine the people who were going to the gas chamber or observe or examine the bodies of the gassed victims.

At the beginning of May 1944, the gassing and cremation of Hungarian Jewish transports began in Crematorium V. The gassed bodies of some of the first transports were cremated in the furnaces of Crematorium IV, because the chimneys of Crematorium V were damaged at the time. Eventually, the Hungarian Jews were burned in pits dug for this purpose near the building of Crematorium No. V. Five pits were dug there, 25 meters long, 6 meters wide and 3 meters deep. About 5,000 people were burned in the pits every day. However, since [more and] more Hungarian Jews were arriving by transport, Bunker No. 2 was put back into operation, and people were gassed and burned there. I do not know how many people were burned every day at this bunker, because during the period in which the Hungarian Jews were cremated there, I was not working at Bunker No. 2. Both the Sonderkommando working in Crematorium V and the Sonderkommando working in Bunker No. 2 worked in two shifts: day and night. This work lasted for the months of May and June. Based on my observations, I calculate that approximately 300,000 Hungarian

Jews were cremated in Crematorium No. V during these two months. These people were driven to Crematorium V on foot, directly from the Brzezinka unloading ramp. Among them were men, women and children of all ages. When these transports arrived in the crematorium area, we were locked up in two small rooms specifically designated for this. It was a matter of not letting us talk to these people, and not revealing to them what fate awaited them. It did happen, however, that someone in the transport felt weak along the way. Under an SS escort, we had to take him to the crematorium area. In such situations, we spoke more than once with the sick people we were accompanying. Most of them did not know that they were going to [their] death, and when we told them that they were going to the crematorium, they did not believe us. I remember that in 1943, 70,000 Greek Jews were cremated in Crematoria II-V. I remember this figure because the Kommandoführer of Crematoria II and III, Keler [Keller], threatened us before the arrival of these transports, saying that for us the good times were over, because within a short time, a transport [sic] would arrive from Greece numbering 70,000 people. He told us [p. 10/111] this because just before the gassing of these people from the Greek transports, there had been a pause in the work of the crematoria, and we had not worked hard. As for the other nationalities, I do not have any figures and cannot state how many of the victims gassed and cremated at the Oświęcim Camp pertain to individual countries and nations. I calculate the number of those gassed in the two bunkers and four crematoria at over 4 million. This was also the opinion of the other prisoners employed in the Sonderkommando. The Schreiber [scribe] of our commando, Sauman [Salmen] Gradowski, a native of Grodno, wrote some notes, in which, based on the information provided by the inmates working in all the crematoria, he wrote down the number of persons gassed and burned in the individual crematoria and described what the prisoners of the Sonderkommando had gone through. Gradowski was shot in October 1944 during the uprising. Back then, 500 inmates of the Sonderkommando, which at that time numbered 700 inmates, were shot. 100 of them slept in Crematorium No. II, another 100 in Crematorium No. III, and 500 in Crematorium No. IV. The diaries of this Gradowski, which were buried in the barbed-wire-fenced area of Crematorium II, I dug up [myself] and handed them over to the Soviet commission. They were a notebook and a letter addressed to the unknown finder. By order of the Soviet Commission, all the writings found, which had been written in Hebrew, were translated into Russian by the inmate physician Dr. Gordon. The Soviet commission took these materials with them. I know that other documents and records were buried in the area belonging to Crematorium No. II, and that the pits with the ashes of the corpses of the persons cremated in this crematorium were covered with earth. One must look for these things in front of the cremation furnaces. I cannot point to the exact place, because after the destruction of the crematorium, the situation there changed, the ground was leveled already during the time of the Germans, so I lost my orientation. I did not participate in the gassing and cremation of people in Crematoria Nos. II and III. Zisner and Mandelbaum were employed there. Tauber worked with me, and prior to his transfer to Brzezinka, [he had worked] also at Crematorium No. I in Oświęcim.

In the Sonderkommando that served in the two bunkers before my assignment to the new Sonderkommando established in December 1942, there were mostly Slovaks working. As I stated earlier, the Sonderkommando to which I was assigned consisted of 200 prisoners. Within a short period of time, it grew to 400. Later, 200 inmates of this Sonderkommando [p. 11/112] were transferred to Lublin, from where 20 Russians arrived at the Sonderkommando. From these Russians, we learned that the 200 men transferred to Lublin had been shot there. In 1943, 200 Greeks, and in 1944, 500 Hungarians were assigned to our Sonderkommando. In October 1944, 500 inmates were shot, specifically 400 in the courtyard of Crematorium No. IV, and 100 in the field next to Crematorium No. II. This same month, Moll selected about 200 inmates of the Sonderkommando, who were taken to Oświęcim and, as we were later informed by the inmates employed in Kanada [warehouse], were gassed in the chamber used for fumigating items in the “Kanada” warehouse. In November 1944, 100 Sonderkommando prisoners were transferred to Gross Rosen. At least so we were told. However, they left on a punitive transport. After all these losses, there remained little more than 100 of us in the Sonderkommando. Crematorium No. V was in operation until the last days of the Germans’ stay at the camp, and was blown up with dynamite by them shortly before their withdrawal. This took place on 20 January 1945. During the last days, only those who died or were killed at the camp were cremated in this crematorium. Gassings of people were no longer carried out. At this time, the crematorium was run by 30 inmates of the Sonderkommando; the rest were engaged in the demolition of Crematoria II and III. I [also] worked on the demolition.

At the end of May 1944, I was transferred together with the entire Sonderkommando from Block 11 of Sector BIId to Crematorium No. IV, where I stayed until October 1944. As I stated earlier, in October 1944, approximately 700 inmates of the Sonderkommando were housed in this crematorium. As the crematoria no longer needed so many people for service at this time, we feared that we would all be gassed, so we decided to organize an uprising. We had been planning it for a long time; we had contacts and liaison men with the [outside] world; we had manufactured grenades; we had weapons and a camera, and we were waiting for the beginning of the third Soviet offensive. In fact, we thought that our action would have a chance of success only in case of an offensive. In October, our situation seemed dangerous, so we decided not to hesitate; we just went into action. I do not remember the exact date, it was a Saturday, when we threw ourselves on the SS guards; 12 SS [men] were wounded. It seems that there were deaths among them as well. At the same time, the inmates of the Sonderkommando quartered in Crematorium II went into action. In Crematorium No. III, the Sonderkommando was unable to start the action. In the area [p. 12/113] of our crematorium, SS reinforcements immediately arrived; a couple of companies surrounded the entire area; approximately 500 inmates were shot, and the others managed to save themselves by hiding. I hid under a pile of wood, and Tauber in the chimney ducts [w ciągach komina] of Crematorium No. V. All of us who remained alive were transferred and quartered in Crematorium No. III. We were kept alive because at that time an investigation was carried out to uncover our entire organization. However, they did not succeed, in spite of frequent searches of people's personal belongings and lodgings, because after the failure of the uprising we buried all our materials, especially the grenades, and abandoned our conspiratorial activities. I stayed in Crematorium III until November 1944. Later, the entire Sonderkommando was transferred to Camp BIId. I was in Block 13. From October 1944 onwards, i.e., after the uprising I described, I worked on the demolition of the crematoria, in particular the dismantling of Crematorium IV. This crematorium had been burnt down during the uprising, so we only demolished the walls. The metal parts of this crematorium were transported to Oświęcim, where they are still in the Bauhof. The other inmates of the Sonderkommando were employed at this time in the demolition of Crematoria Nos. II and III. Demolition of these crematoria began in November 1944 and, as we were told, [reusable parts] were to be transported to Gross Rosen. The metal parts of these crematoria, the doors, ventilation systems, benches, stairs and other parts are still at the Bauhof.

I note that in Bunkers Nos. 1 and 2 as well as in Crematoria No. IV and V, doors and window shutters of the same type were installed. They were made of thick, heavy wood, [with boards] interlocked, with the joints lined with felt that sealed tightly. The doors were closed with two large iron handles, which were clamped with screws for airtightness. The doors of the bunkers did not have peepholes for inspection. The doors leading to the gas chambers in all crematoria /II-V/ were equipped with such peepholes. Crematoria II and III had no wooden shutters, because in the gas chambers of these crematoria, the Cyklon was poured through openings in the ceiling. These openings were closed by concrete plates [plytami betonowymi].

I submit schematic sketches of Bunkers Nos. 1 and 2 as well as of Crematorium No. IV. Crematorium No. IV was built identically and located symmetrically to Crematorium No. V. Please attach the submitted sketches to the present protocol for [p. 13/114] adequate clarification and understanding of the contents of my statements.

I remained in Block 13 of Camp BIId until the beginning of January 1945. Then I was transferred with the entire Sonderkommando to Block 16, from where we were sent by transport on 18 January in the direction of the Reich. We went on foot, and in the vicinity of Pszczyna, I managed to escape from the transport together with Tauber. Together with me, the entire Sonderkommando, i.e., over 100 people, had left Oświęcim. I do not know who of them remained alive. In the last few days, Mosiek van Kleib, a Dutchman, returned and left for his homeland without stopping. Among the inmates of the Sonderkommando who left Oświęcim were, among others, Zawek Chrzan from Gostynin, Samuel – French, Leibel from Grodno, Lemko from Czernow Bór, Dawid Nencel from Rypin, Moszek and Jankel Weingarten from Poland, Sender from Berlin, Moryc from Greece, Abraham Dragon from Żeromin, Serge – French /Blockältester/, Abo from Grodno, Becker Berek from Łuna, Kuzyn from Radom, and others whose names I don't remember.

Currently I plan to settle in Żeromin and begin work in my profession. I assume that my brother will also return [there], and we will work together. I am waiting to be called for military service. After the vicissitudes at the camp, I am completely exhausted nervously, and wish to finally return to a normal life, get out of the camp atmosphere, and forget everything I went through in Oświęcim.

2.3. Statement of 22 February 1957

On 22 February 1957, Shlomo Dragon appeared before Dr. E. Cerf, presumably a notary, to make a declaration in order to benefit from the German program of compensations for former deportees. He wrote in the document in question:¹⁰³

"I was completely healthy before the war.

Until my transfer to the Auschwitz Concentration Camp in 1942, I was still completely healthy. In the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, I was forced to work in the Demolition Squad outside the camp.

One day in early 1944, while I was doing forced labor, Oberscharführer Moll hit me so hard over the head with a thick stick that I fell to the ground unconscious with my head bleeding. Jewish fellow prisoners then brought me back to the camp, where I received a head bandage from a Jewish fellow inmate physician; after applying the bandage, I remained sick in the barracks for 2-3 days. Since I was afraid of being gassed, I reported back to work again despite severe pain. Since then, I have been suffering from headaches and dizziness as well as nausea and frequent attacks of unconsciousness. I was able to perform my forced labor only with the help of fellow inmates. This condition lasted until my liberation in 1945.

After my liberation, I went to Warsaw to look for relatives. I received private medical treatment there”.

As we can see, in this statement he did not mention the “bunkers” and the Sonderkommando at all, and his reference to Moll does not fill that gap either, since Moll cannot have been in charge of the “bunkers” or the Demolition Squad “in early 1944,” because even according to the orthodox narrative, Bunker 1 no longer existed at that time, Bunker 2 is said to have been reactivated only in mid-May 1944, and the Demolition Squad for the crematoria was not assembled until the end of 1944.

Part Two:

Critical Analysis of the Testimonies

3. Henryk Tauber

As Pressac has shown (1989, p. 481), there is no doubt that, as far as the description of architectural features of Crematorium II is concerned, Tauber's statements are indeed fairly accurate, so that he is really a "95% reliable" witness in this regard.

This is also true for the description of the crematorium furnaces, which is precise and detailed, but in which there is no mention of the triple-muffle furnaces' fresh-air blowers¹⁰⁴ – which is strange, because they were regularly operated during the cremations, and these blowers were quite noisy, so they could not go unnoticed – and the deaeration system of the furnace room of Crematorium II (and III).

However, in principle, this accuracy cannot be a positive criterion of the truthfulness of Tauber's other claims, because any novelist can set fantastic tales in the 95% accurately described urban context of any city, but this certainly does not make the tales truthful. Therefore, this architectural accuracy is only one element of a witness's reliability and thus trustworthiness. In order to assess them properly, we must in fact examine two other, even-more-important aspects: the technical and the historical accuracy of his statements.

In the following discussion, I refer to each of Tauber's and Dragon's depositions by a letter followed by the original document's page number, where P stands for the Polish deposition and S for the Soviet deposition. Tauber's statement to the Jewish Historical Commission of Krakow and Dragon's statement in his application for compensation are brief and therefore not referred to by a page number.

3.1. Cremation Furnaces and the Cremation Process¹⁰⁵

3.1.1. Muffle Dimensions

"The doors were smaller than the entrance openings of the muffle; the muffle itself was about 2 meters long, 80 centimeters wide and about 1 meter high."
(P12)

This refers to the triple-muffle furnace, in which the muffles were 70 cm wide, 80 cm high and 210 cm long. The muffles were closed at the front by metal frames to which were hinged introduction doors (Einführungstüren) measuring 60 cm × 60 cm. The size of this introduction opening, as I will explain in Point 3.1.3., was of decisive importance for the loading of the furnace.

¹⁰⁴ Each furnace was equipped with its own blower No. 275 (diameter of the outlet pipe in mm); for two furnaces it was placed on their right side, for the other three on the left side.

¹⁰⁵ For this subchapter, I refer as general reference texts to my studies Mattogno/Deana; Mattogno 2020; Mattogno 2021a.

3.1.2. Muffle Temperature

In his Soviet deposition, Tauber states that the temperature of the muffles of the double-muffle furnaces in Crematorium I ranged between 1,200 and 1,500°C (S3). This is technical nonsense. According to the relevant Topf operating instructions, the temperature was not to exceed 1,100°C in the double-muffle furnaces, and 1,000° in the triple-muffle furnaces. These limits were related to the thermal load of the furnaces, and depended on the weight and quality of the refractories used. At temperatures above 1,100-1,200°C, the phenomenon of sintering also occurred, i.e., the melting and fusing of refractory material with the bones of corpses.

With reference to the triple-muffle furnaces of Crematorium II, Tauber stated in the Polish deposition that the muffles reached temperatures of 1,000-1,200°C. This is not only exaggerated, but also contradictory. In fact, Tauber says that the furnaces, after several cremations, “were brought to red heat” (P21) and then praises the admirable capabilities of a “furnace thus brought to red heat” (P21) But in Topf’s service instructions for the double- and triple-muffle furnaces, it states in this regard (see Mattoigno/Deana, Vol. 1, p. 265):

The red color (called incipient cherry red) corresponds therefore to 800°C, which therefore represented the maximum temperature of the muffles also for Tauber. At higher temperatures, the color of the refractory masonry is very different; John D. DeHaan presents the following correspondences between color and temperature (DeHaan, p. 2):

bright cherry red:	800-1,000°C
orange:	1,000-1,200°C
bright yellow:	1,200-1,400°C
white:	1,400-1,600°C

3.1.3. Muffle-Loading System

At this point I will only address the procedure of introducing bodies into the muffles. This requires some preliminary explanations.

Welded under the introduction doors of the triple-muffle furnaces was a round fastening rod (Befestigungs-Eisen) on which a frame pivoted to which the guide rollers¹⁰⁶ for the coffin-introduction cart (Sargeinführungswagen) were secured. The frame could slide horizontally on the fastening rod, so it served all three furnace muffles; it could also be tilted, i.e., lowered and raised. When it was raised, the two rollers came to rest on the height of the muffle-door base, 9 cm above the plane of the muffle grate. The double-muffle furnaces also had such a frame, except that each muffle had its own frame with a pair of rollers.

The loading system described by Tauber is basically correct (P3). The corpse-introduction device (Leicheneinführungs-Vorrichtung) consisted of a coffin-introduction cart (Sargeinführungswagen) that moved on a set of rails (Laufschienen). At its top, it had a movable cart of semi-cylindrical shape (Verschiebewagen) that slid along the top of the introduction cart. The front part of the coffin-introduction cart was equipped with a metal stretcher about 270 mm long, on which the corpse was placed and which was introduced into the muffle. The stretcher consisted of a horizontal wrought-iron slab, about 40 cm wide, and two vertical iron bands welded to it laterally, so the assembly formed this shape in cross section: . The two upper edges of these side rails prevented the corpse from falling off the side of the stretcher when the cart moved, while the lower ones ran on a pair of guide rollers. Due to the height of the rollers and the side rails, the surface of the stretcher on which the corpse was placed was about 12 cm above the surface of the muffle grates. Because of the narrow width of the stretcher, only one corpse could be loaded on it; any other corpses would have had to be stacked on top of it.

In another study, I examined this issue in great detail with the help of photographs of the Topf double- and triple-muffle cremation furnaces (as still present in the former Mauthausen and Buchenwald Camps), and I demonstrated visually that a maximum of two emaciated bodies (thickness: 18 cm each) could be loaded onto the stretcher.¹⁰⁷

3.1.4. Muffle Loads and Duration of a Cremation

The actual capacity of the Auschwitz-Birkenau crematoria was one corpse in one hour in one muffle (Mattogno/Deana, Vol. 1, pp. 314-353), thus within 21 hours of operation:

- Crematorium I: 21 hours × 6 muffles = 126 corpses per day
- Crematorium II: 21 hours × 15 muffles = 315 corpses per day
- Crematorium III: 21 hours × 15 muffles = 315 corpses per day
- Crematorium IV: 21 hours × 8 muffles = 168 corpses per day
- Crematorium V: 21 hours × 8 muffles = 168 corpses per day

Total capacity: 1,092 per day; capacity of Birkenau: 966 per day.

The possible simultaneous cremation of several corpses together would only have prolonged the cremation correspondingly, and the possible presence of children's bodies might have increased the cremation capacity by a factor of ¹⁰⁷ Mattogno 2020, Chapter 12, "Le cremazioni multiple: il sistema di caricamento delle muffole," pp. 101-106, and Docs. 25-29 & 36, pp. 255-259, 263.

1.16, which would result in an adjusted capacity to 365 corpses for each of Crematoria II and III, and 195 for each of Crematoria IV and V, in total 1,120.

Tauber stated in his Soviet testimony that the cremation capacity of the various types of furnaces was as follows:

- double-muffle furnace: 5 corpses per muffle in 90 minutes (S3)
- triple-muffle furnace: 4-5 corpses per muffle in 20-25 minutes (S5)
- 8-muffle furnace: 4-5 corpses per muffle in 35 minutes (S6)

This data results in the following average cremation capacities over 21 hours per day of actual furnace operation:

- double-muffle furnace: 126 corpses per day, hence:
 - Crematorium I: 378 corpses per day
 - triple-muffle furnace: 756 corpses per day, hence:
 - Crematorium II/III: 3,780 corpses per day each; total 7,560 corpses per day
 - 8-muffle furnace: 1,296 corpses per day, hence:
 - Crematorium IV/V: 1,296 corpses per day each; total 2,592 corpses per day

Therefore, the total cremation capacity claimed by Tauber for all Auschwitz and Birkenau crematoria was 10,152 corpses per day, which is nine times greater than the actual capacity.

In his Polish testimony, Tauber confirmed that, as a rule, in the furnaces of Crematorium II, 4-5 corpses were cremated at a time per muffle, but he explained (P14):

“With continuous operation, the crematorium cremated two loads per hour. According to regulations, we had to load new bodies into the muffles every half hour. Oberkapo August explained to us that, according to the calculations and plans of the crematorium, the cremation of a corpse in a muffle took 5-7 minutes. At the beginning, he did not allow us to load more than three corpses. With such a pace, we had to work non-stop, because after loading the last muffle [the load of] the first one was already burned. In order to have a break in the work, we loaded 4-5 corpses into each muffle. The cremation of such a load took longer, so after loading the last muffle, we had a few minutes of rest while the load of the first muffle burned [out].”

Tauber also states that on average 2,500 corpses were cremated per day in Crematorium II (P18). The load of 4-5 corpses per muffle referred to adult bodies, because when there were children's bodies, the load was different: 2 adults and 5-6 children (P20f.).

I note first of all that these data are contradictory. Since on average 2,500 corpses are said to have been cremated per day (21 hours) in Crematorium II, the cremation duration of a load of 4-5 corpses would have been on average $[2,500/\text{day} \div (4.5 \text{ corpses} \times 15 \text{ muffles}) =]$ about 37 minutes, not 20-25 minutes.

The presence of only two stretchers and two groups of inmates is furthermore irrational, because in order to speed up the loading process, five stretchers and five groups of inmates would have been needed, one for each furnace. This would have allowed all five furnaces to be loaded simultaneously.

The “new” loading system consisted in introducing first two corpses into a muffle, then two more. From what Tauber says, the second loading immediately followed the previous one, and it had to be carried out before the arms and legs of the corpses of the first pair rose from the heat (P20), i.e., when the corpses were more or less still intact. But loading two more corpses into a muffle already containing two other corpses would have been practically impossible for lack of space inside the muffle.

Finally, the loading system described by Tauber clashes with another material impossibility. The basement (Kellergeschoss) of Crematorium II, where the alleged homicidal gas chamber was located, was connected to the first floor (Erdgeschoss), where the furnace room was located, by a temporary freight elevator. Pressac published the design of the freight elevator for Crematorium III made by the Gustav Lenz Company of Erfurt.¹⁰⁸ This freight elevator measured 1.25 m × 2.1 m and had a capacity of 750 kg, i.e., at most, 12-13 corpses weighing 60 kg each.¹⁰⁹ In Crematorium II, however, merely a temporary freight elevator was installed between 26 January and 13 March 1943, built by the Central Construction Office’s metalworking shop (Schlosserei) with a capacity of only 300 kg,¹¹⁰ i.e., a maximum of just five corpses. The device, as shown in a photograph published by Pressac, was very rudimentary (Pressac 1989, p. 488; see Document 13).

I have dealt with this issue extensively in another study (Mattogno 2019, pp. 47-51), where I assumed an average duration of five minutes for each body transport (loading, ascent trip, unloading, and descent trip). According to Tauber, there were four inmates assigned to the freight elevator, two for loading and two for unloading, who worked in a 12-hour shift (S8f.). If we assume that each transport lasted five minutes, hence 12 trips per hour, these inmates would have lifted and moved within six hours, hence in the middle of their work shift, $([6 \text{ hrs} \times 12 \text{ trips/hr} \times 300 \text{ kg/trip}] =) 21,600 \text{ kg}$, or 10,800 kg per person, and the increasing fatigue would have steadily slowed down their work pace. The duration of five minutes per elevator load is therefore probably much too optimistic. It corresponds in fact to one minute each for the elevator’s up and down trip, and to four minutes for the loading and unloading of the five bodies, that is on average just $([4 \text{ min} \times 60 \text{ sec/min}] \div 10 =) 24 \text{ seconds}$ for every act of (un)loading a body.

The average number of 2,500 cremations per day stated by Tauber implies $(2,500 \text{ bodies/day} \div 5 \text{ bodies/trip} =) 500 \text{ round trips}$ of the freight elevator per day, which would have taken ($500 \text{ trips} \times 5 \text{ min} =$) 2,500 minutes, over 41 hours, hence almost two days.

The loading of the furnaces described by Tauber is therefore impossible, as are the operations to transport the corpses to the furnaces.

Second, his claims are also technically nonsensical with regard to the duration of cremation. The duration of the cremation process of a single corpse in the furnaces of Auschwitz-Birkenau was about one hour. The cremation experiments carried out on 5 January 1927 by engineer Richard Kessler in the coke-fired Beck-Brothers furnaces at the Dessau crematorium, allow us to follow the cremation process in all its phases thanks to the technical diagrams Kessler published.

On average, the initial cremation temperature was about 800°C , the maximum temperature at the end of the coffin's combustion about 1000°C , the initial corpse combustion temperature about 780°C , the maximum corpse combustion temperature about 900°C . As far as times are concerned, the average duration of the coffin combustion up to the maximum heat development was 12 minutes, the average duration of the evaporation of the corpse water was 27 minutes, and finally the average duration of the combustion of the corpse itself up to the maximum heat development was 28 minutes, while the duration of the whole process was 55 minutes.

This duration refers to the peak of the main combustion in the muffle, after which the combustion gradually decreased in intensity until it ceased after another 31 minutes: the average duration of a cremation was in fact 86 minutes.

Therefore, the duration of 5-7 minutes supposedly foreseen for a cremation "according to the calculations and plans of the crematorium," as Tauber put it in his Polish deposition (P14), is simply absurd: it was not even sufficient for the complete combustion of an ordinary coffin of seasoned wood. Only a demented person or a pathetic impostor could have conceived "calculations" and "plans" for the cremation of a corpse within 5-7 minutes.

The cremation duration that Tauber attributes to the cremation of a load of 4-5 corpses was barely enough for the evaporation of the water contained in a single corpse. During Ing. Kessler's experiments, this process lasted 27 minutes, but the corpse was cremated with an ordinary coffin, whose combustion raised the muffle temperature to about 1000°C , thus hastening the water-evaporation process. In the naphtha-heated Ignis-Hüttenbau furnaces of the Theresienstadt Crematorium, the vaporization of the corpse water took about 35 minutes.

In civilian crematoria, multiple cremations in the same muffle were prohibited by law and were never carried out. From an experimental point of view, what technically comes closest to the simultaneous cremation of several corpses in one muffle is the operation of incinerators for slaughterhouses. The most-important company in this field during the WWII era was Hans Kori of Berlin, which produced several furnaces of this type. In the furnace with the highest output, the incineration of 900 kg of organic matter, equivalent to the simultaneous cremation of 15 corpses of 60 kg in a muffle, required 13 and a half hours, with a consumption of 300 kg of hard coal; in practice, the simultaneous cremation of 15 corpses of 60 kg in this furnace would have required – in relation to one corpse – about 54 minutes and about 20 kg of hard coal. In other words, the duration of the cremation would have been practically multiplied by the number of corpses loaded in the furnace, and that only if an accordingly large furnace with a larger gasifier was used for it.

This already shows in principle the double absurdity of the claim of cremations of 4-5 corpses in one single-corpse muffle within 20-25 minutes, half an hour or a little more than half an hour: first of all, let it be repeated, the cremation of a single corpse lasted about an hour; secondly, a potential load of 4-5 corpses would have multiplied the duration of a single cremation by at least a factor of 4 or 5.

The conditional is obligatory, because in reality the Topf furnaces of Auschwitz-Birkenau were designed for the cremation of one single corpse at a time, so that their design was incompatible with multiple cremations at once, in this case, of 4-5 corpses in one muffle. In fact, such a procedure would have led to two serious thermo-technical problems:

1) These corpses would have obstructed the three inter-muffle openings that connected the side muffles to the central muffle in the triple-muffle furnace or those that joined the inner muffles to the outer muffles in the 8-muffle furnace, obstructing the passage of combustion products from the gas generator. The bodies placed on the refractory clay grate of the central muffle in the triple-muffle furnace or the side muffles in the 8-muffle furnace would also have obstructed the existing spaces between the grate bars, further obstructing the passage of generator gases to enter the smoke duct. This would have decreased the chimney draft and the hearth draft, with a corresponding decrease in heat availability in the muffles.

2) When cremating a corpse placed inside a coffin, the temperature of the muffle initially rose due to the combustion of the coffin's wood. When cremating a corpse without a coffin, as was the case at Auschwitz, the temperature dropped instantly due to the evaporation of the corpse water. The importance of this phenomenon can be seen from the observations of Hans Keller during his cremation experiments of a single corpse at a time with a coffin in a Ruppmann Furnace in 1929 (Keller 1929, p. 2):

“After the introduction of the corpse, the coffin catches fire immediately and the temperature goes up by 100-150°C. Five minutes later, it again goes down by 100-200°C, even though the lid of the coffin has not yet burned and the temperature of the combusted gases [coming from the gasifier] is 1,000°C and higher. The heat provided by the combustion of the coffin and the heat supplied by the combusted gases therefore do not suffice to maintain the temperature at a high level. From this we can see how intense the evaporation [of the corpse water] is.”

Returning to the Topf furnaces, in the initial phase of the cremation process, the vaporization of water from several corpses in a single muffle would have led to a drastic drop of the furnace temperature – much more than the 100-200°C mentioned by Engineer Keller – which would have caused the temperature of the fumes to drop, with a subsequent decrease in the chimney draft. This would have led to a decrease in the draft of the gas generator, resulting in much less air (=oxygen) sucked through the burning coal, causing much less heat and combustible coke gas being made available to maintain the cremation process. The inevitable lowering of the muffle temperature to below 700-600°C would no longer have resulted in cremation, but in a mere carbonization (charring) of the corpses.

The photograph of a corpse in a muffle after 30 minutes of cremation published by Bohnert *et al.*¹¹¹ shows that in practice only the limbs are burnt, while the skull, rib cage and thoracic-abdominal cavity are still visible. The authors describe the progress of cremation at this point as follows (temperature of 670-810°C; Bohnert et al., p. 18):

- Thorax/abdomen: thoracic and abdominal cavity exposed, organs blackened and shrunken
- arms: hands and distal forearms burned away
- legs: tibia and distal femur free of soft tissue.

These experimental data demonstrate that Tauber’s claim that 4-5 corpses had already been incinerated in a muffle after 30 minutes is an absurd fairy tale.¹¹²

3.1.5. The Cremation Process

Tauber and Dragon provide an almost identical description of the initial stage of the cremation process:

Tauber:

“The second load to be cremated in the same muffle was loaded in the same manner as this [first load], but with this second pair of corpses we had to hurry, because the corpses loaded earlier were already burning in the meantime, their arms and legs were rising, so that in case of a delay, we found it difficult to load the second pair of corpses into the furnace. During the loading of this second pair of corpses into the furnace, I had the opportunity to observe the process of burning of the corpses. It seemed as if the corpses straightened the trunk of the body, that [their] hands rose up and contracted, the same thing happened with the legs.” (P20)

Dragon:

“When we loaded the third corpse, those [the two corpses] introduced earlier were already burning. I saw that the arms of these corpses rose, then the legs rose. Besides, we were proceeding very quickly, and I could not accurately observe the entire burning process. We had to hurry, because if the extremities of these already burning corpses rose strongly, we had difficulties getting the third corpse into the furnace [=muffle].” (P7)

None of this appears in the accurate description of the various stages of cremation by Bohnert et al.; they observed only a kind of contraction of the body after about 10 minutes which they called a “pugilistic attitude” (Bohnert et al., p. 13). The story of the rising extremities was therefore not the result of a real observation, but a simple fable. Apart from that, this leg-raising activity is also physically impossible, because lifting a leg from a supine body requires quite some strength and the coordinated use of many muscle groups in both legs and abdomen. Many living people have great difficulty raising both legs while lying down. How, then, is a corpse supposed to do it?

3.1.6. Opening the Muffle Doors for Inspections

According to Tauber, two loads were carried out per hour in a furnace, and the corpses were introduced in two stages into each muffle, so that within one hour the door of each muffle was opened four times. He asserted moreover that, “after each loading, the SS Kommandoführer checked whether the furnaces were loaded properly. We had to open the doors of each muffle for him, and at that time we saw what was going on inside” (P20) This means that the door was opened four more times.

The witness adds that the corpses in the muffle were stoked with a scraper “to accelerate the burning of the corpses” (P20), so each door was opened at least one more time with each loading, a total of ten times in an hour.

In terms of time, if one assumes the loading duration adduced by the Soviet experts (2-3 minutes),¹¹³ just to introduce the claimed number of corpses into a muffle, the door of the triple-muffle furnace would have been open for (2 to 3 × 4 × 3 =) 24-36 minutes every hour. And if for the remaining six openings (four for combustion control and two for stoking the burning corpses) a minimum duration of one minute is considered, the opening duration increases by another five minutes, and the total duration rises to 29-41 minutes! And this would apply to each of the three muffles: altogether, 30 openings per hour!

¹¹³ “The Technical Principles of Operation of the Crematoria.” Expertise of the Polish-Soviet Commission of Inquiry on the Lublin-Majdanek Concentration Camp. GARF, 7021-107-9, pp. 246.

This is thermo-technically senseless, because the cold air coming through the opened doors would have cooled the furnace enormously. As Hans Keller pointed out, air “has only a low heat content, and the temperature drops significantly with even minor heat losses” (Keller 1928, p. 25).

How important this phenomenon was, is apparent from the following observation by engineer Richard Kessler (Kessler, p. 136):

“We have ascertained experimentally that the cracks in the brickwork which form to a greater or lesser extent in the cremation furnaces themselves because of the continuous stress to which they are exposed, allow a certain quantity of air, more precisely of cold air, to enter the cremation chamber during the final phase of the cremation; this amount of air is far greater than what is needed at this stage for the combustion of the remnants of the corpse. The consequence of this is, of course, a deleterious cooling of the furnace (heat loss).”

If the air flowing into the muffle from simple cracks could cool the muffle, it is easy to imagine what would happen if the furnace doors were opened so many times and for so long.

Precisely to avoid this inconvenience, the muffle doors of the Topf triple-muffle furnace had, in the lower part, an inlet opening for the combustion air, which was closed by a liftable cast-iron door measuring 10.8 cm × 12.6 cm with a round inspection port, 45 mm in diameter, in the center that was equipped with a round cast-iron closing plate fixed to the door with a pin. To observe the cremation process, one could simply move the plate to the side and look through the small round opening or lift the door and look through the rectangular opening. Claiming that the muffle doors were opened in order to observe the cremation process is therefore simply nonsense.

3.1.7. The Combustibility of Corpses

“Women’s corpses burned much better and faster than men’s corpses. Therefore, if a load was burning badly, we would look for a woman’s corpse [and] load it into the furnace to speed up the burning process.” (P21)

It is generally accepted that, on average, women have a higher body-fat content than men, so, at least in theory, they should be more combustible. But what Tauber says is nonsense anyway, because women’s bodies are also made up of approximately 65% water, so “if a load burned badly,” introducing another body would make the whole batch burn even worse, because the evaporation of the doubled amount of water in the muffle would further lower its temperature, hence slow down the cremation process.

3.1.8. Corpse “Self-Combustion”

In his Polish testimony, Tauber stated that fat bodies burned by self-combustion. I divide his statements into numbered paragraphs (P12):

1) “During the cremation of these corpses, we used coke only for the ignition of the furnace. Fat corpses burned by themselves thanks to the burning of the fat present in the body.” (P12)

2) “It also happened that, when there was no coke to heat the gas generators, we placed straw and wood in the ash boxes, which were located under the muffles, and as soon as the fat of the corpses ignited, the entire load^[114] already burned with its own fire.” (P12)

3) “In the early loads, when the furnaces were heated only by the gasifiers, cremation took place more slowly. But then, as more loads were cremated, they [the muffle walls] were brought to red heat by the embers that were produced by the cremation of the corpses, so that during the cremation of fat corpses, generally the gasifiers were shut down.” (P21)

4) “From the corpses placed in the furnace thus brought to red heat, the fat immediately dripped into the ash box; in the ash box, it ignited and burned the corpse.” (P21)

First Claim:

I repeat what I established in another study (Mattogno 2020, pp. 178f.). Cases of “spontaneous human combustion” (SHC) have been scientifically ascertained, and the most-convincing explanation is considered to be the combustion of body fat by virtue of the “wick effect” or “candle effect.”

Experiments have shown that human fat ignites only at a temperature of 250°C, but the “wick effect” also occurs if the liquid fat drops to a temperature of 24°C. Other experiments have shown that combustion proceeds at a rate of 3.6-10.8 kg/hr. A case of self-combustion was discovered in the woods of Medford, Oregon: the body of a woman was partially burned in this way in no less than five hours. The burning is concentrated on the parts of the body that are richest in fat (Christensen, pp. 13-18). A specialist called into question in the study cited above, John D. DeHaan, clarified in this regard (DeHaan, p. 10):

“The rates measured range from ~3 to 14 kg/h, so over a period of many hours a substantial portion of a normal human body can be destroyed by this mechanism (fluids drain out or evaporate and muscle burns reluctantly with a very low effective heat of combustion).”

The result is therefore not a burning of the whole body, much less an incineration down to mere ashes.

Kurt Prüfer, Topf’s chief engineer who designed the triple-muffle furnace, critiqued the operating results of the gas-fired Volckmann-Ludwig Furnace in Hamburg as claimed by Engineer Volckmann, writing (Prüfer, p. 6):

“If the claims of cremation without any gas [= fuel, energy] added were true, the exhaust-gas temperature would have to be room temperature, which a combustion engineer will probably not seriously claim, because the unavoidable exhaust-gas losses and the cold air flowing in when the coffin is introduced are certain passive items in the heat balance that cannot be avoided."

¹¹⁴ All bodies loaded into the furnace.

These statements referred to the cremation of 2,500 corpses in seven months with a consumption of 100 m³ of gas. Obviously, in the thermal balance of these cremations, it was necessary to consider the heat produced by the combustion of the coffin, which corresponds to a contribution of about 120,000 kcal, equal to about 27 m³ of city gas per cremation.

Therefore, the "self-combustion" of corpses was unfeasible even in the best German civilian crematorium of the 1930s and 1940s, which was far superior to the stripped-down Topf furnaces set up at Auschwitz and Birkenau.

Second Claim:

Tauber presents the case of a cold furnace ("when there was no coke to heat the gas generators") in which corpses were introduced into the muffle, and straw and wood were placed in the ash chamber below.

I should point out that the ash chamber was a space about 35 cm wide and 45 cm high, closed by a door measuring 28 cm × 35 cm. In this space, therefore, wood (evidently kindling wood in bundles) and straw were placed, the straw was set on fire and, as soon as the wood bundles caught fire, the fat of the corpses (i.e., the usual 4-5 corpses per muffle) dripped into the ash chamber, where it caught fire, so the 4-5 corpses of each muffle burned with their "own fire".

This statement is even more absurd than the previous one: if it is impossible for 4-5 corpses to self-combust in a furnace heated to 800°C, self-combustion in a cold furnace is even more impossible, if there is such a thing. In Tauber's description, the wood placed in the ash chamber (a few tens of kilograms¹¹⁵) was not used to perform the cremation, as on a pyre, but simply to melt the fat of the corpses, after which the cremation took place by self-combustion.

Even if one were to accept purely hypothetically that there were bodies of fat inmates at Auschwitz, the straw and wood placed in the ash chamber would have acted as a wick for the body fat that hypothetically dripped from the grate.¹¹⁶ In that case, however, this "cremation," for a "fat" body of 80 kg, would have lasted at least (80 kg ÷ 14 kg/hr =) just under six hours!

And above all, such a combustion would not have heated the muffles, which would have remained practically cold.

¹¹⁵ Seasoned small wood in bundles weighs 100-120 kg per cubic meter (Colombo, p. 63). Therefore, in the approximately 0.3 cubic meters of an ash chamber, one could place at most (120 kg/m³ × 0.3 m³ =) 36 kg of this wood.

¹¹⁶ It is obvious that in a "cremation pit," in which the temperature by definition is much higher than 250°C, human fat would burn immediately, and both the "wick effect" and the collection of liquefied fat as fantasized by delusional witnesses would be utterly impossible.

Third Claim:

Tauber stated that “during the cremation of fat corpses, generally the gasifiers were shut down.” In addition to the absurdities mentioned earlier, this statement is thermo-technically nonsensical and contrary to the practice of operating coke-fired cremation furnaces. In no furnace was the coke in the gas generator allowed to burn out (except when it needed occasional cleaning from slag), not even at times when no cremation at all was actually underway. Kessler pointed out in this regard (Kessler, p. 159):

“Whereas for gas heating the heat required can be precisely controlled, in the case of coke or briquettes, heat is produced even at times when it is not needed, because even though it is possible to reduce the combustion in the generator, it cannot be stopped altogether; otherwise the fire would go out.”

And it is clear that the extinguishing of the burning embers in the hearth of the gas generator, in addition to the thermo-technical problems exposed earlier, would also have entailed a dead loss of the time needed to eventually re-ignite the coke for the cremation of lean corpses, a loss of time irreconcilable with the frenzied cremation paces claimed by Tauber.

Fourth Claim:

Tauber explains how the alleged self-combustion of corpses in a heated furnaces took place. This is therefore the absurdity already noted about Paragraph 1. It is certainly true that the fat melting from any corpse ignited and burned, but it certainly could not cremate the corpse. What is important to note here is that the technical and empirical fact of the immediate burning of the fat (the “wick effect”) radically contradicts and demolishes his description of the recovery of liquefied human fat in “cremation pits” (see below, Section 3.1.13).

3.1.9. Corpse Embers

In the text quoted in the previous section, paragraph 3, Tauber stated:

“But then, as more loads were cremated, they [the muffle walls] were brought to red heat by the embers that were produced by the cremation of the corpses, [...]” (P21)

In this regard, the witness also stated earlier (P4):

“The cremation process is accelerated by the burning of human fat, which produces additional heat.”

In reality, the muffles were heated by the combustion products of the gas generators and the gases and flames that developed from the corpses. The embers were not only very slight, but they were consumed in the ash chamber, below the muffle, so that their heat contribution to the muffle was insignificant. That fat – which melts, evaporates and burns – produces embers is an absurdity: it is like saying that the combustion of gasoline produces embers.

3.1.10. Flaming Chimneys

“But there were also cases in which we loaded more corpses into the muffle. As many as eight muslims could be accommodated [introduced] in there. We burned these larger loads during air raids without the knowledge of the crematorium chief, so that a larger fire came out of the chimney, and the airmen became aware of it.” (P13)

This story is doubly absurd. First, because flames shooting from the chimneys of the Birkenau crematoria as a result of cremations was technically impossible, as I have documented elsewhere.¹¹⁷ Second, because, at least in theory, the phenomenon of flaming chimneys would have been closely linked to the fat content of the corpses, but, as is obvious and as Tauber himself states, the corpses of the “muslims” were “emaciated and fatless” (P12); they were “real skeletons, which burned very slowly,” meaning that cremating a load of five such corpses took an hour and a half according to Tauber (P4). A load of eight skeletal corpses could not, a fortiori, produce the phenomenon of flaming chimneys.

3.1.11. The Test Cremation

In his Polish deposition, Tauber described in detail the test cremations in Crematorium II:

“On 4 March [1943], we were in charge of firing up the gas generators. We kept them going from morning until 4 o’clock in the afternoon.” (P13)

“We brought [up] these corpses through the elevator and the door leading to the heating room, and placed them two or three at a time on a cart similar to the one I described when speaking of Crematorium No. 1, and loaded them into the individual muffles. After the introduction of the entire batch of corpses into all the muffles of all the furnaces, the members of the commission, watches in hand, observed the process of cremation of the corpses, opened the doors, looked at the watches, discussed among themselves, and marveled that the cremation lasted [so] long. Since the furnaces, because they were completely new, had not yet warmed up properly, although they had been operating since the morning, the cremation of this load lasted 40 minutes.” (P13f.)

“For the next 10 days, we went every day under SS escort to the crematorium and fired up the gas generators. During these 10 days, no transports arrived; we did not cremate any corpses, but only kept the gas generators running to heat the furnaces.” (P14)

This description is a sequence of technical absurdities. First of all, as I have already explained, the simultaneous cremation of two or three corpses in a muffle, if it could be done at all, would not have lasted 40 minutes but more than two to three hours. Tauber’s explanation of this “long” duration, the fact that the furnaces “had not yet warmed up properly” because they were “completely new,” is technically nonsensical and historically false. Heating up the furnaces took at least 8 hours. The grate throughput capacity of the two hearths of the triple-muffle furnace was 35 kg of coke per hour, a total of 70 kg/hr. The weight of the refractory masonry of this furnace (including the gas generators and ash chambers) was about 11,500 kg (Mattogno 2020, p. 62). Assuming a caloric value of the coke of 6,470 kcal/kg, a furnace efficiency of 50%, and an air temperature in the furnace room of 20°C, heating the entire refractory masonry of the furnace to 800°C would have required:¹¹⁸

$$\frac{0.21 \text{ kcal/kg}^\circ\text{C}^{119} \cdot 11,500 \text{ kg} \cdot (800^\circ\text{C} - 20^\circ\text{C})}{6,470 \text{ kcal/kg} \cdot 0.5} \approx 580 \text{ kg of coke.}$$

Since the gas generators could consume only 70 kg of coke per hour, this means that heating this furnace took some (580 kg coke ÷ 70 kg coke/hr ≈) eight and a half hours. In practice, the entire refractory masonry of the furnace (average thickness: 12 cm) would have been heated to red heat by then (800°C).

Obviously, cremations were performed as soon as the muffle temperature reached 800°C, as also prescribed by the operating instructions of the triple-muffle furnace (Mattogno/Deana, p. 265):

“Once the incineration chamber shows a satisfactory red glow (about 800°C), the corpses can be introduced successively into the two chambers.”

In the triple-muffle furnace, which was equipped with two lateral gas generators, it took about one hour to reach this temperature of the surface of the cremation chamber. Civilian crematoria, which had refractory masonry that weighed the same as that of a 3-muffle Topf furnace but were equipped with only one gas generator, took about two hours. In the cremation experiment carried out by Richard Kessler on 5 January 1927 in the Gebrüder Beck Furnace at the Dessau Crematorium, preheating the furnace up to the introduction of the first corpse (785°C) took 2 hours and 12 minutes.

In conclusion, to claim that, after eight hours of reheating, the triple-muffle furnaces of Birkenau Crematorium II had not been adequately heated is technical nonsense. Logically linked to this absurdity is the other absurdity of heating the furnaces for ten consecutive days without cremating any corpses: by doing so, assuming a 12-hour shift, the SS would have needlessly wasted (12 hrs/day × 70 kg/hr × 5 furnaces × 10 days =)¹²⁰ 42,000 kg of coke!

In his Soviet testimony, Tauber specified that during these ten days the furnaces were dried:

“Until 15 March, we heated the furnaces, or rather we dried them.” (S4)

¹¹⁸ Mattogno/Deana, Vol. 1, Unit 1, Chapter VII, pp. 109-127.

¹¹⁹ Specific heat of the refractory masonry.

¹²⁰ 12 hours × 70 kg × 5 furnaces × 10 days.

And this in turn correlates with the fact that the furnaces were “completely new,” i.e., allegedly still in need of being dried.

In fact, the furnaces of Crematorium II had already been dried at that point in time. On 29 January, Topf’s chief engineer Kurt Prüfer inspected the crematorium construction sites, and prepared a progress report. He wrote that the five triple-muffle furnaces of Crematorium II were being dried (“werden z. Zt. trockengeheizt”).¹²¹ According to the report by SS Obersturmführer Hans Kirschnek of 29 March 1943, Crematorium II was put into operation on 20 February 1943 (“zum 20.2.43 in Betrieb genommen”),¹²² so that the drying process had been completed by that date.

On the other hand, the drying process in a crematorium was carried out gradually, by lighting the gasifier’s hearth first with a very gentle fire of wood shavings, then with thin wood, increasingly thicker wood and wood mixed with coke. In case of rapid and intense heating of the furnace, large quantities of water vapor would have been formed inside the masonry, whose pressure would have produced fractures and cracks inside it, seriously damaging it.

Obviously, the Topf engineers, who – according to Tauber – were said to have been present during the test, would never have allowed the full-on heating of undried furnaces. Moreover, as I have already explained earlier, they would not have ever opened the “doors” of the muffles to see how the combustion was proceeding.

The story of the commission from Berlin and the Topf engineers who were allegedly present at the testing of the cremation furnaces is not supported by the slightest documentary evidence; it is in fact a simple fable that was quite common among the witnesses at the time. They spiced up with rhetorical emphasis and solemnity a minor event (the start-up of the crematorium) that went practically unnoticed even by the SS in the camp.

3.1.12. The Fireproof Sack

“Tomiczek’s head was enclosed in a sack, but we recognized him anyway, because his robust build stood out. Kwakernak watched over us until Tomiczek’s body was placed in the furnace, then he left immediately. We [then] opened the door of the furnace, took out the corpse, opened the sack, and from the face we recognized Tomiczek without any uncertainty.” (P7)

The operating temperature of the furnaces at Auschwitz-Birkenau, as I noted earlier, was 800°C. At this temperature, a coffin introduced in civilian furnaces ignites instantly when pushed into the muffle. But Tauber’s sack remained perfectly intact, to the point that it had to be opened, after having been removed from inside the muffle, to ascertain whose head was in it!

3.1.13. The “Cremation Pits”

First of all, I note that Tauber provides self-contradictory data on the number of these alleged pits. In his Soviet deposition, he stated that “4 crematoria and 4 big pyres were in operation for the extermination” (S6), while in his Polish deposition, he stated that five pits were dug in the courtyard of Crematorium V in May 1944, and “Bunker No. 2 and its pits [plural] for cremating corpses were put back into operation” (P27), hence at least two pits.

Tauber stated in his Soviet deposition (S11; I number the individual claims):

- 1) “The pyres for cremating corpses were arranged in pits, at the bottom of which a channel for air supply had been dug along the entire length of the excavation.”
- 2) “From this channel, there was a branch to a pit 2 x 2 x 4 meters deep.”
- 3) “During the cremation of the corpses on the pyres, the fat dripped into this pit:”
- 4) “with this fat the corpses on the pyres were sprayed so that they burned better.”
- 5) “At first, wood was put in the pit, then 400 corpses, alternated with branches, were sprinkled with gasoline, and the fire was started. Then the remaining corpses from the gas chambers were thrown in, and from time to time the fat from the corpses was poured in.”

First Claim:

The alleged “channel for the access of air” was not a closed duct, but a simple open channel dug at the bottom of the pit. Moreover, the channel for the collection of human fat started from it. But at the bottom of the pit was placed a layer of wood (with a layer of corpses on top) which, when set on fire, would have filled the “channel for the access of air” with its embers and ashes. This channel is therefore a simple literary fiction.

Second Claim:

The system of draining and collecting the liquid fat, assuming smooth and impermeable channel floor and walls, would require inclined planes towards the center of the pit and towards the collection pit which are not mentioned by the witness. Not to mention that, at that time (spring-summer 1944), the groundwater table in the area of the Crematorium V courtyard was only about 1.2 meters below the surface (see Mattogno 2003). Therefore, the fat-collection pit, and probably also the cremation pit, would have been flooded with water.

Third Claim:

Tauber describes a real physical miracle. According to John H. Perry's engineering manual, the ignition temperature¹²³ of pig fat in air (very similar to human fat) is 343°C, but its flash point – the point where it will burn in air after having been ignited by an external source – is only 184°C (Perry, p. 1584). In practice, above 355°C, fat ignites spontaneously, and it will keep burning continuously on its own, while liquid fat above 185-190°C but below 355°C still emits vapors in sufficient quantities to burn in air if ignited by an external source, such as glowing embers or burning wood.

The self-ignition temperature of cured wood from a coffin ranges from 325 to 350°C (Heepke, p. 124). Of course, the wood's combustion temperature is even higher. In this case, if the purpose is to be cremation and not simply the charring of a corpse, the temperature in the muffle must reach at least 600°C. Therefore, Tauber basically claims that the fat of the corpse lying in a fire melts, crosses a layer of burning wood between at least 350 and 600°C hot, drips into the special "air-access channel" full of red-hot glowing embers, enters the collection channel, also full of red-hot glowing embers, and collects in the special pit: and all this without igniting in the slightest during this long hot journey!

As I mentioned above, this physical miracle is also in open contradiction with Tauber's description of the "self-combustion" of corpses:

"From the corpses placed in the furnace thus brought to red heat, the fat immediately dripped into the ash box; in the ash box, it ignited and burned the corpse." (P21)

Therefore, in the crematorium the fat burned, while in the cremation pits it flowed in a liquid state to the collection pit.¹²⁴

The theoretical conclusions stated above have been fully confirmed by a series of experiments on the combustion of animal fat that I carried out in a field furnace of my own construction, including photographs, precisely to verify them experimentally (Mattogno 2004).

Fourth Claim:

Liquid human fat was thrown on corpses "so that they burned better." How was the liquid fat scooped out of the collection pit? Certainly with a zinc bucket attached to a rod ending with a hook, as the witness Filip Müller tells us, who elaborated on this literary theme later (Müller, p. 136). But how was it then thrown onto the corpses? The scenario would have been this: a burning pyre of at least 150 square meters (see next section) burning at a temperature of at least 600°C; the immense radiation emanating from this fire would have ¹²³ The minimum temperature at which a fuel begins to burn spontaneously in air without external ignition.

¹²⁴ It matters little that the furnace was "red hot," because in both cases the temperature was well above the flash point of fat.

heated anything standing close to it swiftly to several hundred degrees Celsius (and if combustible, would have ignited it).

If Tauber and Müller had thrown their bucket full of hot fat toward the burning pyre from a safe distance, hardly any of the fat would have landed on the pyre. If instead they had ventured to the edge of the pit, true "auto-combustion" would have occurred, meaning that our witnesses would have been burned alive. Of course, this is also true for anyone approaching the pyre in order to scoop out the collected, boiling fat. Such an operation necessitated a close approach to the edge of the pit, and scooping out the fat using a bucket dangling from a long rod would have required quite some skill, and therefore much more time than throwing a bucket of fat onto the pyre. True self-combustion would have been inevitable.

From a thermo-technical point of view, throwing a bucket of boiling (and probably already burning) fat on a burning pyre of that size would not have brought any benefit, because the fat, due to its low flash point, would have ignited already in the air while flying (if it wasn't already burning to begin with), and it would have landed on top of the burning surfaces, contributing little to burning it.

In a cremation pit (equipped with an efficient supply of combustion air from below, for example by means of pipes connected to a blower), it would be necessary instead to exploit the fat of the corpses inside the pit itself, so that the flames that develop from it hit the corpses from below upwards.

And, if the miracle of the liquid fat flowing on the bottom of the pit could ever occur, it would be necessary to prevent it from flowing to the outside of the cremation pit into any kind of collection hole, in order to use all its calorific potential inside the pyre.

Fifth Claim:

How could a corpse be thrown into the aforementioned burning pit? Clearly, this would have been even more difficult than throwing a bucket of fat into it – unless precision catapults were used. But unfortunately, Tauber does not mention any such device.

3.1.14. The "Cremation Pits" on Birkenau Air Photos

According to Tauber, as I noted in the previous section, four to seven "cremation pits" existed at Birkenau, five of which were in the courtyard of Crematorium V; he did not indicate their dimensions, but his colleague Dragon speaks of five pits measuring $25\text{ m} \times 6\text{ m} (= 150\text{ m}^2) \times 3\text{ m}$ (P9), in total ($150\text{ m}^2 \times 5 =$) 750 m^2 . To complete the testimonial picture of the four main Polish witnesses, I briefly mention the claims of the other two: Stanisław Jankowski mentioned only two pits, which he said measured $20\text{ m} \times 2\text{ m} (= 40\text{ m}^2) \times 2\text{ m}$, while Henryk Mandelbaum indicated only their dimensions (while contradicting himself): $30\text{-}35\text{ m}$ or $25\text{ m} \times 15\text{ m} \times 2\text{ m}$ or $1\text{-}1.5\text{ m}$. Filip Müller, on the other hand, mentioned five pits of $40\text{--}50\text{ m} \times 8\text{ m} \times 2\text{ m}$ or $40\text{ m} \times 8\text{ m} \times 2.5\text{ m}$ each.¹²⁵

In a separate study, in which I analyzed and published numerous aerial photographs of Birkenau, I showed that from May to August 1944 there was only one small smoking site in the above-mentioned area with a surface of only about 50 m^2 (and not five large ones), and that there was no smoking site at all in the area of the so-called “Bunker 2” (see Mattogno 2016a).

Therefore, Tauber’s statements, as well as those of all the other witnesses who spoke of huge “cremation pits,” are resoundingly refuted by the aerial photographs of the time.

Tauber affirms that, in order to bring the corpses to the pits from the gas chambers of Crematorium V, a railway was built for some rail cars, which however were not used because “the SS considered them inconvenient and the inmates of the Sonderkommando dragged the corpses of the gassed from the gas chambers directly to the pits” (P27). There is no trace of this railway in the aerial photographs of Birkenau from 1944. Besides being false, such a statement is also nonsensical: the SS would have considered it “inconvenient” to transport a certain number of corpses quickly and effortlessly on a cart and instead would have considered it “comfortable” to have a single corpse dragged by a single inmate for at least twenty meters!

3.2. The Gassings

3.2.1. The First Homicidal Gassing at Crematorium II

In his Soviet deposition, Tauber stated that the first gassing took place on 15 March 1943, and concerned a transport of 4,000 Jews from the Krakow Ghetto (S4). Danuta Czech’s Auschwitz Chronicle speaks instead of 1,492 victims, allegedly gassed on March 13.¹²⁶

Morgue 1 of Crematorium I and II, the alleged homicidal gas chamber, measured $30\text{ m} \times 7\text{ m}$, thus it had a floor area of 210 m^2 , ignoring the area occupied by the seven supporting columns (measuring $0.4\text{ m} \times 0.4\text{ m}$) and that of the alleged four devices for introducing Zyklon B (according to the witness Michał Kula, $0.7\text{ m} \times 0.7\text{ m}$). The density of victims in the gas chamber was thus roughly $(4,000 \div 210 =) 19$ persons per square meter. Despite this physical impossibility, the victims had ample space:

“From the arrangement of the bodies, it could be seen that people had moved away from these columns and had wanted to reach the door. It was very hot in the room, and there was such a stench that it was impossible to bear. Later we became convinced that many of the bodies in the gas chamber died of asphyxiation, of lack of air, even before the gassing. These people lay on the floor, and others walked over them. They were not sitting down, like the majority, but were lying on the floor. From this it could be seen that they had died before the others, who must have stepped on their corpses.” (P15)

¹²⁵ See Mattogno 2021a, Chapters 7.3. (on Müller, pp. 119–123) and 10.4. (on Mandelbaum, pp. 184–192).

¹²⁶ Czech 1990, p. 352. The correct arrival date at Auschwitz of deportees from the Krakow Ghetto is 14 March 1943; see Mattogno 2022, pp. 153–155.

In a study drawn up in collaboration with Giuseppe Poggi, I demonstrated – also visually – that the gassing of 1,500 persons, but also of 1,000 or less, in Morgue 1 (the alleged gas chamber) of Crematoria II and III at Birkenau would have encountered an insurmountable obstacle in the occlusion of the air-extraction openings by the bodies of the victims.

Morgue 1 was equipped with 40 air-extraction openings (presumably the same as the air-intake openings: 7 cm × 18 cm), 20 on each of the side walls, arranged at floor level and protected by a metal grid. The air-intake openings were located on the oblique side of the two ventilation ducts behind the masonry of the room at the height of the two high corners (under the reinforced-concrete roof); these also numbered 40, 20 on each side. The mechanical ventilation worked via two identical fans, one for air intake, which pushed fresh air into Morgue 1 through a special duct, the other for air-extraction, which sucked out the stale air through the deaeration openings, which were connected to the special duct. The fans were installed in the attic of the crematorium; the fresh-air intake and the exhaust-air outlet ended in two chimneys located on the roof of the building.

The obstruction of the air-extraction openings on the floor of Morgue 1 would have compromised the functioning of this system, which would not have been able to expel the gas mixture from the room in time. Hence, when the door of that room was opened, air from that room would have spread throughout the basement of the crematorium (Morgue 2 only had an air-extraction fan, so its air pressure would have been lower than that of Morgue 1 under any circumstance), but also to the furnace room, through the elevator shaft, due to the lower pressure caused by the furnace-room air-extraction fan and by the furnaces themselves, whose ten hearths sucked in a lot of air, expelling it through the main chimney.¹²⁷

This would have had a very dangerous outcome not only for the inmates of the Sonderkommando, but also for the SS service personnel.

The danger of gassing with hydrogen cyanide (the active ingredient of Zyklon B) had already been proven in the course of regular disinfestations of barracks and other buildings, as stated in the well-known “Special Order” (“Sonderbefehl”) of 12 August 1942:¹²⁸

“A case of indisposition with slight symptoms of poisoning by hydrogen cyanide which occurred today makes it necessary to warn all those participating in fumigations and all other SS members that particularly upon opening fumigated rooms, SS members without mask must keep a distance of 15 meters from the chamber for at least five hours. In addition, particular attention should be paid to the wind direction.”

In Crematoria II and III, any homicidal gassing would have put the lives of SS men and inmates equally at risk, and would have required a long and complicated “degassing” procedure. But these unavoidable inconveniences were never noticed by any “eyewitnesses,” and least of all by Tauber.

On the day of the “first gassing,” the Kommando to which Tauber belonged presumably was locked up in a room in the crematorium, allegedly so that they would not witness the gassing procedure (P15). They were taken out only afterwards and sent to the alleged gas chamber, but here they did not have to remove the corpses of the gassed persons, a task which was carried out by another team of 70 inmates of the “bunker” Sonderkommando (P16). It is therefore clear that the SS sent Tauber and his group to the “gas chamber” to carefully check the state of the corpses and to testify about them after the war!

Tauber added (P15f.):

“After the people had been pushed into the gas chamber and had been locked in, and before pouring the ‘Cyklon,’ air was extracted from the chamber, in fact the ventilation of the chamber lent itself to this purpose.”

This is just another technically nonsensical statement. The ventilation of the alleged gas chamber was based on the system of two blowers: one extracted the stale air from the room, while the other identical blower simultaneously brought in fresh air from outside.

Tauber also stated that the ventilation system was started “after the door to the [gas] chamber was opened” (P16), but this is also nonsense, because the ventilation would have had to be carried out while the doors were closed. In the hypothetical world of homicidal gassing, due to the heat in this room (“It was very hot in the chamber”; P15) that also had a higher pressure than the rest of the building (all other rooms only had suction fans), when the door was opened, the hot gas mixture would have spread into the basement and the ground level of the crematorium.

Tauber furthermore declared that “there was such a stench that it was impossible to bear” (P15) in the alleged gas chamber, but he immediately contradicts himself, saying that the people in charge of the evacuation of the corpses from the gas chamber wore gas masks (P16), and that he did not even participate in the evacuation of the corpses of the first gassing (“However, we did not remove the corpses from this first transport in mid-March 1943”; P16).

3.2.2. The Undressing Barracks

In relation to first gassing, Tauber stated (P15):

“These people were pushed into the barracks which was then situated perpendicular to the crematorium building, on the side of the entrance to the yard of Crematorium No. II. The persons entered this barracks through a door that was on the entrance side, and went down the staircase that was to the right of the ‘Müllverbrennung.’ At the time, this barracks served as an undressing room. However, it was only used for about a week, and then it was dismantled.”

It is known that the situation map of the PoW Camp Auschwitz of 20 March 1943 shows a barracks in the vicinity of the northwest corner of Crematorium II. A relevant clipping of this map was published by Jean-Claude Pressac, who explained the function of this barracks on the basis of the above-mentioned statement by Tauber (Pressac 1989, p. 462).

As I have shown elsewhere,¹²⁹ this barracks, which was installed by 15 February 1943 as a “dressing room” (“Auskleideraum”) at the request of the SS garrison physician of 21 January 1943, had no relation to the alleged homicidal gassings (which are said to have started there much later), but served to strip the bodies of registered inmates who had died at the camp.

Tauber did not explain at all why the barracks in question was installed, nor why it was used on that occasion as an undressing room, nor why it was dismantled after a week. Not only that, but his description cannot be the result of direct observation. In fact, he stated that, as soon as the deportees began to arrive, “we of the Sonderkommando were locked up in the room where – as I explained in the description of the crematorium – the physicians assigned to the autopsies were staying” (P15, similar P18). Then he added:

“After about two hours in the doctors’ autopsy room, we were taken out and ordered to go to the gas chamber.” (P15)

Therefore, during the unloading and undressing of the alleged victims, Tauber remained locked up with the other inmates in this room, which was located in the southwest corner of the crematorium.¹³⁰ But the undressing barracks was on the opposite side, in front of the east end of the crematorium. Therefore, Tauber could not have seen the scene he described, which is simply a figment of his imagination.

3.2.3. Subsequent Gassings at Crematorium II

Tauber claimed to have remained in Crematorium II only from 4 March until mid-April 1943. During these scant six weeks, the activity of the crematorium was as follows (P17f.):

- 1) “During the cremation of the corpses from that first transport in mid-March 1943, we worked non-stop for 48 hours, but we were not able to cremate all

¹²⁹ Mattogno/Poggi, pp. 9-37 (particularly pp. 34-37); Mattogno 2020c, pp. 104-111.

¹³⁰ Pressac 1989, p. 491, plan of Crematorium II, Room No. 23.

the corpses, because in the meantime a Greek transport arrived, which was also gassed.”

2) “I worked in Crematorium II until the middle of April. During this time, Greek, French and Dutch transports arrived. Also during this time, we cremated the corpses of the people who had been gassed as a result of the selection made at the camp. We worked in two shifts, day and night. I am not in a position to give a figure for the number of people gassed and cremated during this period.”

3) “On average, 2,500 bodies were cremated per day.”

First Claim:

Tauber tacitly assumed (as he explicitly stated to the Soviets; S4) that the first transport contained 4,000 people. According to Danuta Czech’s Auschwitz Chronicle, only 1,492 people were gassed during the first gassing (Czech 1990, p. 352), although not even that figure is based on any facts.¹³¹ But even assuming Czech’s figure as real, since on average 2,500 corpses were cremated per day according to Tauber, the cremation of the bodies of the alleged victims would have lasted less than one day. Actually, using the different cremation figures provided by Tauber, it would have taken precisely:

- about 16½ hours with a load of 3 corpses per muffle in half an hour;
- about 13½ hours with a load of 4-5 corpses per muffle in about 37 minutes;
- about 8 hours with a load of 4-5 corpses per muffle in 20-25 minutes.

Tauber claimed instead that the crematorium staff was unable to complete the cremation of the victims of the first gassing in 48 hours of uninterrupted work,¹³² because “in the meantime” a transport of Greek Jews had arrived, who were likewise gassed and cremated. But according to the Auschwitz Chronicle, this Greek transport only arrived on 24 March (Czech 1990, p. 359), hence ten days later. Tauber’s statement is therefore false and contradictory.

Second Claim:

Between mid-March and mid-April of 1943, “Greek, French and Dutch transports arrived” (P18). But according to the Auschwitz Chronicle, no transports from Holland and France arrived during this period at all (see further below).

¹³¹ I have already pointed out earlier that this deportation took place on the 14th. Czech mentions a transport of 2,000 people, of which 508 were registered, hence the alleged 1,492 gassing victims. In reality, the number of 2,000 deportees is not found in any document, and is simply a conjecture. The indictment against Amon Goeth, the former commandant of the Płaszów Camp, states that he carried out the liquidation of the Krakow Ghetto on 13 March 1943 after having selected the Jews fit for work into Sector A, and those unfit for work into Sector B. The claimed extermination victims were precisely these – and they are said to have been killed right there in the ghetto, not in Auschwitz – and their corpses were transported to, and buried in, the Płaszów Camp. Therefore, no gassing would have taken place in Auschwitz. See Mattogno 2022, pp. 155-157.

¹³² Even assuming the figure of 4,000 victims from Tauber’s Soviet deposition, the cremation time at the rates claimed by him would have been much less, about 34 hours.

With reference to the summer of 1944, Tauber added in his Soviet testimony the well-known propaganda lie of the mass extermination of French resistance fighters (S6), which was widespread among witnesses in 1945. That same year, this lie was shamelessly canonized by Polish-Jewish Historian Filip Friedman. In fact, he wrote that, in the summer of 1944, 670,000 (sic!) “‘terrorists,’ i.e., patriots and partisans from France” were transported to Auschwitz and murdered (Friedman, p. 74).

Third Claim:

In approximately one month, from March 14-15 to mid-April 1943, an average of 2,500 Jews per day were gassed and cremated in Crematorium II alone (and “3,000 people a day” according to his Soviet deposition; S6). This corresponds to a total of about 75,000 people (or 90,000 according to his Soviet deposition).

According to Czech’s Auschwitz Chronicle, however, the 12 transports that arrived at Auschwitz during this period transported (according to her) only 30,852 people. 24,021 of them were allegedly gassed, plus 1,700 Gypsies allegedly taken from the camp’s Gypsy section (“Gypsy Camp”), resulting in a total of 25,721 gassing victims (Czech 1990, pp. 352-378):

Date 1943	# Deportees	Group	Origin	claimed gassing victims
13 March	2,000	Jews	Krakov	1,492
16 March	1,000	Jews	Krakov	959
20 March	2,800	Jews	Greece	2,191
23 March	-	Gypsies	Gypsy Camp	1,700
24 March	2,800	Jews	Greece	1,986
25 March	1,901	Jews	Greece	1,206
30 March	2,501	Jews	Greece	2,048
31 March	1,000	Jews	Sieradz Ghetto	736
31 March	3,000	Jews	Ostrowiec ¹³³	3,000
3 April	2,800	Jews	Greece	2,208
9 April	2,500	Jews	Greece	2,021
10 April	2,750	Jews	Greece	1,967
13 April	2,800	Jews	Greece	1,936
17 April	3,000	Jews	Greece	2,271
Totals	30,852			25,721

Subtracting the 3,000 gassing victims of the imaginary transport of 31 March, it turns out that, according to the orthodoxy’s standard work of Auschwitz historiography,

- a. there were only 22,721 alleged gassing victims, not 75,000 (or 90,000);

¹³³ The mass gassing of Gypsies on 23 March and the transport of 31 March are fictitious; see Mattoigno 2022, pp. 157-160.

- b. even if the presumed gassings had all taken place in Crematorium II, there would never have been an average daily number of 2,500 cremated persons;
- c. as mentioned earlier, no Jewish transports from France and Holland arrived at Auschwitz during that time.

The frenzied extermination activity indicated by Tauber, but at the same time any extermination activity, is also categorically refuted by an important fact that happened precisely in this period and to which the witness makes only a passing reference: At the beginning of the third decade of March 1943, Crematorium II was seriously damaged. On 24 and 25 March 1943, Topf engineers Kurt Prüfer and Karl Schultze, called in by the Central Construction Office, went to Auschwitz to check the extent of the damage: the three forced-draft devices (Saugzuganlagen) were irreparably damaged and (as was discovered at the beginning of April) parts of the refractory lining of the smoke ducts and the chimney had collapsed.

Schultze was to check the condition of the three forced-draft systems in Crematorium II, while Prüfer was to check the efficient operation of the five triple-muffle furnaces without these systems. It was ascertained that these installations were irreparably damaged, and the Topf Company declared itself ready on 16 April to take them back, crediting the Central Construction Office with RM 3,705 as reimbursement.

Tauber confines himself to reporting the following on this matter (P11):

“At first, there were three electric motors around this chimney to strengthen its draft. Because of the heat next to and in the vicinity of the furnace, these motors broke down, and once a fire even broke out, so they were later dismantled, and the ducts carrying the combustion gases from the cremation furnaces were connected directly to the chimney.”

All of this work was carried out after Tauber had left Crematorium II (mid-April): the three forced-draft devices were dismantled by Topf's mechanic Messing between 17 and 19 May. The dismantling of the damaged refractory lining began around 24 May; on 1 June, this were finished, but it was not possible to build the new lining because the specifications for the new chimney lining had not yet been submitted. The new lining was put in place between the last third of June and the end of August (Mattogno/Deana, Vol. 1, pp. 239-243).

How could Tauber have known those technical details, since he was in Crematorium IV at the time?

Since the two Topf engineers went to Auschwitz urgently on 24 March following a telegram, it is evident that the breakdown had occurred a few days earlier, and that the crematorium had suspended or at least reduced its activity as a precaution around that date. Therefore, in practice, the theoretical number of gassing victims until the middle of April 1943 could not have exceeded

5,150 (the first three transports), compared to the 75,000 (or 90,000) resulting from Tauber's ramblings.

In order to establish responsibility for the damage done to the chimney, the Central Construction Office opened an investigation and summoned Robert Koehler, the builder of the chimney, and Kurt Prüfer, who had designed the project. According to the final report by SS Obersturmführer Hans Kirschnek dated 13 September 1943, it was determined that the main cause of the damage to the chimney was closely linked to the "heating of only individual furnaces," as the first design of the chimney did not take into account the different thermal expansion of the individual ducts, a flaw that was only remedied in the new design.

This is in open contrast to the mass cremation of the presumed gassing victims using the crematorium's maximum capacity at all times as claimed by Tauber (meaning the simultaneous operation of all furnaces), which is therefore, a fortiori, historically false.

Tauber contradicts himself also regarding the average number of victims of a gassing operation: 4,000 or 3,000 people according to Tauber's Soviet testimony (S4, S6), and 2,000 according to his deposition given to the Jewish Historical Commission.

3.2.4. The Door of the Alleged Gas Chamber

This is how Tauber describes the door of the alleged homicidal gas chamber of Crematorium II (P8):

"In this door, at the head height of a man of average stature, was a round glazed little window. On the other side of the door, i.e., on the side of the gas chamber, this window was protected by a hemispherical grating. This grating was installed because it had happened that the people who were in the gas chamber, before dying, had broken the glass window. Since even the grating did not prevent this, and similar incidents occurred despite its installation, this window was then closed with metal sheets or a board."

At the end of his Polish testimony, Tauber stated that at the Bauhof there was, among other things, "a gas-tight door of a gas chamber" (P28). Pressac published three photographs of this door (Pressac 1989, p. 486), which has a peephole protected on the inside by a hemispherical metal grid. This is therefore in contradiction to Tauber's statement that the peephole had to be "closed with metal sheets or a board." Pressac states that the door that appears in the photos reproduced by him "certainly belonged to a homicidal gas chamber in one of the four Birkenau Krematorien," which he justifies as follows (ibid.):

"The proof of its criminal use is the presence of a heavy hemispherical grid PROTECTING THE PEEPHOLE ON THE INSIDE."

The evidence adduced by Pressac is far from irreproachable, and he himself has provided the means to refute it. On pp. 46-49 of his 1989 book, he reproduces photos showing the door of the disinfestation chamber of the so-called “Kanada I” Inmate-Property Warehouse (BW 28). This door had a round inspection opening with a metal grille attached to the inside, which evidently protected the glass from the inside. Therefore, the need to protect the glass of the inspection opening also applied to an ordinary fumigation chamber. The fact that the door mentioned above had a protective grille on the inside does not necessarily mean that it had a homicidal purpose, but it can also mean – in the context of a fumigation chamber – that the inside was the one most exposed to the risk of the spy glass getting damaged. How? Here, too, Pressac provides the clue for the answer. On pp. 84f., he reproduces photos of the hot-air disinfestation chambers of the Zentralsauna, in which the metal carts are clearly visible on which the clothes to be disinfested were hung. Similar carts were also used for the hydrogen-cyanide disinfestation chambers, and it is clear that they could hit the inside of the door while being pushed in or out of the chamber, thus potentially breaking the glass of the inspection hole.¹³⁴

I may add that there is no evidence that the door with the hemispherical protective grille belonged to any of the Birkenau crematoria. The “gas-tight”¹³⁵ door that was found in the ruins of Crematorium V¹³⁶ and that until 1991 was located in Crematorium I at Auschwitz¹³⁷ has no inspection opening at all. The door of the Zyklon-B disinfestation chamber in Auschwitz Block 1 has a very similar structure, but has a small rectangular window clovered with a board.¹³⁸

3.2.5. The Zyklon-B-Introduction Device

Tauber (S4, P9) and Dragon (S11) agree on the presence of four openings in the ceiling of Morgue 1 (the alleged gas chamber), topped off by small chimneys covered by concrete lids, but not on the claimed Zyklon-B-introduction columns. In fact, the fables created by the various resistance groups in the camp had not yet crystallized in 1945, and multiple contradictory versions circulated: in this case, columns of wire mesh, today ordained to be “historical reality,” were opposed to columns of perforated metal sheets. Tauber supported the first version, but not without inconsistencies. In the Soviet deposition he stated (S5):

“Zyklon gas was diffused into the gas chamber through wire-mesh columns that formed a square channel with double mesh layers. ”

¹³⁴ The doors of the disinfestation chambers opened outward, so the door’s inside was exposed to the operators’ actions.

¹³⁵ Doors made of wooden boards cannot be “gas tight” in a technical sense. They can be “draft-free,” but that’s as good as they can get.

¹³⁶ See Document 14. APMO, Neg. No. 12683.

¹³⁸ See Documents 16 and 17. author’s photos of 1991.

As Tauber's tales evolved, his double-layered wire-mesh columns obtained another layer. In his Polish deposition, Tauber described the columns as follows (P9):

"To the left and right of these pillars were four columns. The outer layer of these columns was made of a thick wire mesh that went up to the ceiling and outside. Behind this layer was a smaller mesh netting, and within it, a third fine[r]-meshed [net]. In this third netting, there was a box, by which the powder, from which the gas had already evaporated, was extracted with the help of a wire."

"Above the gas chamber rose four openings like small chimneys, into which the gas was poured. These openings were closed by concrete lids with two-handed wooden handles."

It is known that this version, with not-insignificant adjustments, later became the one adopted by the orthodoxy, mainly thanks to Michał Kula.¹³⁹ Kula, a former Auschwitz inmate (Reg. No. 2718), who had worked in the inmate metalworking shop (Häftlings-Schlosserei) – a unit of the of the Central Construction Office's workshops – declared during an interrogation by Jan Sehn on 11 June 1945 that he himself had manufactured these alleged wire-mesh columns,¹⁴⁰ but this is not confirmed by the register of the metalworking shop's management (WL [Werkstättenleitung] Schlosserei), in which all the work carried out by this workshop for the crematoria was recorded, since it does not contain any entry for any such columns.¹⁴¹

Dragon, on the other hand, leaned towards the other version (S11):

"Beneath these openings, in the gas chamber, false columns were installed resembling the real ones present there. These false columns were internally empty, and their walls were made of iron plate with perforations, like the common grates that covered the ventilation openings."

The witness did not refer to wire-mesh, but to punctured sheet metal like that which covered the ventilation openings of Morgue 1 of Crematoria II and III.¹⁴² This version had a certain testimonial notoriety, because it was taken up by other important former members of the Sonderkommando. For instance, Miklós Nyiszli summarized it as follows in 1946 (Nyiszli, p. 34. English translation: Mattogno 2020b, pp. 39f.):

"In the center of the room, at a distance of thirty meters from each other [egymástól harminc méter távolságra], a number of columns stretch from the concrete floor to the ceiling. These are not support columns, but are rather quadrangular tinsplate pipes [négyszögletű vasbádóg csövek], their sides pierced throughout with holes like a grill.”

In the same year, Dr. Charles Sigismund Bendel, another self-proclaimed member of the Sonderkommando, wrote (Bendel, p. 161):

“At the center of these chambers, two latticed tubes [grillagés] descending from the ceiling with an external valve [soupape] served for the emission [émission] of the gases.”

This version, spiced up with some more fantasy, was incredibly exhumed by Filip Müller as late as 1979 (Müller, p. 60):

“The Zyklon B gas crystals were inserted through openings into hollow pillars made of sheet metal. They were perforated at regular intervals and inside them a spiral ran from top to bottom in order to ensure as even a distribution of the granular crystals as possible.”

Tauber further stated that the lids of the alleged Zyklon-B-introduction devices were made of “concrete” with “wooden handles.” I will preface this by saying that the use of wooden handles in a lid more or less similar to that of a concrete manhole cover does not exactly conform to normal construction custom, which would require iron handles. Dragon confirms that the alleged lids were made of “heavy removable concrete” (S11; “concrete plates,” P12).

According to Michał Kula, the Zyklon-B-introduction devices measured 70 cm × 70 cm (confirmed by Piper 2000, p. 166) and crossed the ceiling of the alleged homicidal gas chamber inside Crematorium II (and III). If it was topped off on the outside by a masonry chimney, this chimney must have measured 94 cm × 94 cm (Rudolf/Mattogno, p. 385). Concrete has a specific mass of 2.1-2.5 metric tons per cubic meter. I assume the average value to be 2.3. A concrete lid, assuming a minimum thickness of 5 cm, would therefore have weighed (0.94 m × 0.94 m × 0.05 m × 2,300 kg/m³ =) 101.6 kg. Any gassing would therefore have been a Herculean feat!

3.2.6. The “False” Showers

Tauber stated in this regard (P9f.):

“I emphasize that at first there were no benches or coat hangers in the undressing room, and in the gas chamber [there were] no showers. They were installed only in the fall of 1943 in order to disguise the undressing room and the gas chamber by presenting them as a bath and disinfection [room]. These showers were attached to pieces of wood that had been inserted into the concrete ceiling of the gas chamber for this purpose. No water supply was connected to these showers, so no water ever came out of them.”

In reality, the question should be considered within the context of the “Special Measures for the Improvement of Hygienic Facilities” at Auschwitz as ordered by SS Brigadeführer Hans Kammler, head of Office Group C – Construction of the SS Economic and Administrative Main Office in early May 1943. I reconstructed this event in a separate study, which also involved the crematoria of Birkenau (Mattogno/Poggi, pp. 22-33; see Mattogno 2004b). To summarize it very succinctly:

On 13 May 1943, the head of the Auschwitz Central Construction Office, Karl Bischoff, compiled a “Report on the Division of Labor for the Instant Program at PoW Camp Auschwitz,” where we read:

“Civilian employee Jährling has to carry out the installation of heaters and boilers in the wash barracks, as well as the showers in the undressing room of Crematorium III.”

Two days later, on 15 May, Bischoff sent the Topf Company an urgent telegram in which he asked:

“Bring along Monday estimated project for hot water supply to 100 showers. Provide for installation of heating coils or boilers in waste incinerator under construction at Crem. III or flue-gas duct for exploitation of high exhaust temperatures.”

On 16 May, Bischoff sent Kammler a report in which he wrote, among other things:

“Furthermore, it is planned to install heating coils in the garbage incinerator at Crematorium III thereby to provide water for the shower installation to be built in the cellar of Crematorium III.”

The project of the shower system in the basement of Crematorium III was soon replicated for Crematorium II. On 5 June, the Topf Company sent a letter to the Auschwitz Central Construction Office with the subject line “Crematorium II and III. Garbage Incineration Furnace,” to which was attached Drawing D 60446 for the installation of water boilers in the incinerator.

Finally, in a questionnaire on the crematoria dated June 1943, Bischoff answered the question: “Are the exhaust gases being used?”: “planned but not realized,” and to the next question: “If yes, state purpose,” he wrote: “for bathing facilities in Crema. II and III” (Mattogno 2004b, pp. 276-278).

Therefore, there were showers in the basements of Crematoria II and III, and they were real showers, used by live people to take showers.

Pressac endeavored to find objective corroboration for Tauber’s claim that the alleged fake showers “were attached to pieces of wood that had been inserted into the concrete ceiling of the gas chamber for this purpose.” After inspecting the accessible ruins of the ceiling of the alleged gas chamber of Crematorium II, he identified and photographed several wooden pieces embedded in the concrete, and held them to be wooden bases supporting false showers (Pressac 1989, p. 488, Photos 18f.). In reality, however, these wooden pieces had been inserted into the reinforced-concrete ceiling of Morgue 1 during the pouring of the concrete simply to support the fixtures for lighting the room.¹⁴³

3.2.7. The Ventilation of the Alleged Gas Chamber

On this point Tauber stated:

“The ventilation system was installed in the walls of the gas chamber. From it [the ventilation duct] opened towards the inside of the [gas] chamber small openings equipped with nets [grates] of white sheet metal that were placed in the upper part of the side walls and [other] lower openings protected by a kind of iron muzzle [hemi-spherical iron grate]. The ventilation of the gas chamber was connected to a system of ventilation pipes that were located in the undressing room.” (P9)

“In this connection I would like to point out that the persons to be gassed who were in the gas chamber often damaged the electrical cables, tore them out, and damaged the ventilation system.” (P8)

The claim that the ventilation system was “installed in the walls of the gas chamber” is, to say the least, improper, since the intake and exhaust ducts were part of the masonry walls. These were a closed system and had no connection with the ventilation system of the “undressing room,” which consisted of wrought-iron tubes mounted to the ceiling.¹⁴⁴

The witness clarified (P15f.):

“After the people had been pushed into the gas chamber and had been locked in, and before pouring the ‘Cyklon,’ air was extracted from the chamber, in fact the ventilation of the chamber lent itself to this purpose. It was a suction-pressure system. The undressing room had only suction ventilation. Although the ventilation was turned on after the door to the [gas] chamber was opened, in the first moments after entering the chamber, when there were gassed persons in the chamber, we worked on extracting the corpses while wearing gas masks.”

Dragon made fairly similar statements (S11):

“When the entire gas chamber was tightly packed with people, the door was closed hermetically, and for a few minutes the ventilators sucked the air out of the chamber. Then the fans were turned off, and an SS man opened the box with Zyklon, climbed onto the roof, moved the lid of the opening described above, and poured Zyklon into the chamber through the opening.

After about 15 minutes, the aeration-deaeration ventilators were started, the poisoned air was sucked out, and the door was opened.”

¹⁴³ See Rudolf/Mattogno, pp. 391f., and Ill. 9-12, pp. 405f.

¹⁴⁴ The letter from the Topf Company to the Central Construction Office in Auschwitz dated 8 May 1942 explains that “wrought-iron pipes” (“schmiedeeiserne Rohrleitungen”) were planned for the deaeration (“Abluft”) of Morgue 2, and that the main duct (“Hauptrohrleitung”) was to be mounted to the ceiling of the room. RGVA, 502-1-312, p. 67.

I have already explained above that the ventilation system of Morgue 1 of Crematoria II and III consisted of two fans, one for air intake, the other for air extraction, which worked together: the intake fan brought fresh air from outside into the room, the extraction fan sucked in the stale air and blew it to the outside.¹⁴⁵ Even if the air-intake fan was turned off, the reduced pressure caused by the extraction fan in the morgue would have sucked in fresh air through the air-intake duct. Moreover, uncovering the alleged chimneys for the introduction of Zyklon B would have allowed a generous air flow into the room, rebalancing the pressure. The system of a partial vacuum described by the two witnesses is therefore mere puerile fantasy.

According to Dragon, after “[a]bout 15 minutes, the aeration-deaeration ventilators were started, the poisoned air was sucked out, and the door was opened.” The sentence is ambiguous, perhaps intentionally: it is unclear whether the door to the room was opened at the same time when the fans were started, or how long the ventilation had lasted already before the door was opened, an element that is certainly not negligible, given the high toxicity of hydrogen cyanide.

To what I have noted earlier, I should add that, given the obstruction of the air-extraction openings of the alleged gas chamber by the bodies of the 2,500 gassing victims, the operation of the two ventilators would have created a small overpressure in the room. When the door was opened, this would have caused the diffusion and convection of the toxic gas mixture into the other basement rooms of the crematorium.

3.2.8. The Subdivision of the Alleged Gas Chamber of Crematorium II

Here we come to Tauber’s unverifiable statement which, according to van Pelt, the revisionists presumably use “to refute the validity of the whole of Tauber’s testimony”:

“At the end of 1943, the gas chamber was divided in two by a masonry wall, so that it was suitable for gassing smaller transports. In this wall, there was a door similar to the one [that led] from the corridor to the entire chamber. The smaller transports were gassed in the rear chamber farther away from the entrance to the corridor.” (P9)

Here is Pressac’s comment on this (1989, p. 484):

“One of the very contestable points in the deposition. It would seem more logical to gas in the gas chamber CLOSEST to the entrance, as this meant less distance to transport the corpses and the ventilation system at the far of the gas chamber must have been inefficient because it was poorly designed.”

The testimony of Dr. Charles Sigismund Bendel is sometimes cited as “independent confirmation” by the orthodoxy for this claimed division. While it is true that both Tauber and Bendel state that there were two gas chambers in Crematorium II, Bendel claimed that they measured 10 m × 4 m (NMT Document NI-11953) or 10 m × 5 m (NMT Document NI-11390), and were only 1.60 meters high, while the room from whose division these two gas chambers would have arisen measured 30 m × 7 m and was 2.41 m high, dimensions that are absolutely incompatible with those claimed by Bendel, and that cannot be explained by a trivial error of judgment. Moreover, Bendel mentioned the presence of two gas chambers in Crematorium II not because of the subdivision of a chamber, but only because he believed that every crematorium was equipped with two gas chambers (Phillips, p. 135):

“In each crematorium there were generally two gas chambers.”

Henryk Mandelbaum also made a similar statement: “One such bunker [Morgue 1] was about 50 m long [actually 30 m], it was divided into two parts,” but this dates back to the trial of the Auschwitz Camp Garrison (end of November 1947); in his three previous statements (27 February 1945, 26 September 1946 and 19 March 1947), he never mentioned the alleged division of the claimed gas chamber into two parts (see Mattogno 2021a, pp. 179-216), which suggests that he was influenced by Tauber’s deposition.

Szlama Dragon, on the other hand, spoke of a single, undivided gas chamber (see Section 4.11.1.).

From the point of view of the economy of the alleged extermination, the subdivision mentioned by Tauber is completely nonsensical, because according to him there were allegedly three or even four gas chambers of various sizes in Crematoria IV and V, in which smaller transports could have been gassed if needed. In his Soviet statement, he even claimed that this is exactly what happened (S7):

“Depending on the number of people arriving, the Germans poisoned them simultaneously [in Cremas IV & V] in one, two or three chambers.”

But if that was so, what was the point of wasting time, material and money to divide the alleged gas chamber of Crematorium II into two rooms?

It should be noted that Tauber wants to have worked in Crematorium II until mid-April 1943, after which he allegedly was assigned to Crematorium IV. In the summer of 1944, he participated in the excavation of the five “cremation pits” in the courtyard of Crematorium V, but he does not specify when he was assigned to this crematorium. In June 1944, after the failed uprising attempt, the entire Sonderkommando was transferred to Crematorium IV and, after the October uprising, was housed in Crematorium III.

Therefore, he never returned to Crematorium II, and consequently cannot have been present at the alleged division of the claimed gas chamber into two rooms (end of 1943), nor when the alleged fake showerheads were installed in the basements of Crematoria II and III, so that his statements cannot be “eyewitness” accounts in this regard. This also applies to the following statement (P25):

“Crematorium III was built in the same way as Crematorium II, with the difference that in this crematorium the cart for loading the corpses into the furnace was not used right from the start.”

3.2.9. The Gassing Procedure at Crematoria IV and V

“In order to pour the ‘Zyklon’ into the chamber, there were hatches with grates in the walls at a height of approximately two meters, which could be closed hermetically with shutters.” (S6)

“All [the rooms] had gas-tight doors, windows fitted with gratings on the outside that could be closed from the outside by gas-tight shutters. These small windows, which a standing man could reach with his hand raised, were used to pour the contents of the ‘Cyklon’ cans into the gas chambers filled with people.” (P26)

In another study, I documented – also visually – that such a procedure would have been not only irrational and ridiculous, as Pressac had already pointed out (1989, p. 386), but actually decidedly impossible, already due to the fact that the grates installed in the side windows would have prevented anyone from pouring into the alleged gas chambers the contents of any Zyklon-B can, simply because the cans were larger than the space left by the bars of these grates (see Mattogno 2021a, pp. 170-179).

3.3. Strength and Events of the Sonderkommando

3.3.1. The Sonderkommando Strength in March/April 1943

According to Tauber’s Soviet testimony, at the time when he was transferred to Crematorium I with a group of 20 Jewish inmates, 33 inmates were working there in total, 26 Jews and 7 Poles (S2). Therefore, 6 Jewish and 7 Polish inmates had already been employed there. In his Polish testimony, Tauber speaks instead of 7 Jewish and 3 Polish inmates (P2).

According to his Soviet testimony, 9 detainees of the initial 20 were left alive at Crematorium I (S4), yet according to his Polish testimony, 12 of 22 (P6), and 3 of 25 according to the testimony given to the Jewish Historical Commission.

In March-April 1943, the staff of the crematoria allegedly amounted to 400 persons, distributed as follows (S9):

- Crematoria II and III: 240 inmates
- Crematoria IV and V: 120 inmates
- sick and miscellaneous workers: 40 inmates

However, Crematorium III was still under construction at the time,¹⁴⁶ so 120 inmates cannot have served there in March-April 1943.

Tauber also says that the staff of the Sonderkommando was increased in May 1944 to 1,000 prisoners, divided up as follows (S10):

- Crematorium II: 120 inmates
- Crematorium III: 120 inmates
- Crematorium IV: 60 inmates
- Crematorium V: 300 inmates
- “Separate Gas Chamber”: 300 inmates

However, adding these figures together, we get a total of 900, not 1,000. On the other hand, according to extant documents, the maximum staff strength of the crematoria in 1944 was 925 inmates (Mattogno 2016a, pp. 141-150), not 1,000. It was moreover distributed as follows on 1 August 1944:¹⁴⁷

Unit	Designation	Guards	Skilled workers	Unskilled workers	Sums
57-B	Stokers Crematorium I Day	2	1	109	112
57-B	Stokers Crematorium I Night	3	/	104	107
58-B	Stokers Crematorium II Night	3	/	110	113
58-B	Stokers Crematorium II Day	3	/	110	113
59-B	Stokers Crematorium III Day	2	1	109	112
59-B	Stokers Crematorium III Night	3	/	110	113
60-B	Stokers Crematorium IV Night	3	/	109	112
60-B	Stokers Crematorium IV Day	3	1	109	113
61-B	Wood Unloaders Crem. IV	/	/	30	30
	Totals:	22	3	900	925

Note that the original document uses the Roman numerals I through IV for the Birkenau crematoria, whereas today they are usually numbered II through V.

Hence, Tauber erroneously attributes 120 inmates to each of Crematoria II and III, and only 60 each to Crematoria IV and V.

These documents especially refute the alleged presence of 300 inmates in Crematorium V and 300 inmates in the alleged “Bunker 2”.

3.3.2. The Sonderkommando at the “Bunkers”

According to Danuta Czech, the 300 inmates of the Sonderkommando who had carried out the cremation of the 107,000 corpses allegedly interred near the Birkenau Camp, were gassed on 3 December 1942 to eliminate “the witnesses to the corpse burning” (Czech 1990, pp. 277f.). On 6 December 1942, a new Sonderkommando was allegedly established, of which Szlama Dragon was also a member (ibid., p. 280), who worked on the gassings and pit crema-¹⁴⁶ Crematorium III was handed over to the camp administration ready for operation on 24 June 1943.

¹⁴⁷ This distribution is attested from 28 July to 9 August 1944; on 10 August the helpers dropped to 870 because there were no more wood unloaders; Mattogno 2016a, pp. 141-145.

tions at “Bunker 2” for three full months, hence at least until mid-March 1943. In fact, Tauber states that at that time this Sonderkommando numbered 400 people (P18), 70 of whom were sent to Crematorium II to remove the corpses from the first gassing (P16). However, as shown in the previous section, this does not fit in with the Sonderkommando, also of 400 inmates, who worked in Crematoria II-V. Thus, two Sonderkommandos existed in mid-March 1943, both with 400 inmates, one working at “Bunker 2,” and the other in the crematoria. According to the logic followed by witnesses and Polish post-war trials, the Sonderkommando in charge of the “bunker” should also have been exterminated, but instead everyone – witnesses, judges and historians (D. Czech) – forgot about that squad. Since these 400 inmates could not have joined the Sonderkommando of the crematoria, which already numbered 400 (so that its total strength would have risen to 800 inmates), they were “exterminated” without anyone noticing, which merely confirms that it was a purely fictitious Sonderkommando.

3.3.3. The Alleged Gassing of 200 Sonderkommando Members

According to Danuta Czech, on 23 September 1944, “200 Jewish prisoners in the Special Squad who are deployed to incinerate corpses in open pits are removed – after the trenches are covered and graded [...],” and were subsequently gassed (ibid., p. 715). These were “carriers of secrets” who had to be eliminated as such.

This is in contradiction to what Tauber reported. In fact, he mentioned the gassing of 200 inmates of the Sonderkommando, but in a completely different context: it was carried out as a result of the attempted revolt of June 1944, evidently preemptively discovered by the SS, whose first victim was Kapo Kaminski, who was shot (P23).

The first source cited by Danuta Czech is the manuscript of Salmen Lewental, which reads (Bezwińska/Czech 1992, p. 162):

“But the day came when our situation became very serious, the reason being the transferring of our entire Kommando to crematoria II-IV. And since there was no ‘work’ there, we expected in the immediate future the Germans to come and take away a group of men from among us. And so it came to pass, 200 men were taken, killed and cremated.”

Here is a third version: the alleged elimination took place because there was no “work” in Crematoria II-IV in September 1944.

All this is in further contradiction of what Tauber reported. In fact, he stated that both the “Gas Chamber No. 2 and the pyres next to it” and the “pyres at Crematorium 5” from May to October 1944 “worked intensively” (S10); therefore, on the one hand the “cremation pits” had not been filled with earth and leveled before 23 September, as Danuta Czech writes, and on the other hand there was a lot of “work” at that time, contrary to what Lewental states.

According to Tauber, moreover, there were at least 540 inmates working at the pits,¹⁴⁸ while Danuta Czech mentions only 200.

Extant documents show that on 7 September the staff of the crematoria amounted to 874 inmates, and on October 3 to 662, a decrease of 212 inmates (Mattoigno 2016a, p. 149), but nothing shows that they were killed. In this regard, Dragon's account that I summarized earlier is very telling.

According to Tauber, the alleged gassing took place at the Auschwitz Main Camp in the disinfestation chamber of the "Kanada" Inmate-Property Warehouse (P23), which Pressac considers "impossible," because the men of the Sonderkommando, who knew the alleged gas chambers of Birkenau well, would never have entered a gas chamber. Therefore, Pressac concludes (1989, p. 498):

"This execution by gassing still remains to be proved."

3.3.4. The Alleged Transfer to Lublin-Majdanek

The same uncertainty reigns over another purported event: the transfer of 300 inmates of the Sonderkommando to Lublin-Majdanek. Tauber stated that this took place in January or February 1944, but provides no explanation for it (P23).

Danuta Czech writes that this transfer occurred on 24 February 1944, and that it involved 200 inmates, not 300. In a footnote, she cites the explanation given by the witness Stanisław Jankowski: it was a reprisal for the escape of five Sonderkommando inmates, including one Daniel Obstbaum (Czech 1990, p. 588). Jankowski actually mentions this fact (without naming Obstbaum), but vaguely attributes it to early 1944 (Bezwińska/Czech 1992, p. 58). As a source, however, Danuta Czech refers to the manuscript of Salmen Lewental, who in turn reports on this transfer, but attributes it to the period of the Sonderkommando uprising, thus to the beginning of October 1944, an error noted by Danuta Czech herself, who – together with Jadwiga Bezwińska – edited the second edition of this publication containing Lewental's manuscript (ibid., p. 157, FN 63). Needless to say, there is no document that attests to this alleged transfer, which also seems nonsensical: 200 prisoners are said to have been transferred from one death camp to be killed in another death camp! Not even Daniel Obstbaum's escape is confirmed by any document, but is based exclusively on testimonies (Świebicki, p. 222), which therefore creates a vicious circle of mutually contradicting testimonies, in which Danuta Czech becomes entangled. Whence she got the date 24 February 1944 is one of the many mysteries of her Auschwitz Chronicle (see Mattoigno 2021a, pp. 44-52).

3.3.5. The Sonderkommando Revolt

Tauber further stated that, after the attempted uprising in June 1944 and after the gassing of the above-mentioned 200 inmates, the situation of the remaining inmates became more and more serious and they were “watched and monitored with doubled vigilance” (P23), which would have been quite likely if there had really been an attempt at rebellion. On the other hand, the documents show that, on 30 August 1944, the 874 inmates who made up the crematorium staff were guarded by only 22 SS men, hence just one guard for every 40 inmates. On 3 October, after the alleged gassing of 200 inmates, there were 12 guards for 662 inmates, hence one guard for only every 55 inmates (see Mattogno 2016a, pp. 148f.). So the SS not only had not doubled the number of guards in the crematoria, but had even decreased it by 72%!

Tauber dated the alleged Sonderkommando revolt to September 1944 (P24), while Czech insists in her Auschwitz Chronicle that this event took place on October 7 (Czech 1990, pp. 724-726). In the same context, Tauber spoke of the killing of 20-30 SS men, while there were only three alleged SS victims (ibid., p. 726), and claimed that Crematorium V was blown up, a fact which has not been established, as Pressac points out (1989, p. 498).

There is no documented record of a Sonderkommando uprising, but the extremely small number of SS victims shows that the prisoners’ accounts are probably vastly exaggerated. On 3 October, the SS guards were distributed as follows (Mattogno 2016a, p. 150):

Crematoria II and III:

- 1 guard for 84 inmates during day shift
- 3 guards for 85 inmates during night shift

Crematorium IV:

- 1 guard for 85 inmates during day shift
- 2 guards for 85 inmates during night shift

Crematorium V:

- 1 guard for 70 inmates during day shift
- 2 guards for 84 inmates during night shift

On 7 October, the staff of the crematoria was distributed in the same way. Since the riot presumably broke out during the day, there were 84 inmates in Crematoria II and III, 85 inmates in Crematorium IV, and 70 inmates in Crematorium V against only one SS guard in each building. Despite this, the rioters overpowered and killed only three guards!

In the testimony given to the Jewish Historical Commission of Krakow, Tauber contradicted himself once more by stating that the revolt was not started by the Sonderkommando, but by Hungarian Jews who, also in September 1944, “rebelled and threw themselves on the SS,” and that the victims among the SS were not 20-30, but as many as 40!

3.3.6. The Survival Mystery of 90 Sonderkommando Members, Tauber Included

In his testimony to the Jewish Historical Commission of Krakow, Tauber stated:

“This Kommando was liquidated after a few months, and the men who were part of it were gassed. At the most, a few remained.”

At that time, in fact, the story of the periodic liquidation of the Sonderkommando members in order to eliminate dangerous “carriers of secrets” began spreading among the ex-prisoners. This, however, is in open contrast both with what Dragon has narrated and with the incomprehensible survival of 90 Sonderkommando inmates who, instead of being shot, were transferred on foot together with the other inmates, giving them the opportunity to escape!

On the other hand, assuming the classic life span of a Sonderkommando that recurs in this fable – 3-4 months – Tauber would have survived five to six exterminations – from mid-March 1943 to the end of October 1944, which was a total of 19 and a half months – what a lucky fellow!

3.4. Crude Atrocities Propaganda: People Burned Alive

Tauber also repeated the crudest propaganda themes invented by the Auschwitz underground resistance movement, in particular the most-gruesome one: of people burned alive. In his Soviet deposition, he asserted that a part of the Sonderkommando inmates were systematically killed by the SS “mainly by burning” (S9), which he then repeated again (S10). In his Polish deposition, he recounted some decidedly nonsensical episodes. I have already commented on the story of the fireproof sack.

In his Polish testimony, Tauber developed this theme with various imaginative examples. If “dentists” neglected to extract a gold tooth from the mouths of corpses, this was considered sabotage “and the offending dentist was burned alive in a furnace”. Next, Tauber shamelessly invented this story (P16):

“I personally witnessed a French Jewish dentist being burned in this way in Crematorium V. He defended himself and shouted, but the SS, there were a few of them, threw themselves on him, rendered him harmless, and put him alive in a furnace. The punishment of being burned alive was used quite often for the men of the Sonderkommando, [...].”

Two other no-less-imaginative stories follow (P17):

“I also remember another case that took place in Crematorium No. V in August of 1944. At that time a golden wedding ring and a watch were found on one of the ordinary workers, a Jew from Walbrom named Lejb, about 20 years old, dark-haired and wearing the number one hundred and eight thousand and more, during the change of shifts. All the Sonderkommando personnel employed in the crematorium were then assembled, and before their eyes, he was hung with his hands tied behind [his back] from an iron bar above the gas generators. He hung in this position for about an hour; then, after his arms and legs had been untied, he was led into an unheated furnace in the crematorium, where the ash box underneath was doused with gasoline and set alight, so that the flames reached the muffle in which this Lejb was standing.

After a couple of minutes, the furnace was opened, and the doomed man escaped from it completely burned and was ordered to run around the courtyard of the crematorium and shout that he was a thief, then he was ordered to climb the barbed wires of the crematorium fence, which at that time, since it was daytime, was not electrified. When he was on top of the wires, the crematorium chief Moll shot him. Moll's first name was Otto.

Another time the SS chased an inmate who was dawdling at work at the crematorium into a pit in which there was boiling human fat. At that time, corpses were cremated in open-air pits, from which the fat flowed into a separate tank dug into the earth. This fat was used to sprinkle on the corpses to speed up the burning process. This unfortunate man was pulled out of that grease tank still alive and was shot. To complete the formalities, the corpse was taken to the block, where the 'Totenschein,' was issued, and the corpse was taken to the crematorium area only the next day and cremated in a pit."

Here, the tragicomic thing is that Tauber claimed to have been an eyewitness to these grotesque propaganda stories.

He further related that "[i]n many cases, he [Moll] threw people alive into the burning pits" (P22). Pressac "documented" this assertion by publishing a painting(!) by David Olère depicting Moll threatening with a pistol two women standing at the edge of a pit from which flames are rising (Pressac 1989, p. 497). As I explained earlier, given the temperature of the burning pit, the two unfortunate women would have been burned alive without the need to throw themselves into the pit, and Moll himself would suffer the same fate (see Mattogno 2021a, pp. 126-129).

Another propaganda tale is that of an Unterscharführer who very often "arrived at the crematorium, and cut the fat meat off the corpses of those shot" and took it away (P24; see more such lurid tales in Mattogno 2021a, pp. 54-56).

And here is a final tall tale worth a mention (P6):

"I remember that Kapo Mietek asked Grabner to assign him a prisoner for work, because one of our group had died. Grabner replied that he could not give him a 'Zugang,' but if he killed four other Jews, he would give him five 'Zugang.' He also asked Mietek what he beat the inmates with. Mietek showed him a stick. Grabner then grabbed an iron grate [sic] and told Mietek that he had to hit the inmates with this."

Such propagandistic nonsense does not even merit comment.

4. Szlama Dragon

4.1. Dr. Mengele

As Dragon asserted during the Soviet interrogation and reiterated in his Polish deposition, SS Hauptsturmführer Dr. (Camp Physician) Josef Mengele was already in Auschwitz at the beginning of December 1942:

“The selection of people for cremation was the responsibility of the SS fascist Mengele, a doctor, and SS [man] Mol [Moll], who directed the mass cremation of people arriving from various countries and of various nationalities, regardless of gender and age.” (S2)

“I arrived in Oświęcim on 7 December 1942 by train, in a transport of 2,500 Jews of different genders and ages from the Mława Ghetto. At the station, this transport was received by Lagerführer Plage, Rapportführer Palitsch and Camp Physician Mengele. Already at the station, they carried out the selection, separating the women and children into one group, the men into another.” (P1)

It is an established fact, however, that Mengele was transferred to Auschwitz only on 30 May 1943 (Lasik 1995, p. 289), by which time the alleged activity of the “bunkers” had ceased a few months earlier. This cannot be a harmless “confusion” (as expressed by Saletti, FN 3, p. 95), because the witness claimed to have known Mengele personally (P8):

“He was a man of my height, I think he was about 40 years old, with brown hair.”

Therefore, he could not have mistaken him for another SS medical officer. Tauber also invokes Mengele’s presence at Crematorium II in his description of the “first gassing” in that building, and concerning the alleged events that took place there until mid-April 1943:

“From a window in the heating room, I observed how the ‘Cyklon’ was poured into the gas chamber. Each transport was followed by a car bearing the insignia of the Red Cross. The Camp Doctor Mengele and Rottenführer Scheimetz arrived in this car at the crematorium.” (P18)

This Scheimetz (also mentioned by Dragon) is a fictional character, of whose existence there is no documentary evidence. Piper mentions him in his list of “SS Disinfectors, SS Paramedics and Other SS Members” but merely with a simple reference to Tauber’s sentence quoted earlier.¹⁴⁹ Aleksander Lasik, in his documented article whose title translates to “The staffing of the SS sanitary service in the Auschwitz-Birkenau Concentration Camp in the years 1940-1945” lists in alphabetical order 184 names, and devotes a generous page to Josef Mengele (Lasik 1997, p. 314), but does not mention Scheimetz at all.

¹⁴⁹ Piper, “Anhang I, Unmittelbar bei den Gaskammern und Krematorien eingesetzte SS-Angehörige,” in: Długoborski/Piper 1999, Vol. III, p. 269.

Linked to this fictional character is a similarly fictional anecdote, told by Tauber as follows (P19):

“He then told him verbatim: ‘Scheimetz, gib ihnen das Fressen, sie sollen direkt nach Kattowitz fahren.’^[150] This meant that Scheimetz had to hurry up and pour the ‘Cyklon’ into the chamber.”

The anecdote was therefore a known Auschwitz rumor bandied about among inmates, but the imaginary Scheimetz was known only to those witnesses who stayed at Auschwitz or returned there after the arrival of the Soviets.

This rumor-mill anecdote was also known to the well-known impostor Miklós Nyiszli, who reported it in two almost-identical versions (see Mattoigno 2020b, pp. 137, 159, 216):

“On one occasion I chanced to hear the SS doctor urging his assistant: ‘Gib schon das Fressen den Juden!’” (“Give the fodder to the Jews!”)

“‘Gib schon schneller das Fressen den Juden!’” (“Make haste giving the Jews the fodder!”)

4.2. The “Bunkers” of Birkenau: the Term

Szlama Dragon is the witness par excellence regarding the “bunkers” of Birkenau for the period December 1942-March 1943. Nevertheless, it is an incontrovertible fact that, at the time of his Soviet interrogation, he still did not know the alleged name of the “bunkers”: the official name of the two alleged gassing installations was, he insisted, “gazokamery,” “gas chambers”:

“It turned out that they had all been deceived: they were not escorted to a rubber factory but taken to two gas chambers.

I, who was part of one of the two groups, was taken to the gas chamber which was called Gas Chamber No. 2, the second group was taken to Gas Chamber No. 1.” (S3)

“In the gas chamber named Gas Chamber No. 1, there were two rooms, in Gas Chamber No. 2, there were 4.” (S4)

A little less than two-and-a-half months later, the witness had learned that these alleged installations were now to be called “bunkers,” and in the relevant interrogation, he always used that very term:

¹⁵⁰ “Scheimetz, give them the fodder; they should go directly to Kattowitz”.

“This chamber was called Bunker No. 2. Apart from it, at a distance of about half a kilometer, there was another chamber that was called Bunker No. 1.”
(P3)

The designations of “little red house” (“czerwony domek”) and “little white house” (“biały domek”) for Bunkers 1 and 2 had not yet been invented, so Dragon never used them.

4.3. Dragon’s Labor Activities

Dragon’s personal fate after his alleged assignment to the Sonderkommando make no sense from an orthodox point of view. He declared in his Soviet deposition:

“After working one day in Gas Chamber No. 2, I became ill, so I was assigned to cleaning and other work in Barracks No. 2. I worked in the barracks until May 1943, and then I was assigned to the job of collecting bricks from the brick basements and brick half-basements that had been blown up by the Germans. I worked there until February 1944; at the same time, I worked in Gas Chamber No. 2, for about two months, a few days in Gas Chamber No. 1.”
(S4)

“In February 1944 I was sent to work in Crematorium No. 4.” (S6)

Hence, he worked in “Bunker 1” only one day, the first day to be precise, on 11 December 1942. Then he fell ill, but instead of being gassed or liquidated with the classic shot in the back of the neck – as the orthodoxy insists was the inevitable fate of those who became unable to work – he was sent to do small jobs in Barracks No. 2, where he remained for five months, until May 1943. Then he was assigned to the Demolition Squad until February 1944, but “at the same time” – that is, between May 1943 and February 1944 – he worked for about two months in “Gas Chamber No. 2” and for a few days in “Gas Chamber No. 1”. However, this is in contrast to the fact that “[a]fter the construction of the crematorium called No. 2 in Brzezinka [i.e., from April 1943 according to Tauber], the barracks in Bunker No. 2 were dismantled, and the pits were filled in” (P5), so there was no more work to be done.

Dragon clarified in his Polish interrogation (P6):

“In the fall of the same year [1943], I was again employed by the Sonderkommando. In between my work at the bunkers [and his reassignment to the Sonderkommando] I was employed in the Abbruchkommando [Demolition Squad].”

According to this version, the witness was no longer assigned to the “bunkers” in the fall of 1943, but was working in a crematorium, and evidently “at the same time” worked in the Demolition Squad until February 1944!

If one were to deduce anything sensible from this account, he went from “Bunker 1” to “Barrack No. 2” (which, in the Polish version, becomes Block 13, then Block 11, of Camp Sector BIIId; P6) to the Demolition Squad, and at the same time worked at the Sonderkommando (of Crematorium IV, if we believe his Soviet deposition). He therefore had a great deal of contact opportunities with other inmates. But here, another contradiction arises: the block in which the Sonderkommando was housed

“was enclosed and surrounded by a wall to isolate it from the other blocks. We were not allowed to communicate with the inmates in another block.” (P4)

Nevertheless, Dragon was sent to work for a few months with the Demolition Squad, so that he could safely tell the other prisoners the “terrible secrets” of the “bunkers” and Crematorium IV!

But in this regard the witness further contradicted himself, asserting in his Polish deposition that the crematorium in question was actually Crematorium V (P6):

“I worked at Crematorium No. V. until May 1944, [when] we were assigned to work in the gardens, to split wood, to transport coke, because at that time the furnaces of Crematorium No. V were not yet in operation. This crematorium was not put into operation until May 1944, when transports of Hungarian Jews began to arrive.”

Rudolf Höss, about this crematorium, wrote (Höss, p. 215):

“[Crematorium] Number IV had to be repeatedly shut down, since after its fires had been burning for from four to six weeks, the ovens or the chimneys burned out.”

But Dragon did not mean a reactivation of the crematorium after the necessary repairs – which he never mentions – but rather its initial commissioning.

In contradiction to this, he stated (P9):

“At the beginning of May 1944, the gassing and cremation of Hungarian Jewish transports began in Crematorium V. The gassed bodies of some of the first transports were cremated in the furnaces of Crematorium IV, because the chimneys of Crematorium V were damaged at the time. Eventually, the Hungarian Jews were burned in pits dug for this purpose at the building of Crematorium No. V.”

How long did the witness serve at the “bunkers”? In 1942, as seen earlier, only one day at “Bunker 2”; in 1943 (from the month of May onwards), never, as the orthodox narrative has it that these facilities were not in operation between late March 1943 and mid-May 1944 (or not even existing anymore – Bunker 1), despite Dragon’s false claim to the contrary. And in 1944, he either worked at “Bunker 2” not at all, or maybe two days (see Section 4.8.).

Therefore, it must be acknowledged that he had exceptional mnemonic and descriptive abilities, because he describes with extreme detail a supposed installation that he claims to have seen for only one day (Bunker 2), and another that he had never seen (Bunker 1)!

4.4. The “Bunkers” of Birkenau: Enormous Contradictions

Regarding these “bunkers,” Dragon’s statements during the Soviet and the Polish interrogations are in stark contrast, and not only because of the nomenclature.

To Captain Levin, the witness stated that “Gas Chambers No. 1 and No. 2 were about 3 kilometers apart” (S4), yet to Jan Sehn he said that this distance was “about half a kilometer” (P3). He did not explain whether these distances were as the crow flies or by road. If one refers to the actual location of the two “bunkers” as claimed by the orthodoxy, they were about 700 meters apart as the crow flies, about 1,700 m along the longer road.¹⁵¹ But this has no relevance, because Dragon did not provide any indication as to where the alleged “bunkers” actually were located, an inexplicable fact if he really knew their locations: the alleged “Bunker 1” was in fact a house presumably located about 25 meters from the western fence of Construction Sector III, in the area between the sewage treatment plant and the north-western corner of the camp, while “Bunker 2” was located about 250 meters west of the Zentralsauna.

Dragon adds that “from Barracks No. 14, all those selected for the Sonderkommando /Special Kommando/ were transferred to Barracks No. 2, which was located about one kilometer away from the gas chamber” (S3), but since there were two alleged “gas chambers,” such a description makes little sense. On the other hand, he does not even explain which route the Sonderkommando took to leave the Camp Sector BIIIf in order to reach this “gas chamber”.

In the Soviet interrogation, Dragon stated that the “gas chambers had been converted from two houses, whose windows had been made airtight” (S4), but in the Polish interrogation he stated that “the windows were bricked up” (P2).

According to him, the “Gas Chamber No. 1” had two rooms, which could contain 1,500-1,700 people on an area of about 80 square meters (S5) – between 19 and 21 people per square meter! Dragon claimed moreover:

“In each of the rooms of Gas Chamber No. 1, there were two doors: through one door, the naked people were brought in, and through the other, the corpses were brought out. [...] Next to the door through which people entered was a square opening measuring 40 x 40 cm, through which Zyklon, which contained hydrogen cyanide, was poured into the chamber from a box.” (S4)

However, in the drawing of “Bunker 1” created by Engineer Nosal on Dragon’s instructions, there are only one door and two small windows in each room (see Document 9).

¹⁵¹ Not considering the “forest” shortcut, which saved about 300 meters.

“Bunker 2” is said to have had a floor surface of 100 square meters, and was supposedly divided into four gas chambers (S5), which could allegedly contain a total of 2,000 people (S5). In the Polish interrogation Dragon specified the capacities of the single chambers: 1,200, 700, 400, 200-250 people (P3), so that the total capacity was no longer 2,000, but 2,500 to 2,550 victims – 25 people per square meter!

This absurd figure, however, makes it possible to calculate the floor areas of the individual rooms, which turn out to be 48, 28, 16 and 8 square meters. If the width of the small house was about 8 meters, as Franciszek Piper claims,¹⁵² the last room was a narrow corridor 1 meter wide!

Since that was a time of supposedly immense exterminations – 10,000 to 12,000 victims, or some four gassings a day (S7) – this nonsensical four-part division of “Bunker 2,” which would only have created obstacles and difficulties, refers to that stubborn attitude, both by witnesses and historians, whereby the nonsense described by the witnesses is blamed on the SS, as if they were a bunch of imbeciles.

In front of Judge Sehn, the witness significantly revised the capacity of the alleged gas chambers:

“The capacity of Bunkers No. 1 and 2 was about 4,000 people. Bunker No. 2 could hold more than 2,000 persons in all of its gas chambers at the same time, Bunker No. 1 less than 2,000.” (P6)

However, the capacity of “Bunker 1” in the Soviet interrogation was 1,500 to 1,700 persons, that of “Bunker 2” in the Polish interrogation was 2,500 to 2,550.

To the Soviets, the witness stated (S4):

“About 500 meters away from Gas Chamber No. 1 were two standard wooden barracks, and at a distance of 150 meters from Gas Chamber No. 2 were two more similar barracks.”

In contrast to this, in the Polish interrogation he stated:

“Two wooden shacks were located at a distance of about 30-40 meters from that little house [Bunker 2].” (P2)

“In the vicinity of Bunker 1 was a small barn and 2 barracks.” (P3)

Probably someone had pointed out to him that only a demented person would have placed the undressing shacks 500 meters (but also 150) from the alleged gas chambers, having then to escort and guard in the middle of the surrounding fields and forests very large groups of naked victims, in fact, some 1,500 to 2,500 of them.

¹⁵² Piper 2000, p. 139. According to Piper, the exterior measurements of the cottage were 8.34 m × 17.07 m. The interior area, excluding the perimeter walls, was approximately 122 square meters.

4.5. The Cremation Pits at the “Bunkers”

Dragon also became entangled in further contradictions about the cremation pits, beginning with their location. In the Soviet deposition he said:

“500 meters away from Gas Chamber No. 1, there were four pits where the people were burned, [...].” (S5)

“At a distance of 150 meters from Chamber No. 2, there were 6 pits of the exact same size as those [located] at Chamber No. 1.” (S6)

To Judge Sehn, however, he recounted:

“In the vicinity of Bunker 1 there was a small barn and 2 barracks. The pits were located far away [...].” (P3)

“Two wooden shacks were located at a distance of about 30-40 meters from that little house [Bunker 2]. On the other side there were 4 pits, [...].” (P2)

Since the expression “in the vicinity of Bunker 1” in relation to the two barracks corresponds to 500 meters in the Soviet interrogation, it must be inferred that “far away” designated a distance even greater than 500 meters.

In the Soviet interrogation, “Gas Chamber No. 1” was equipped with four cremation pits measuring 30-35m × 7-8 m × 2 m, with a capacity of 7,000-8,000 bodies per day (S5). Gas Chamber No. 2, on the other hand, had six pits, with a capacity of at least 10,000 bodies per day (S6). Dragon goes on to explain that

“In 24 hours, in all 10 pits, an average of no [less than] 17,000-18,000 persons were burned, but on certain occasions the number of persons cremated in 24 hours amounted to 27,000-28,000 persons, arriving by transport from various countries and belonging to various nationalities, especially Jews.” (S6)

These statements are nothing short of delusional. It should be remembered that Dragon refers to the period from the beginning of December 1942 to the beginning of March 1943. According to Czech’s Auschwitz Chronicle, the peak of extermination activity was reached in January 1943, with about 45,000 killed during that month, an average of about 1,450 per day. For Dragon, however, the daily average of the exterminated was 17,000-18,000, with peaks of 27,000-28,000! This means that in the three months of activity of the “bunkers” (early December 1942 through early March 1943, the period covered by Dragon’s “eyewitness testimony”) an average of (17,000 to 18,000 bodies/day × 30 days/month × 3 months =) about 1,530,000 to 1,620,000 Jews were killed and cremated outdoors, but the total number of Jews deported to Auschwitz amounted only to about 97,000.¹⁵³

In the Polish interrogation, Dragon adjusted the number and dimensions of the cremation pits: there were no longer six pits near “Bunker 2” but only four, and they no longer measured 30-35 m × 7-8 m × 2 m, but 30 m × 7 m × 3 m (P2), but he did not dare to repeat the previous absurdities. For “Bunker 1,” he did not even indicate the number of pits, nor did he mention their capacity.

What is more, all his crazy claims about the pit’s capacities are rendered meaningless by this statement of his:

“We emptied the ash pits generally about 48 hours after cremation.” (P4)

This means that the pits were idle for two out of three days, so it makes no sense to talk about daily capacities. It should also be noted that the witness didn’t quite get the cock-and-bull story of human-fat recovery straight (see Mattogno 2021a, pp. 126-129), because he stated, rather puerilely:

“The human fat came from the pits in which people were burned through special channels that went to another small pit, where the fat dripped, which was collected by the SS themselves.” (S6)

According to the common delusional testimonies on this, the task of scooping the boiling fat (and getting broiled in the process) obviously is said to have fallen to the inmates of the Sonderkommando.

4.6. Extermination Technique of “Bunker 1”

4.6.1. Tasks of the Sonderkommando Inmates

The Sonderkommando of “Gas Chamber No. 2,” according to Dragon, was divided up as follows (S3):

- 12 inmates (among them Dragon) removed the bodies from the gas chambers
- 10 inmates carried the corpses to the carts
- 30 inmates loaded the corpses onto the carts
- 20 inmates threw the corpses into the pits
- 28 inmates carried wood to the pits
- 2 inmates removed gold teeth, rings, etc. from the corpses
- 2 inmates cut the hair of the corpses

The total is 104 inmates, but “110-120 people were working at the clearing of Chamber No. 2 and the burning of the corpses” (S6).

According to Dragon, 200 inmates were selected on 10 December 1942 for the Sonderkommando of the “bunkers” (S2), of which precisely 110-120 were assigned to “Gas Chamber No. 2,” so that 80-90 inmates remained for “Bunker 1,” even less than the 104 mentioned above.

Although he had only worked in “Bunker 2,” Dragon strangely described in more detail the removal and cremation of the corpses from “Bunker 1,” although he did not indicate the division of duties in that case. In what follows, I base myself on that of “Gas Chamber No. 2”.

The four (or maybe six) pits were connected to the “bunker” by a narrow-gauge railway on which five cars moved, each carrying 25-30 corpses. The transport (round trip) took about 20 minutes and in 24 hours 7,000-8,000 corpses were cremated (S5).

4.6.2. Corpse Removal from the Gas Chambers

On this point Dragon states:

“The removal of the corpses from the chamber, as I have already explained, was carried out in turn by 12 persons, every 15 minutes [they] removed them in [sets of] 6 persons.” (S5)

“When we declared in spite of this lesson that we could not manage to work like this, he [Moll] divided us up in groups of two.” (P2)

The 12 inmates were divided into two groups of six, who took turns working every 15 minutes, so that there were always six inmates working in the alleged gas chambers; since they worked in pairs, these six inmates transported three corpses at a time. How many transports of corpses were necessary to empty the alleged gas chamber? According to Dragon, the chamber contained 1,500-1,700 people (S5; in the Polish statement “less than 2,000,” P3,6), but within “24 hours, 7,000-8,000 people were burned in the pits” of “Bunker 1” (S5), which corresponds to four gassings of 1,750-2,000 people each.

Assuming the minimum figure of 1,750 per gassing batch, each pair of inmates would have to make $(1,750 \div 3 =) 583$ trips (of three corpses by six inmates). The time indicated by the witness is two to three hours (S5). On the basis of the maximum duration – 3 hours or 180 minutes – one transport would have taken $(180 \div 583 =) 0.31$ minutes, hence about 19 seconds, which also includes the time lost due to the 11 changes of personnel every 15 minutes.

Bunker 1, according to the plan drawn up by Engineer Nosal on the basis of Dragon’s statements, had two gas chambers each with one single door for both entry and exit, accessed via a staircase of 7-8 steps (visible on Nosal’s drawing; see Document 9). However, this does not correspond to Dragon’s description (S4):

“In each of the rooms of Gas Chamber No. 1, there were two doors: through one door, the naked people were brought in, and through the other, the corpses were brought out.”

The fact remains, however, that each room had only one door for removing the bodies, which could be passed through by only one pair of inmates at a time. Therefore, depending on the pace of work, the other two pairs had to queue up to pass through it in turn. Under such conditions, removing a corpse every 19 seconds is a blatant absurdity.

That this is a purely fictitious story is also demonstrated by the fact that the shifts are completely incongruous with the structure of the “bunker”: since the bunker had two rooms, the six detainees who alternated every 15 minutes could not work three to a room, because they worked in pairs; as a result, four worked in one room and two in the other – an inefficient and senseless organization of work.

During the Soviet interrogation, Dragon declared that “clearing of the chamber lasted 2-3 hours” (S5), but in 1993, when asked by Gideon Greif how long it took to carry the corpses out of the house (Greif, p. 136), Dragon replied:

“We worked almost all day long.”

4.6.3. Transporting the Corpses to the Cremation Pits

When the work of clearing the chambers was finished, ten inmates transported the corpses piled up outside the gas chambers next to the carts, presumably also in pairs, so each pair had to move $(7,000 \text{ to } 8,000 \div 5 =) 1,400 \text{ to } 1,600$ corpses per day; it is not known how long that took. Then another 30 inmates loaded the corpses onto the five carts, 25-30 in each, and made the trip to the pits and back in about 20 minutes. Each transport thus comprised a maximum of $(5 \text{ carts} \times 30 \text{ bodies/cart} =) 150$ corpses, and the transport of all the bodies took a total of $(7,000 \text{ to } 8,000 \div 150 =) 46 \text{ to } 53$ trips, or $(46 \text{ to } 53 \text{ trips} \times 20 \text{ min} =) 920\text{-}1,060$ minutes, or 15.3 to 17.7 hours.

How did the carts move? Were they human-powered, or was there a small locomotive? Dragon did not clarify this essential point; fortunately, he did so in his 1993 interview with Gideon Greif. On that occasion, he clearly stated that the carts were pushed by hand by the inmates:

“Another group gathered up bodies and put them on trolleys that ran on a track. Others wheeled the trolleys to the edge of the pits.” (ibid., pp. 137f.)

“We took the bodies from the hut to the pits in carts and threw them in...” (ibid., p. 136)

A self-proclaimed colleague of Dragon, Eliezer Eisenschmidt, who arrived at Auschwitz in a different (Reg. No. 80765) and was also assigned to the Sonderkommando, declared in an interview with Greif, also in 1993 (ibid., p. 223):

“For example, six men pushed the carts that carried the bodies, [...]”

Another self-proclaimed companion in misfortune of Dragon, who according to himself worked at the Sonderkommando of the “bunker,” Maurice Benroubi, outlined the following picture (Pressac 1989, p. 162):

“We marched 200 metres and stopped in a clearing. Two SS officers were there and gave orders to the SS men. Further on about one hundred Sonderkommando men were pushing platforms of 3m by 2m mounted on wheels

[...¹⁵⁴] and on these platforms there were corpses lying one on top of the other. They put them in front of graves about 20m long, 3m wide and 2.50m deep.”

Leaving aside further contradictions (starting with the dimensions of the pits, which for Dragon were 30-35 m × 7-8 m × 2 or 30 m × 7 m × 3 m), it is another fact that Dragon, in his tall tale, forgot precisely the team that must have been assigned to pushing the carts, and also the team that would have been assigned to their unloading, which must have been more or less equal to the team assigned to their loading, i.e., 30 prisoners.

The five carts each contained at least (25 bodies × 60 kg/body¹⁵⁵ =) 1,500 kg of bodies, a total of 7,500 for five carts, plus the weight of the five carts themselves – at least another 2,500 kg,¹⁵⁶ for a total of 10,000 kg or ten metric tons. How many inmates would it have taken to push this load 150 meters? And how long would it have taken? Dragon childishly simplifies these issues, and this is another indication that his account is not about real events.

4.6.4. Fuel Wood for Burning Corpses

Dragon stated that “28 persons to carry wood to the pits to cremate the corpses” (S3), but does not explain either how much wood was needed for each pit, where it was taken from, or how it was transported there.

For the open-air incineration of a corpse of about 60 kg, a minimum quantity of 160 kg of dry wood is assumed¹⁵⁷ (or about 300 kg, if green wood is used).¹⁵⁸ Therefore, for the cremation of the claimed 7,000 to 8,000 daily gassing victims, the wood consumption would have been 1,120,000 to 1,280,000 kg of dry wood and 2,100,000 to 2,400,000 of green wood. It follows that each of the above 28 wood carriers would have had to bring to the pyres from a minimum of (1,120,000 ÷ 28 =) 40 metric tons of wood to a maximum of (2,400,000 ÷ 28 =) about 85.7 metric tons of wood every day. These figures are so enormous that they alone expose Dragon’s tale as completely made up. For example, if somehow each wood-carrying inmate had brought 100 kg of wood to the pits every five minutes (outward journey, loading of wood, transport to the pits, unloading), it would have taken at least (40,000 kg ÷ 100 kg × 5 min =) 2,000 minutes, or over 33 hours per 24-hour day!

¹⁵⁴ Pressac’s comments omitted.

¹⁵⁵ Average weight of a corpse according to Pressac (1989, p. 475) and van Pelt (pp. 470, 472).

¹⁵⁶ The small mining carts intended to be moved by men or horses weighed no more than 2,000 kg when fully loaded; the medium ones had a gross weight of 3,200 kg, and the large ones about 5,000, with a cart weight of 1,400 kg (Martelli, pp. 276, 280). From these data, based on the ratio wagon weight/gross weight, it can be deduced that the smallest wagon weighed about 500 kg and carried 1,500 kg.

¹⁵⁷ See Mattogno/Kues/Graf, pp. 1291f.

¹⁵⁸ Ibid., p. 1296. I assume a calorific value of 3,700 kcal/kg for dry wood and 1,900 kcal/kg for green wood.

4.7. Extermination Technique of “Bunker 2”

According to Dragon’s Soviet deposition, the pits at “Gas Chamber No. 2” had a capacity of 10,000 victims per day. Here, the clearing of the four rooms took “no more than two hours” (S5), because it was carried out through the entrance and exit doors, since “the narrow-gauge railway ran on both sides of Gas Chamber No. 2, next to the doors” (S6). However, in Engineer Nosal’s drawing of “Bunker 2,” the railroad runs past only the exit doors (named “W1-4”; see Document 10).

I already noted earlier that Nosal’s drawings are also incorrect regarding the number of doors of the alleged gas chambers of “Bunker 1,” but Dragon made an explicit reference to this drawing (P3):

“The chamber I described was accurately drawn on the basis of my statements by Engineer Nosal, from Oświęcim. This chamber was called Bunker No. 2.”

The fact that the witness did not notice such gross errors is inexplicable.

The removal of corpses was carried out by the twelve aforementioned inmates who worked alternately (every 15 minutes) in three pairs. This division is also inconclusive, because if there were ten doors for the extraction of corpses (the five exit doors plus the five entrance doors), it would have been rational and efficient to assign 20 inmates to “Bunker 2” working in 10 pairs, one for each door.

The capacity of 10,000 victims per day corresponds to five fully loaded gassing batches of 2,000 people each. Removing the bodies of one gassing took no more than two hours, or 120 minutes. It follows that each pair of inmates had to remove $(2,000 \div 3 =) 667$ bodies within 120 minutes, hence one body in $(120 \div 667 =) 0.20$ minutes or 12 seconds (or $(667 \div 120 =) 5.5$ bodies per minute), including seven breaks for shift changes.

After that, five pairs of inmates had to transport the 10,000 daily corpses to the carts, and another five pairs had to load them onto the carts. However, since the narrow-gauge railway passed in front of the exit doors of the gas chambers, the corpses would be piled up in the space between, as is clear from Engineer Nosal’s drawing mentioned earlier. In practice, the unit of ten inmates in charge of transporting the corpses to the carts would have been completely useless, as the carts are said to have stopped right in front of the doors. Only the unit of loaders of the carts would have been necessary.

The six cremation pits were located 150 meters away from the “bunker.” A narrow-gauge railway with 7-8 carts ran from the one to the other (S5f.), which must be assumed to be the same as those of “Gas Chamber No. 1.” If there were eight carts, since the largest gas chamber had a floor area almost equal to that of the other three combined (48 versus 52 square meters), even the least-capable work organizer would have placed four wagons in front of Door W1, two in front of Door W2 and one each in front of Doors W3 and W4, and then put them together in a single convoy, once the loading was finished.

These eight carts would have had a maximum load of $(25 \text{ bodies/carts} \times 8 \text{ carts} =) 200$ corpses at a time, equivalent to $(200 \text{ bodies} \times 60 \text{ kg/body} =) 12,000 \text{ kg}$, plus another 4,000 kg for the carts, as explained earlier, for a total of 16 metric tons. The transport of 10,000 corpses therefore required $(10,000 \div 200 =) 50$ fully loaded trips of 150 meters, and as many empty return trips, pushing 16 metric tons on the outward trip and four tons on the return trip.

As I noted earlier, Dragon forgot the unit who had to push the carts, and also the one who had to unload them near the pits.

How many inmates would have been needed to push these 16-ton trains (loaded) or 4-ton trains (empty)? And how long would the entire operation have taken?

I noted already earlier that the breakdown of the work assigned to the inmates of the Sonderkommando shows 104 people, while the total group is said to have amounted to 110-120. It follows that for this job, undoubtedly the most-difficult and -strenuous, somewhere between 6 and 16 inmates remained available. According to the maximum figure, 16 inmates would have had to push eight carts weighing a total of 16 tons over a distance of 150 meters, which is equivalent to two metric tons for each pair of inmates. – A decidedly impossible feat.

In his Polish deposition, the witness inexplicably reduced the number of “dentist” and “barber” inmates from two to one (P2). When considering the organization of labor, only a demented person would have planned to have only two barbers cut the hair off the bodies of the $(10,000 \times 40\% =) 4,000$ gassed women, and only two dentists check the mouths of the $(10,000 \times 80\% =) 8,000$ adult corpses to locate and extract any gold teeth.¹⁵⁹

4.8. “Bunker 2” in 1944

Dragon also made contradictory statements regarding the activity at “Bunker 2” in 1944:

“After the construction of the crematorium called No. 2 in Brzezinka, the barracks at Bunker No. 2 were dismantled, and the pits were filled in. The bunker itself was maintained until the end, and after a very long pause, it was used again for the gassing of the Hungarian Jews. Then new barracks were built and [more] pits were dug. At that time, they worked in two shifts in this bunker, meaning day and night. I myself worked there, I think, two days.” (P5)

“However, since [more and] more Hungarian Jews were arriving by transport, Bunker No. 2 was put back into operation, and people were gassed and burned

there. I do not know how many people were burned every day in this bunker, because during the period in which the Hungarian Jews were cremated there, I was not working in Bunker No. 2.” (P9)

“I calculate the number of those gassed in the two bunkers and four crematoria at over 4 million. This was also the opinion of the other prisoners employed in the Sonderkommando.” (P10)

In summary, the witness did not work in “Bunker 2” during the alleged gassing of the Hungarian Jews, but at the same time worked there for maybe two days. He did not know the daily number of victims of this installation in 1944, but he could “calculate” the total number of victims including those of the two “bunkers” at 4 million!

Dragon specified (P9):

“Both the Sonderkommando working in Crematorium V and the Sonderkommando working in Bunker No. 2 worked in two shifts: day and night. This work lasted for the months of May and June.”

But the day before, he stated that this intensive work in two shifts had lasted not two, but three months (P7):

“During the period when the Hungarian transports arrived, we worked at Crematorium V in two shifts. The day shift from 6:30 am to 6:30 pm, the night shift from 6:30 pm to 6:30 am the next day. This work lasted 3 months.”

In further contradiction to this, he claimed in his Soviet deposition that the culmination of the simultaneous extermination in all crematoria and pits allegedly took place “In May, June, July and August 1944,” hence for 4 months (S8).

The fact that Dragon, in 1944, had never worked at “Bunker 2” (or had worked there maybe for two days) is no excuse for his confusion or ignorance in this regard, because, as I pointed out earlier, although he had never worked at all at “Bunker 1,” that didn’t stop him from describing it in great detail.

4.9. Crematoria IV and V

4.9.1. Dragon’s Activity at Crematoria IV and V

At the end of May 1944, Dragon was transferred with the entire Sonderkommando from Block 11 of Camp Sector BIId to Crematorium IV, where he was in charge of loading the muffles (“I, and together with me 4 other persons, carried /introduced/ the corpses into the cremation furnaces”; S6).

In this regard, however, the witness made conflicting statements (P6):

“I worked at Crematorium No. V. until May 1944, [when] we were assigned to work in the gardens, to split wood, to transport coke, because at that time the furnaces of Crematorium No. V were not yet in operation. This crematorium was not put into operation until May 1944, when transports of Hungarian Jews began to arrive.”

Hence, if he was transferred to Crematorium IV at the end of May 1944, how could he work at Crematorium V until May 1944? The witness also said that “[a]round July or August 1944, Crematorium No. 4 did not work [anymore], due to a failure of the chimneys” (S7f.), but then he forgot about it again, because shortly thereafter he declared (S8f.):

“In May, June, July and August 1944, the cremation of corpses was carried out simultaneously in all crematoria and on the pyres in the pits, because every day there was a great influx of people – 5-7 transports. In these months, all transports arrived from Hungary. The furnaces of the crematoria alone could not cremate the people gassed in the gas chambers.”

For Tauber, on the other hand, Crematorium IV did not have any failures (P27):

“Since it was felt that the pits were better suited for cremating corpses, the crematoria were closed down when cremations in the pits began. First, Crematorium IV was shut down, I think in June 1944, then in October 1944, I think, Crematoria II and III.”

4.9.2. Cremation Pits Nearby

Regarding the cremation pits at Crematorium V, Dragon stated in his Polish deposition:

“This work lasted 3 months. However, as the crematoria were not very productive, pits were dug next to Crematorium V for the cremation of the gassed Hungarians. There were 3 larger and 2 smaller pits. The burning process in the pits at Crematorium V was the same as at Bunkers 1 and 2.” (P7)

“Eventually, the Hungarian Jews were burned in pits dug for this purpose at the building of Crematorium No. V. Five pits were dug there, 25 meters long, 6 meters wide and 3 meters deep. About 5,000 people were burned in the pits every day.” (P9)

So, were the pits all the same size, or were they different?

The four pits near “Bunker 1” measured 30-35 m in length, 7-8 m in width, were 2 m deep, and had a daily capacity of 7,000-8,000 bodies. Assuming the highest values, this results in pits of $35\text{ m} \times 8\text{ m} \times 2\text{ m} = 560$ cubic meters with a capacity of 2,000 bodies per day each.

The five pits at Crematorium 5 had a capacity of 1,000 bodies per day each, and a volume of $(25\text{ m} \times 6\text{ m} \times 3\text{ m} =) 450$ cubic meters, equivalent to 80% of those at “Bunker 1”. Their capacity should therefore have been $(2,000\text{ bodies/day} \times 0.8 =) 1,600$ bodies per day, instead, incomprehensibly, it was 1,000.

4.9.3. Number and Capacities/Dimensions of the Gas Chambers

At the time of the Soviet interrogation, Dragon only knew of three gas chambers in Crematoria IV and V (S12), but he told Judge Sehn (P6):

“At first, there were 3 gas chambers, but later a fourth was installed. The first could hold 1,500, the second 800, the third 600, and the fourth 150 people.”

Hence a total capacity of 3,050 persons.

According to this building’s Construction Plan 2036 of 11 January 1943 (Pressac 1989, p. 399), the rooms in question had the following dimensions:

- 1. 12.35 m × 7.72 m = 95.3 m²
- 2. 11.69 m × 8.40 m = 98.2 m²
- 3. 11.69 m × 3.70 m = 43.2 m²

Room 3 is then said to have been divided lengthwise into two unequal parts, the dimensions of which are unknown (Piper 2000, p. 162).

Since the total area of the alleged gas chambers was about 236.7 m², this results in a victim density of about 13 persons per square meter (to be exact: 12.88/m²). The following contradictory values can be derived from the claimed capacities given by Dragon for each of the chambers:

	Area	Claimed Capacity	Claimed Density	Capacity at 13/m ²	Claimed % Capacity	% Area
Room 1	95.3	1,500	16	1,228	49.2	40.3
Room 2	98.2	800	8	1,265	26.2	41.5
Room 3	43.2	750	17	557	24.6	18.2
Totals	236.7	3,050		3,050	100	100

The division of the capacity of the gas chambers is clearly nonsensical: the resulting density is about 13 people per square meter, but multiplying this value by the real area of the individual rooms, you get three different densities of 16, 8 and 17 people per square meter. If one then multiplies Dragon’s density by the real floor area of the rooms, one obtains three results in open contrast with those given by him regarding capacity: 1,228, 1,265 and 557 persons. Finally, if one calculates the ratio between partial and total capacity, one obtains percentages corresponding to the floor areas of the individual rooms (e.g. 1,500 ÷ 3,050 = 49.2%) which are different than those resulting from the ratio between the floor areas of the individual rooms and the total floor area (e.g. 95.3 m² ÷ 236.7 m² = 40.2%). Therefore, we are not dealing with real data here, but with ill-conceived fabrications.

This is also confirmed by the fact that the density of victims in the “bunkers” (of 80 m² and 100 m², respectively) was 19-21/m² for “Bunker 1” (1,500-1,700 persons) and 20/m² for “Bunker 2” (2,000 persons) according to Dragon’s Soviet deposition, but 20-25/m² (2,000 to 2,500-2,550 persons) according to his Polish statement.

4.9.4. Impossible Gassing Technique

In another study, I documented that the gassing technique allegedly used in Crematorium IV and V as described by Tauber, Dragon and also Jankowski is impossible, because both Tauber and Dragon mentioned the actual grates that protected the small windows allegedly used to introduce Zyklon B, which made it impossible to stick a Zyklon-B can through that opening in order to pour its contents into the gas chamber (see Mattogno 2021a, pp. 170-179). Oddly enough, here the two witnesses used almost the same words. Tauber (S6):

“In order to pour the ‘Zyklon’ into the chamber, there were hatches with grilles in the walls at a height of approximately two meters, which could be closed hermetically with shutters.”

Dragon (S12):

“In order to pour the Zyklon, on the outer walls of the gas chambers, at a height of about 2 meters, were arranged hatches with grilles, which could be closed hermetically with covers.”

Here I will refer to Jean-Claude Pressac’s assessment on the claimed gassing technique in Crematoria IV and V, which he expressed already in 1982 (1982, p. 125):

“Industrially [= for mass extermination purposes], the course of operations is aberrant.”

He attributed this aberration to the fact that Crematoria IV and V had not been conceived as criminal instruments, but had been “transformed to this end” (ibid., p. 126). This implies, however, that the SS technicians of the Central Construction Office must have been complete idiots, completely incapable of finding an efficient and rational solution to this alleged transformation, starting with the basic and essential device: a mechanical ventilation system. Indeed, both Tauber and Dragon agreed on its absence. Tauber (S7):

“Furthermore, in the gas chambers of Crematoria Nos. 4 and 5, there was no ventilation [system], so the ventilation of the chambers was carried out by opening doors and small windows.”

Dragon (S12):

“Furthermore, in the gas chambers of Crematoria Nos. 4-5, there was no ventilation [system], so the ventilation of the chambers was done by opening the doors and [window] openings.”

Without these devices, the passive ventilation of the alleged gas chambers through the three doors and seven exterior windows would have required days (Mattogno 2019, pp. 154-156), making continuous gassings impossible.

The aberration noted by Pressac was thus the inevitable fruit of the aberrant fantasies of these self-proclaimed eyewitnesses.

4.9.5. Cremation Capacity

The cremation capacity of the 8-muffle furnace of Crematorium IV/V asserted by Dragon is in disagreement with that indicated by Tauber, who in this regard stated:

“In each crematorium, there was an 8-muffle furnace. 4-5 persons were introduced into each muffle. The duration of cremation was 35 minutes. One furnace cremated 1,200-1,500 people per day.” (S6)

This corresponds on average to $(8 \text{ muffles} \times 4.5 \text{ bodies/Muffle} \times 21 \text{ hrs} \times 60 \text{ min/hr} \div 35 \text{ min} \approx)$ about 1,300 bodies per day. Dragon instead said:

“These two crematoria had 4 furnaces on two sides. Three corpses were placed in each furnace.” (P6) “The cremation took 15-20 minutes.” (P7)

This results in an average capacity of $(8 \text{ muffles} \times 3 \text{ bodies/muffle} \times 21 \text{ hrs} \times 60 \text{ min/hr} \div 17.5 \text{ min} \approx)$ approximately 1,730 bodies per day.

According to Dragon, the four crematoria at Birkenau could cremate 10,000-12,000 corpses per day (S7) – which is simple nonsense, arithmetically based on the equally insane starting figures of 3-5 corpses cremated in one muffle within 15-20 minutes (rather than one corpse per muffle per hour) – plus another 5,000 in the cremation pits at Crematorium V (P9). The total capacity of these facilities was therefore 15,000 to 17,000 bodies – sheer madness.

4.9.6. Furnace Loading System

In Soviet interrogation, Dragon stated (S6):

“The corpses were brought into the furnace on iron stretchers which were placed on frames. On a stretcher, we put 3 and 2 corpses at a time. In each furnace [=muffle], 5 corpses were introduced. The corpses were put into the furnace [=muffle] from the iron stretchers by means of special hooks, after which the stretchers were pulled out.”

This means that two immediately consecutive loading procedures were carried out, one with three corpses, the other with two more. Based on the same duration of 15-20 minutes, the cremation capacity of Crematoria IV/V would have increased to about 3,300 corpses per day.

In his Polish deposition, Dragon gave further explanations about the system of introducing corpses into the muffles (P7):

“We placed the corpses on the stretchers in this way: when the first one lay with its head forward, we placed the second one with its head back. In each furnace we loaded three corpses. When we loaded the third corpse, those [the two corpses] introduced earlier were already burning. I saw that the arms of these corpses were raised, then the legs were raised. Besides, we were proceeding very quickly, and I could not accurately observe the entire burning process. We had to hurry, because if the extremities of these already burning corpses rose strongly, we had difficulties getting the third corpse into the furnace [=muffle]. We used the stretchers in this way: two inmates lifted the stretcher, one by the end farther from the furnace, the other by the end that entered the furnace first. After the stretcher was introduced, one of the inmates held the corpse in place with a long poker, we called it a hoe, forked at the end, and two other [inmates] pulled the stretcher out from underneath the corpse. After loading the furnace, we closed the door and loaded the next furnace.”

Here the witness spoke equally of two instantly successive loading procedures, but the first load had only two bodies instead of three, while the second had only one instead of two.

The technique of introducing the stretcher into the muffle described by Dragon is impractical, because according to him two inmates lifted the stretcher, one near the furnace (Inmate A) and the other at the stretcher's end farther from the muffle (Inmate B). However, while there was a convenient handle for lifting and pushing the stretcher at its end, consisting of two double-bent tubes, the two front ends of the tubes had to be placed directly on the two guide rollers, an operation impossible for a single person standing at a blazing-hot muffle of 800°C. As Tauber correctly explained, this could only be done by placing an iron rod or a wooden batten underneath the front of the stretcher, which was grasped at its ends by two inmates from both sides, who could then, at an adequate distance from the open muffle door, place the two free ends of the stretcher tubes on the rollers.

The procedure described by Dragon was instead carried out with three inmates: Inmate A, after having placed – we do not know how – the stretcher on the rollers, remained idle and could have helped Inmate B to push the stretcher into the muffle; then a third Inmate C held the corpses in place with a poker, and the other two pulled the stretcher out of the muffle. Dragon does not explain why the team introducing the corpses was composed of five inmates.

4.9.7. The Sonderkommando

Regarding the Sonderkommando, Dragon's statements present not-insignificant contradictions to those of Tauber.

The Sonderkommando established on 10 December 1942 consisted of 200 inmates in total (S2), of which 110-120 were assigned to “Bunker 2” (S6), the remaining 80-90 to “Bunker 1”. This number remained unchanged until March-April 1943, when the two “bunkers” ceased operation. It is true that Dragon states that the initial Sonderkommando “within a short period of time grew to 400” (P10), but he specified that “[i]n 1943, 200 Greeks [...] were assigned to our Sonderkommando” (P11), which brought the total to 400 inmates. However, the first Jewish transport from Greece arrived at Auschwitz on 20 March 1943 (Czech 1990, p. 356). Tauber, on the other hand, states that “in mid-March 1943,” when the first gassing took place in Crematorium II, “the work was taken over by another shift of the Sonderkommando, which at that time also operated the two bunkers [and] numbered about 400 inmates” (P17f.). But the Sonderkommando in question was Dragon’s, which consisted of 200 people, since any Greeks could have been added to this squad only on 20 March at the earliest.

According to Tauber, the Sonderkommando numbered 1,000 men in May 1944, who were distributed as follows (S10):

- Crematorium 2: 120 men, 60 men each shift
- Crematorium 3: 120 men (60 men each shift)
- Crematorium 4: 60 men
- Crematorium 5: 300 men
- “Separate Gas Chamber No. 2” (“Bunker 2”) and pyres next to it: 300 men

It follows that, according to Dragon, for the extermination of 17,000-18,000 people per day in the two “bunkers” in 1942/early 1943, 200 men of the Sonderkommando were sufficient, but for Tauber, “Bunker 2” alone required 300, although Franciszek Piper claims that “only” 5,000 corpses were cremated per day in the purported pits of this “bunker” (Piper 1994, p. 173).

Another relevant contradiction concerns the dating of the alleged gassing in Auschwitz of 200 men of the Sonderkommando. Tauber (S11):

“In August 1944, the Germans exterminated 200 men in one fell swoop. They were all killed in the Auschwitz I Camp, in a disinfection chamber.”

Dragon (P11):

“In October 1944, 500 inmates were shot, specifically 400 in the courtyard of Crematorium No. IV, and 100 in the field next to Crematorium No. II. This same month, Moll selected about 200 inmates of the Sonderkommando, who were taken to Oświęcim and, as we were later informed by the inmates employed in Kanada [warehouse], were gassed in the chamber used for fumigating items in the ‘Kanada’ warehouse.”

This contradiction is absolutely inexplicable, because here the pivotal event is the Sonderkommando revolt of 7 October 1944, according to which the two witnesses could have dated the alleged event easily in terms of “before” or “after”.

Tauber told the Jewish Historical Commission other fairy tales: in the course of said revolt (which he dated to September 1944), 40 SS soldiers and 800 Sonderkommando inmates were allegedly killed, and a crematorium “was blown up” – grossly false statements even from the orthodox perspective.

Dragon also got entangled in other contradictions regarding the Sonderkommando’s quarters:

“In September or August [sic] 1944 – I do not remember exactly – the management of the crematorium – I do not know how – learned about the preparation of the uprising, and transferred the entire Sonderkommando to Crematorium No. 4, where they stayed for one month.” (S8)

“Gradowski was shot in October 1944 during the uprising. Back then, 500 inmates of the Sonderkommando, which at that time numbered 700 inmates, were shot. 100 of them slept in Crematorium No. II, another 100 in Crematorium No. III, and 500 in Crematorium No. IV.” (P10)

“At the end of May 1944, I was transferred together with the entire Sonderkommando from Block 11 of Sector BIIId to Crematorium No. IV, where I stayed until October 1944. As I stated earlier, in October 1944, approximately 700 inmates of the Sonderkommando were housed in this crematorium.” (P11)

The entire Sonderkommando was therefore transferred to Crematorium IV in August-September, and at the same time at the end of May 1944, and the inmates housed there were 700 and at the same time 500.

To these contradictions, Dragon adds in reference to the Sonderkommando revolt:

“I hid under a pile of wood, and Tauber in the chimney ducts of Crematorium No. V.” (P12)

However, that crematorium’s chimney duct had no access port, so no one could have entered it ever. This is a colossal nonsense that Tauber had the decency not to repeat, but which Filip Müller later made his own (see Mattoigno 2021a, pp. 52-54).

4.10. The Extermination of the Hungarian Jews and “Bunker 2”

Dragon asserted (S7):

“Gas Chamber No. 2 operated mainly when 6-7 transports of people arrived, then the corpses were cremated also on the pyres, and not just in the crematoria.”

During May, June, July and August 1944, “every day there was a great influx of people – 5-7 transports” of Hungarian Jews (S8f.), and in addition to the claimed cremation capacity of the crematoria and the pits near Crematorium V (15,000 to 17,000 bodies per day), we would have to add the capacity of the pits near “Bunker 2,” although Dragon does not state what their capacity was in 1944 (for 1942, he claimed a capacity of “at least 10,000 people” per day; S6).

In 1944, 437,402 Jews were deported in 147 trains out of Hungary, so each transport contained on average 2,975 persons (NG-5615; T-1166), in round figures 3,000. But according to Dragon’s statements, in May, June, July and August 1944, an average of six transports of Hungarian Jews arrived at Auschwitz every day, meaning $(6 \text{ trains} \times 3,000 \text{ inmates/train} \times 30 \text{ days/month} \times 4 \text{ months}) = 2,160,000$ people!

I have documented in a separate study that a maximum of 398,400 Hungarian Jews were deported to Auschwitz; the most-likely figure, however, is around 321,000, since 107,000 registered inmates who transferred through the Birkenau Transit Camp constituted approximately 1/3 of the total (Mattogno 2007). In the period of the most-intensive deportation (from 16 May to 7 June 1944), an average of four transports per day departed from Hungary (the number that had been agreed upon at the transport conference at the beginning of May 1944; Braham, pp. 156f.), which amounts to some 12,600 persons per day.¹⁶⁰ Hence, if we apply Dragon's claim that "Bunker 2" was mainly used when 6-7 transports arrived (S7), it follows that it was basically never used. It should also be considered that, since on average a third of all deportees were fit for labor, 2/3 of these 12,600 arriving deportees, or 8,400, would have been slated for gassing, so that, from Dragon's crazy perspective, the crematoria were more than sufficient to do the job even at the most-extreme peak of the deportation of the Hungarian Jews. Therefore, there was no need at all for the cremation pits at Crematorium V either.

To these enormities the witness adds another (P9):

"This work lasted for the months of May and June. Based on my observations, I calculate that approximately 300,000 Hungarian Jews were cremated in Crematorium No. V during these two months."

This means that the Hungarian Jews were allegedly exterminated in Crematorium V alone, at a rate of $(300,000 \div 60 =)$ approximately 5,000 per day, the equivalent of the claimed capacity of the cremation pits near Crematorium V, without any need of having to use the crematorium's furnaces. Moreover, since this was by far the largest alleged extermination operation, it blatantly refutes the tall tale of 6-7 transports per day and 15,000-17,000 gassing victims/cremated bodies daily (without "Bunker 2"). If in fact these 300,000 Hungarian Jews were gassed and cremated within two months in Crematorium V, which Jews were gassed and cremated in Crematoria II, III and IV (in the period June-July, because in July-August Crematorium V is said to have gone out of use) for the two – or three – or four months of maximum extermination with 15,000-17,000 victims per day? And if the SS could have done without even the furnaces of Crematorium V, how is it possible that the crematoria's furnaces were unable to cope with the load, as the witness claimed in his Soviet deposition (S9):

"The furnaces of the crematoria alone could not cremate the people gassed in the gas chambers. At each crematorium, there were storerooms where the bodies were put that could not be cremated on the gassing day."

In addition to this, Dragon mentions only one other alleged extermination involving all four crematoria, which took place in 1943 and concerned 70,000

¹⁶⁰ The number of deportees was 289,357 in 92 trains, on average about 3,150 in each train.

Greek Jews. However, only 48,533 Greek Jews were deported to Auschwitz, of whom 11,147 were registered there.¹⁶¹

4.11. Crematoria II and III

4.11.1. One Single Gas Chamber or Two?

Dragon claims to have worked in Crematoria IV and V, and also served in Crematorium II “at one of the furnaces for about 5-10 days” (S8), which he decisively denied in front of Judge Sehn (P10):

“I did not participate in the gassing and cremation of people in Crematoria Nos. II and III.”

His statements regarding these two facilities are at odds with Tauber’s claims on points that are certainly not insignificant, beginning with the division of the alleged gas chamber into two rooms. Tauber (P9):

“At the end of 1943, the gas chamber was divided in two by a masonry wall, so that it was suitable for gassing smaller transports.”

Dragon (S10):

“In each of Crematoria Nos. 2 and 3, there was one gas chamber which was located in one of the underground rooms of the crematorium, and was about 30 meters long.”

4.11.2. Portable Coke Heaters

Another stroke of witness creativity is Dragon’s idea of portable coke heaters allegedly used in the “gas chambers” (S11):

“If necessary, the gas chambers were heated with transportable coke burners.”

He does not explain the necessity or advisability of this heating, which is obviously to be seen in the context of the evaporation of hydrogen cyanide from the Zyklon B’s gypsum pellets. The boiling point of hydrogen cyanide is known to be at about 26°C. The coke heaters therefore presumably served to promote this evaporation. However, the body of an adult emits 1.5 kcal of heat per hour and kg of body weight,¹⁶² hence 3,000¹⁶³ bodies of an average weight of 60 kg would have produced $(3,000 \times 60 \text{ kg} \times 1.5 \text{ kcal/hr/kg} =) 270,000$ kcal/hr, or 4,500 kcal/min. The heat of vaporization of hydrogen cyanide is 0.2464 kcal/g at 0°C (Peters, p. 56), so the heat needed to evaporate the hydrogen cyanide contained in four 1.5-kg cans of Zyklon B¹⁶⁴ is (0.2464 kcal/g × 6,000 g =) about 1,500 kcal. In any case, the heat produced by the bodies of the victims allegedly crammed into these chambers would have made heating or preheating of the alleged gas chamber unnecessary, even in winter.¹⁶⁵

¹⁶³ The number specifically stated by Tauber for the daily capacity (S6), which would be the chamber capacity if assuming one gassing per day.

In this regard, Dragon stated in general (P5):

“In the chamber, after the opening, it was very hot, and you could feel the gas; it was suffocating, and it was sweet in the mouth, pleasant.”

Since Dragon had received a gas mask since his first day of service in “Bunker 2” (“All 12 of us were fitted with [gas] masks and led to the door of the cottage”; P2), the reference to the taste of Zyklon B does not make sense and possibly relates to its odor. However, as Germar Rudolf points out, hydrogen cyanide has a very-faint odor, and only improperly does the specialist literature mention the odor of bitter almonds (Rudolf, p. 231), which in any case can hardly be described as “sweet” or “pleasant.”

On the other hand, if the camp authorities had actually set up these heaters, they would have realized immediately that the carbon monoxide produced by these heaters would have exterminated all the victims in a time frame more or less equal to that attributed to Zyklon B,¹⁶⁶ but without the need of using hydrogen cyanide. Lethal domestic accidents due to coke-heater emissions, at a time when all homes were heated primarily with wood or coal stoves and coke heaters (also called braziers), were in fact much more frequent than they are today.

Tauber disagrees, by the way, that there were any heating devices used in the “gas chambers” (P3):

“These corpses were frozen; we had to separate them from each other with axes.”

4.12. Extermination at the Crematoria

4.12.1. Cremation Capacity

The cremation capacity of the Birkenau crematoria indicated by Dragon is insane: 10,000-12,000 corpses per day. I have already explained earlier that the maximum capacity of these plants was 1,120 corpses per day (in 21 hours), at the rate of one body per muffle in one hour (a duration that would be reduced to just over 50 minutes for the possible presence of children’s bodies). On the other hand, the witness affirms that in each muffle five corpses were loaded together (S6), or only three (P6), which burned in 15-20 minutes (P7). From these data we get a minimum capacity of (3 corpses in 20 minutes in 46 muffles \Rightarrow 9,936 and a maximum of (5 corpses in 15 minutes in 46 muffles \Rightarrow 22,080. Considering instead three corpses in each muffle in 15 minutes, a capacity of 13,248 results.

¹⁶⁴ I assume the introduction into the alleged gas chamber of four large cans of Zyklon B, each containing 1.5 kg of hydrogen cyanide.

¹⁶⁵ I refer in particular to Pressac’s fanciful conjectures on the “hot-air-supply unit.” See Mattogno 2019, pp. 104-113.

¹⁶⁶ A CO (carbon-monoxide) concentration of 1/1000% (0.001%) can cause severe and even lethal intoxication; one of 1/500% (0.002%) can cause death in four to five hours, one of 1/20% (0.05%) can be lethal within 15 minutes; Bour/Ledingham, p. 3.

Regarding Crematoria IV and V, Dragon speaks explicitly of three corpses in each muffle in 15-20 minutes, which corresponds to 1,728 to 2,304 corpses per day, on average about 2,000, or 4,000 for both crematoria together.

Thus, the capacity of Crematoria II/III must have been (10,000 to 12,000 – 4,000 \Rightarrow) six to eight thousand corpses per day, or three to four thousand per crematorium. These figures are at odds with those resulting from his other data, though: between 9,936 to 22,080 for both facilities, or 4,968 to 11,040 for each.

However, all these figures have one thing in common: they are technically absurd.

4.12.2. The Distribution of Duties of the Sonderkommando Inmates

The distribution of inmates working on various claimed tasks in Crematoria II and III indicated by Dragon is practically identical to that cited by Tauber, i.e., 2 shifts of 60 inmates each made up as follows (S13f.):

- 15 inmates assigned to the undressing room
- 15 inmates to clear the chamber and transport the bodies to the freight elevator
- 2 inmates to load the freight elevator
- 4 inmates as “barbers”
- 2 inmates as “dentists”
- 2 inmates to operate the furnaces’ gas generators
- 2 inmates to operate the freight elevator
- 2 inmates to unload the freight elevator
- 2 inmates to transport the corpses to the furnaces
- 10 inmates, divided into two groups of five, to load the furnace muffles
- 4 inmates assisting the guard/overseer

In the Soviet statement, Tauber stated that “[i]n the gassing hall” – Morgue 1 of Crematoria II and III, which had an area of 210 m² – “4,000 people were gassed at a time” (S4) and that the average number of gassed people was 3,000 per day (S6). The density of the victims was therefore about 19 and 14 people per square meter, respectively.

Dragon did not provide any figures, but in the Soviet deposition he stated that “Bunker 1” had a total area of 80 square meters, and that between 1,500 and 1,700 people were crammed into this space (S5), which amounts to roughly 19 to 22 people per square meter. In his Polish deposition, he mentioned “less than 2,000” persons (P3,6), which corresponds to a density of “less than”

25 persons per square meter. “Bunker 2” had a total area of 100 square meters and could accommodate 2,000 persons according to Dragon’s Soviet deposition (S5), yet up to 2,550 people according to his Polish deposition (P3). This also results in a density of 20-25 persons per square meter. To reach similar absurdly high densities in the alleged gas chambers of Crematoria II and III, a minimum load of approximately 4,000 persons in them would have to be assumed indeed (thus reaching some 19 people per square meter in them).

The density of 14 persons per square meter (a load of 3,000 persons in Morgue 1) is clearly already a borderline case and perhaps already beyond what would have been physically possible. But we will stick to Dragon’s script here in order to show other absurdities resulting from it.

In general, as far as the breakdown of victims is concerned, one can consider 20% children, 40% men and 40% women.¹⁶⁷ This means that four barbers had to cut the hair of 1,200 dead women, each barber 300 women, and that 2 dentists had to check the mouths of 2,400 adult corpses, 1,200 each, and extract any gold teeth present. If we assume an extremely tight average time of 15 seconds per inspection/extraction, the operation would have taken ($15 \text{ sec} \times 1,200 =$) 18,888 seconds, or five hours.

In addition, two inmates would have had to load 3,000 corpses onto the freight elevator and another two would have had to unload them upstairs. This means 1,500 corpses per inmate, for a total weight of ($1,500 \times 60 \text{ kg} =$) 90,000 kg or 90 metric tons. What I noted earlier in relation to Tauber’s statements applies here as well.

Finally, two inmates were to transport 3,000 corpses from the freight elevator to the furnaces, each of them 1,500 corpses. The method was very primitive: the corpses were dragged across the floor of the furnace room by hooking their necks with the bent end of a walking cane or a strap wrapped around a wrist:¹⁶⁸ 1,500 drags with this ridiculous system! How long would it have taken? The furnace room of Crematorium II/III was 30 meters long, and the five triple-muffle furnaces were arranged next to each other. From the exit of the elevator, the nearest furnace was just over a meter away, the furthest one about 25 meters. Thus, on average, each inmate had to drag a corpse 12.5 meters, and then return to the freight elevator – 1,500 times in succession. If we assume an optimistic average speed of 1 meter per second, each drag (round trip) would have taken 25 seconds, the entire operation ($25 \text{ sec} \times 1,500 =$) 37,500 seconds or over ten hours.

¹⁶⁷ For the children, I rely on Kubica, pp. 288f., who states that about 232,000 children were deported to Auschwitz, about 22,000 of whom were registered; given that the orthodoxy’s total Auschwitz dead toll currently stands at 1,100,000 (Piper 1993, p. 202), the number of children allegedly gassed (210,000) is about 20% of the total. As far as I know, no data on the number of men and women deported to Auschwitz exists. The percentages I give are taken from transports from France, Belgium and the Netherlands where list of the deportees’ names have been preserved (Klarsfeld; Klarsfeld/Steinberg; Het Nederlandse... 1948 & 1953).

¹⁶⁸ For the cane technique, see, e.g., Paisikovic, in: Mattogno 2021a, pp. 136, 145; for the strap technique, see, e.g., Müller, p. 117; Nyiszli, in: Mattogno 2020b, p. 41.

As noted earlier, Dragon's claim makes no sense that only two teams of five inmates were assigned to loading the furnaces, because at the cremation pace claimed, they could have served only two furnaces (six muffles), and five teams would have been needed for the five furnaces in the crematorium.

Nor does it make sense to assign only two inmates to operate the furnaces' gas generators, because each furnace had two gas generators, which therefore totaled ten, and each gas generator had to be constantly supervised throughout the cremation process, loading the coke, increasing or reducing the flow of combustion air through the appropriate doors, and adjusting the smoke damper according to the combustion process.

Regarding cremations in Crematoria II and III, Dragon says nothing.

4.13. Salmen Gradowski and the Buried Manuscripts

Both during the Soviet and the Polish interrogations, Dragon spoke extensively about Salmen Gradowski. In order to fully understand his statements, a brief introduction is necessary. Gradowski was an alleged member of the Sonderkommando to whom are attributed three writings, compiled in 1944, which are said to have been found at the end of the war. According to the orthodox narrative, on 5 March 1945, the Soviets found in the area of Birkenau Crematorium II an aluminum canteen containing a notebook and a letter in Yiddish. It was taken to the Military-Medical Museum in Leningrad. Also in March 1945, an anonymous Pole sold to Haim Wolnerman a manuscript in Yiddish that he claimed to have found in a tin can in the area of the Birkenau crematoria. (Mattoigno 2021, pp. 248, 250).

In his Soviet deposition, Dragon asserted (S10):

"Among the 500 Sonderkommando men shot was a Jew from the town of Lunna, Gradowski, who unbeknownst to the SS kept [a notebook with] a record of the transports with the people who arrived and were burned.

In the last months before the Sonderkommando set fire to Crematorium No. 4, Gradowski, fearing that someone from the Sonderkommando would discover the writings [he had] always with him, began to hide the writings underground so that they would be preserved. To me personally, Gradowski handed over some of his writings, which he put inside a German canteen, to hide them, which I buried in the ground; I can point to this place. This was in October or September 1944. I also know where the grenades were buried that were made by the Sonderkommando groups that had prepared the uprising and the escape. I can point to this place."

And here is the account he gave to Judge Sehn (P10):

“I calculate the number of those gassed in the two bunkers and four crematoria at over 4 million. This was also the opinion of the other prisoners employed in the Sonderkommando. The Schreiber [scribe] of our commando, Sauman [Salmen] Gradowski, a native of Grodno, wrote some notes, in which, based on the information provided by the inmates working in all the crematoria, he wrote down the number of persons gassed and burned in the individual crematoria and described what the prisoners of the Sonderkommando had gone through. Gradowski was shot in October 1944 during the uprising. Back then, 500 inmates of the Sonderkommando, which at that time numbered 700 inmates, were shot. 100 of them slept in Crematorium No. II, another 100 in Crematorium No. III, and 500 in Crematorium No. IV. The diaries of this Gradowski, which were buried in the barbed-wire-fenced area of Crematorium II, I dug up [myself] and handed them over to the Soviet commission. They were a notebook and a letter addressed to the unknown finder. By order of the Soviet Commission, all the writings found, which had been written in Hebrew, were translated into Russian by the medical prisoner Dr. Gordon. The Soviet commission took these materials with them. I know that other documents and records were buried in the area belonging to Crematorium No. II, and that the pits with the ashes of the corpses of the persons cremated in this crematorium were covered with earth. One must look for these things in front of the cremation furnaces. I cannot point to the exact place, because after the destruction of the crematorium, the situation there changed, the ground was leveled already during the time of the Germans, so I lost my orientation. I did not participate in the gassing and cremation of people in Crematoria Nos. II and III.”

Evidently, Dragon buried these writings himself, which he later dug up on the grounds of Crematorium II, but at the same time he assured: “I did not participate in the gassing and cremation of people in Crematoria Nos. II and III.” If, on the other hand, Gradowski himself buried the bottle in Dragon’s absence, how could Dragon specify the exact burial location and then dig it up without fail? All the more so since the ground around Crematorium II had been leveled, and he had lost his “orientation.”

Nevertheless, he himself, no one knows how, dug up the writings and handed them over to the Soviet Commission of Inquiry. The chronology is at least possible, because Dragon was questioned on 26 February 1945, and the discovery occurred on 5 March – so the witness could have pointed the place out to the Soviets, but the inconsistencies I pointed out earlier remain.

His advice to look for other writings “in front of the cremation furnaces” does not make much sense, because then these writings would have been buried in the concrete floor of the furnace room.

Dragon explicitly spoke of “a notebook and a letter,” the writings actually “found” on 5 March 1945, only in the Polish interrogation of 10-11 May, thus after the “discovery.” In the Soviet interrogation, he clearly mentioned only “[a notebook with] a record of the transports with the people who arrived and were burned” (S10), which was never found, and thus can be considered a mere myth. This is confirmed by the fact that this alleged record of gassings and cremations up to September-October 1944, in Dragon’s perspective, should have listed the mythical 4 million victims!

On the “finding” of these manuscripts, I add an additional element here that I had not considered in my specific treatment of the subject (Mattogno 2021, pp. 243-289).

A photograph from 1945 by an unknown author, but bearing at the bottom half of a stamp reading “Чрезвычайная го[сударственная комиссия]” (“Chrezvychnaya go[sudarstvennaya Komissiya]”), the Extraordinary State Commission that investigated Auschwitz, shows on a table a destroyed water bottle along with a notebook and a sheet of paper, apparently in good condition. The accompanying caption in five languages says (Bogusławska-Świebicka, p. 187; see Document 19):

“Prisoner’s diary, written by Sonderkommando member Zalmen Gradowski, found in 1945 in the area of crematory II in Birkenau (Unknown author, 1945)”

It is not at all credible that an aluminum water bottle would have literally exploded in such a way by merely lying in the ground for just five months, nor that any sheets of paper it contained would have been preserved inside so well, if the bottle was that massively destroyed.

Tauber was equally brazen on this issue (P27):

“Individuals from the crematorium staff secretly wrote down the most dramatic figures and events concerning the gassed persons. These notes were buried in various locations near the crematoria. Some of these notes were dug up during the stay of the Soviet Commission, which took them away. However, the vast majority must still be hidden in the ground, and this material could be recovered. Among other things, there are buried photographs of people gassed in the gas chamber, as well as of a transport that arrived at the crematorium for gassing.”

These alleged photographs were never found, despite the presence in Auschwitz from February to June 1945 of many self-proclaimed Sonderkommando “eyewitnesses” such as Tauber himself, Dragon, Mandelbaum, Jankowski and Nagraba, and one can thus be quite sure that this is just another myth.

Other stories also belong to this fabulous anecdote. I point out only one which is particularly crude and requires no comment (Dragon, S7):

“Almost all the Russians were burned, and in the last period, before the arrival of the Red Army and the liberation of the inmates of the Auschwitz Camp, mainly only Russian children were burned, who had been torn away from their parents; the adults instead were used for work in the camp.”

This was evidently meant as a tear-jerker to ingratiate himself with his Soviet interrogators.

Conclusions

There is no doubt that, as Pressac has shown, Tauber's testimonies are indeed 95% reliable from the architectural point of view, meaning with regard to the physical description of the crematoria and their equipment. However, Pressac's judgment that I quoted in the Introduction is doubly naive. First of all, the actual congruence of Tauber's statements with the crematoria's architectural features and equipment is not at all "proof of the exceptional validity of his testimony" (Pressac 1989, p. 502), but simply its conditio sine qua non: the correct description of the crematoria in no way confirms as true what Tauber claims took place in them. Second, the correspondence of his testimony with the "historical material available now that was not available in May 1945," i.e., with the documentation seized by the Soviets, simply arises from the fact that – as is clear from his testimony – Tauber was made aware of this documentation by the Soviet investigators; hence it was available to him in May 1945. In this regard, Tauber stated in his Polish testimony (P3):

"I call muffles, according to the terminology accepted by the Soviet Commission, the retorts for the cremation of corpses."

In reality, the German term "Muffel," polonized into "mufle," was the usual and correct term for the cremation chambers, something that Tauber should have known well. Instead, he always uses the wrong term "retorty," retorts. He polonized other German terms – Heizraum, Drehscheibe, Schreibstube, Totenmeldung, Goldgießer, Goldarbeiter – but strangely not the far more important ones (in his perspective) of "Gaskammer" and "Vergasungskeller." In the Polish interrogation he explicitly equated the alleged gas chamber with Leichenkeller 1 (Morgue 1), with the clear intention of "explaining" in an orthodox sense the presence of this term on the crematoria's plans (P7).

Tauber was also able to observe the equipment and devices of the crematoria and the elements of the furnaces stored in the Bauhof at the time.

On the contrary, it appears from the examination of Tauber's testimonies that he tried to explain the documents he was shown by the Soviets, and these attempts constitute a not-insignificant part of his testimonies. I limit myself to the most-obvious cases:

1) Tauber states that dummy showers were installed in the gas chamber (and benches and coat hangers in the undressing room) only in the fall of 1943 "to disguise the undressing room and the gas chamber by presenting them as a bath and disinfection [room]" (P10f.). This assertion, which has no documentary support, merely served to explain why the inventory attached to the hand-over negotiation for Crematorium III of 24 June 1943 concerning the basement (Kellergeschoss) shows "14 showers" ("14 Brausen") for Morgue 1 (the alleged homicidal gas chamber),¹⁶⁹ whereas in the corresponding inventory of Crematorium II (dated 31 March 1943) the showers do not appear at all.¹⁷⁰ As I explained earlier, these showers were in fact part of the "Special Measures for the Improvement of Hygienic Facilities" implemented in the Birkenau Camp, which were ordered by Kammler at the beginning of May 1943, and for this very reason the showers could not appear in a document (the above-mentioned inventory of Crematorium II) created already on 31 March.

2) The story of the undressing barrack, which, as I have shown earlier, is a mere invention, served only to explain why a barracks appears in front of the northeast corner of Crematorium II on the Plan 2216 of the Birkenau Camp dated 20 March 1943. Tauber, however, does not clarify why the short-term construction of this barracks had become necessary, and Pressac, who considers it "proof" of Tauber's reliability (Pressac 1989, p. 492), provides two conflicting and inconclusive explanations in this regard (see Mattogno 2004b, pp. 285f.). In fact, as I have made clear earlier, this barracks had been ordered by the SS garrison physician on 21 January 1943, and had already been installed a month before the alleged inaugural gassing described by Tauber, which, by the way, thwarts Pressac's attempts at explanation.

3) Tauber stated that the three forced-draft devices "were later dismantled, and the ducts carrying the combustion gases from the cremation furnaces were connected directly to the chimney" (P11). This is true, and the related works, as I explained earlier, were carried out after Tauber had left Crematorium II (mid-April): so how could the witness have known these technical details since at the time he was in Crematorium IV and then never returned to Crematorium II? Evidently from the documents, as I learned them as well.

4) Tauber's statements about the strength of the Sonderkommando also derive from the documents he was shown by the Soviets. These documents are very fragmentary and start from January 1944. On 1 January 1944, the strength of the crematorium staff (Krematoriumspersonal) was 383 inmates; on 31 January, it was 414; and on 15 February, it was 405 (Mattogno 2016a, p. 141); thus, Tauber claims that number, rounded down to 400, for the beginning of his term there a year earlier (March 1943), and that this number remained the same until exactly February 1944 (P23f.):

“At first, when I was assigned to work in the Sonderkommando, it numbered about 400 inmates, and maintained this strength until January or February 1944.”

For the nine months in between, he does not provide any figures, only because there are no documents in this regard.

Even more important is the fact that, until February 1945, Tauber and the Soviet Commission of Inquiry alike were unaware of the term “bunker” later affixed to the alleged provisional gas chambers at Birkenau. In fact, he simply calls them “separate gas chambers.” As I have documented in another study, this term, purportedly in common use among the SS and inmates, was created only at the beginning of Jan Sehn’s investigation (Mattogno 2016, pp. 77-79).

From a historical perspective, Tauber’s statements are either false or erroneous, or they lack objective corroboration, such as:

- the physical and thermo-technical follies on the loading of corpses into the muffles and on the cremation capacity of the furnaces,
- the absurdity of the flames shooting out of the crematoria’s chimneys,
- the alleged gassing of “French resistance fighters,”
- the transports of French and Dutch Jews in March-April 1943,
- the Greek transport allegedly arriving immediately after the transport from Krakow, the first said to have been gassed in Crematorium II,
- the number of deportees in this transport,
- the presence of Mengele at Auschwitz in March-April 1943,
- the date of the Sonderkommando revolt,
- the number of SS men allegedly killed during the revolt,
- the presence of five “cremation pits” in the courtyard of Crematorium V in the summer of 1944,
- the presence of a field railway in the vicinity of the “cremation pits,”
- the presence of four or seven cremation pits in the entire Birkenau area in 1944,
- the transport of the crematoria equipment to Gross-Rosen,
- the gassing of 200 Sonderkommando inmates in the disinfestation chamber of “Kanada” in Auschwitz,
- the strength of the Sonderkommando in 1944,
- its distribution among the individual crematoria,
- the division of the presumed gas chamber of Crematorium II into two rooms, – the retirement of Crematorium I in February or March 1943 (it was actually retired in July 1943).

... not to mention the blatant lie about the number of camp victims (P27f.):

“According to my assumptions, the total number of persons gassed in the Auschwitz crematoria during the period in which I served in these crematoria as a member of the Sonderkommando, is approximately 2 million. During my stay in Auschwitz, I had the opportunity to talk to various inmates who had worked in the crematoria and bunkers of Auschwitz before my arrival there. From them, I learned that by the time I started to work in the crematoria, approximately two million people had already been gassed in Bunkers Nos. I and II or in Crematorium No. I. In total, therefore, I calculate the total number of people gassed at Auschwitz at about 4 million.”

In light of the critical examination I have set forth above, Robert van Pelt’s claim that “Tauber’s statement was extremely specific, it did not contain contradictions, and it did not contain improbable allegations” and the attribution to it of the “the highest evidentiary value to it, not only because of its internal consistency,” characterize van Pelt as either a gullible fool or a deliberate deceiver.

This also applies to his laughable judgment that “Dragon was precise and reliable when he talked about what he had witnessed in person.” What the witness claimed to have “witnessed in person” is false and absurd, and his statements teem with enormous contradictions.

The intentionally untrue character of the statements of Tauber and Dragon results from an incontrovertible fact: both of them fixed the number of the alleged victims of Auschwitz at four million – a mythical figure largely disavowed by current orthodox Holocaust historiography, which has been reduced to 1,100,000 (Piper 1993, p. 202). It matters little whether this figure was invented by the witnesses or by the Soviets. What matters is that the witnesses constructed their testimonies on the basis of the Four-Million Lie, i.e., their statements about the number of deportees to Auschwitz, the cremation capacity of the crematoria, and the gassing and burning capacity of the phantom “bunkers” of Birkenau aimed at delineating the picture of an immense mass extermination of precisely four million people.

The collapse of the myth of four million Auschwitz victims necessarily involves the invalidation of these testimonies, as they are based on falsehood and deception. In fact, one cannot claim that Tauber and Dragon had simply adopted a multiplier of 4 – as J.-C. Pressac (falsely) claimed regarding the ramblings of Myklós Nyiszli (Pressac 1989, p. 475) – so that it would be enough to divide all their figures by 4 to obtain the “truth”. On the one hand, this “multiplier” would still constitute a deliberate lie that completely discredits the trustworthiness of the witnesses. On the other hand, the figures are only one aspect of these testimonies’ mendacity, and have no relation to the alleged events that are historically false or absurd, and of which Tauber and Dragon claimed to have been eyewitnesses.

This means that Tauber and Dragon were deliberate impostors.

In reference to Tauber, van Pelt asserted that the “negationists [=revisionists] have not been able to discredit him as a witness.” However, the only thing that is actually certain is the fact that he has irreparably discredited himself as a historian, and this applies to all orthodox Holocaust “historians” who have taken seriously the ramblings of these two blatantly false witnesses.

Я хорошо владею польским языком и показания буду давать на польском языке.

Я, 14 октября 1942 года был арестован гестапо в городе Кракове, где и находился в гетто. Арестован я был за то, что я еврей. В гестапо я содержался под стражей два месяца, а 19-го января 1943 года был доставлен в Освенцим в лагерь для заключенных. Сначала я был помещен в отделение лагеря Виржану, а через три дня был направлен в отделение лагеря Кзымиче. В Кзымиче один из нашего транспорта заболел тифом, поэтому всех нас /1200 человек/ возвратили в Виржану. На третий день после возвращения в Виржану нам в блок 127 прислал арбейцштурм /начальник работ/ немец ГРАЙ /интервьюер/, который спросил у нас кто может работать маляром, столяром и слесарем. Я и еще 19 человек назвали свои специальности /я по специальности слесарь/ и нас всех 20 человек переправили в 11-й блок лагеря Аушвиц /тарный лагерь/.

В тарном мы перебивали одну ночь, а утром нас всех направил работать в крематорий. Мы не знали, что нас поведут работать в крематорий. Крематорий находился около политического отдела. Все 20 человек по национальности были евреи. В крематории с нами всего работало 33 человека, из них евреев было 26 человек, поляков 7 человек. В крематории был капа /руководил работами по созданию/ поляк МЕТИК Мораво из гетто Кракова, тоже из заключенных. Но немцем старшим был некий крематорий ГРАЙЕР - оберштурмфюрер.

В крематории я работал один месяц. В крематории мы стигали трупы, которые доставлялись нам на автомашинках. В крематории в Аушвице при мне живых людей не газировали и не сжигали, а сжигали только трупы. Трупы эти свозили с территории лагеря, люди эти были или умирали от голода или убиты и расстреляны немцами. В крематории было три печи по два отпора в каждой. В каждый отпор закладывалось по пять трупов. Процесс сжигания одной операции длился полтора часа. Мы 20 человек как ученики работали в крематории по 12 часов, с 6 часов утра и до 6 часов вечера, а вообще крематорий работал почти круглые сутки. За это время, т.е. за рабочие часы в крематории сжигалось ежедневно 250-300 трупов. В крематории была газовая камера, размером 7 x 15, высота 2 метра, а возможно немного больше. Что это была газовая камера, я знал со слов других и потому, что в потолке имелись люки с крышками, через которые забрасывались в камеру газы, и двери были особого герметического устройства с контрольными окнами. Такого же типа газовые камеры я видел впоследствии в других крематориях лагеря. Были случаи в неделю 2-3 раза в крематорий приносились 30-40 человек живых, их там расстреливали агенты гестапо, а мы их сжигали. Печи в крематории были двухмультельной/геторной/, отапливались сухим генераторным газом. Генератор помещался позади печи. Каждая печь имела свои два генератора/один мультель, один генератор/. В генераторе сжигался кокс. Температура доходила до 1200-1500° жары в геторте.

Этот крематорий действовал сначала 1940 года по февраль 1943 года.

Попал из печей убитых на автомашинах, но я не знаю куда. В крематории людей сжигали без одежды. Где их раздевали я не знаю. Трупы были худые - кости обтянутые кожей. Люди эти все были замученные немцами на работах, ампала/проверка/ и проч.

ПУСЛАКА-ИИ

Во время работы над нами сильно издевались, были и в марте месяце из 20 человек нас осталось всего лишь 9 человек, а остальные были уничтожены — побиты, расстреляны и сожжены. В том же марте месяце нас всех перевели на работу в крематорий лагеря Биркенау. Крематорий этот нумеровался №2, к этому моменту он только был построен. Этот крематорий был расположен с левой стороны железнодорожной колес. До 15-го марта мы нагревали печи, вернее просушивали их. С 15-го марта 1943 года начали поступать транспорты с людьми/целые вагоны/, их стали в большинстве заводить в крематории, газировать и сжигать. Первый транспорт поступил в крематорий с 4.000 чел., приехавшими из Гетто города Кракова. Все они были загазированы в одну ночь и сожжены. Там были и старики с детьми, старые мужчины и женщины. В крематории было два больших подземных помещения, одно большое служило для раздевания, а второе меньшее для отравления газом. При входе в крематорий было написано на всех языках сверху, что это "дезинфекционная камера и баня". В газопомещении газировалось одновременно до 4.000 человек. Люди в крематорий входили одетыми и с небольшими сумками вещей. Все вещи у них отбирались на rampе, где разгружались транспорты людей. В раздевалке были номера, люди раздевались, вешали свои вещи и проходили через дверь по коридору в газокамеру. Там была обстановка как в душевых помещениях, т.е. сверху были душевые распылители. В то время, когда люди заполняли газокамеру, дверь герметически закупоривалась и всех людей умерщвляли газом. Газы бросались в четыре люка, находящиеся в потолке. Люди умирали через 20-30 минут, а после мы их сжигали.

В газокамере имелось два вентилятора - один вытяжной, а второй нагнетательный. Люди из брали для дыхания после проветривания газокамеры. Входили мы в газокамеру в противогазах. Люди после газирования вытаскивали по разному, т.е. в разных измешках позах, с искаженными лицами, тащились друг с другом матери с детьми и т.д.

Циклон-газ в газокамере распространялся через имеющиеся сетчатые колонны, представляющие собой канал прямоугольного сечения с двойными сетчатыми стенками. В этом крематории имелось пять трехмужельных печей. В каждой муфеле складывалось по 4-5 трупов. Трупы спаливались за 20-25 минут. Этот крематорий функционировал с марта 1943 года по октябрь 1944 года, т.е. один год 8 месяцев. После газирования людей они лифтом подавались в особую комнату, комнату второго этажа, там у людей снимали золотые серьги, часы, кольца, вытаскивали золотые зубы, все это складывалось в отдельные сумки, а люди на тележках увозились к печам, укладывались в них и сжигались. У женщин перед погружением в лифт снимались пояса и направлялись в особую комнату. Когда люди входили в помойник, где была развешена, там находилось много SS'овцев с собаками и дубинками, которые, в случае если кто сопротивлялся и не хотел идти в газокамеру, загоняли их собаками, били палками, обдирали кожу.

Всего в крематории в такой известной Sonderkommando нас работало до 70 человек заключенных. SS'овцы, охранявшие нас и следящих за порядком, было до 7 человек. В крематории было четыре врача из заключенных, они тащили трупы умерших и т.д., но не газированных, и были какой то учет. Все работники зондеркоманды жили в лагере, в блоке №2. Крематории, если были транспорты людей, работали круглосуточно. Люди уничтожались беспрерывно тысячами. За сутки уничтожалось в среднем до 3.000 человек.

Весной 1943 года было построено еще три крематория, где также стали уничтожать людей посредством газирования и сожжения. Рядом с крематорием №2 начал функционировать крематорий №3, точно такого же типа, как и №2, и такой же пропускной способности. Следующие были крематории №4 и 5, они были другого типа. В каждом крематории была одна печь с 8-ю муфелями. В муфель закладывалось 4-5 человек. Продолжительность сожжения была 35 минут. В день одна печь сжигала до 1200-1500 человек. Очень много людей уничтожалось летом 1944 года, работало по уничтожению 4 крематория и 4 больших костра, уничтожали французских повстанцев и венгров. Я все время работал в зондеркоманде, и мне приходилось работать во всех крематориях и на кострах, поэтому я знаю все подробно. Во всех крематориях были установлены газогенераторы, которые работали на угле.

ВОПРОС: Как были устроены газовые камеры при крематориях №4 и 5 и как в них происходило отравление людей.

ОТВЕТ: При крематориях №4 и 5 была пристройка, длиной около 20 метров. Внутри пристройки была разделена на три отделения, и каждое из них было газовой камерой. Для забрасывания "ЦИКОНА" в стены камеры из плите около двух метров были устроены люки с решетками, закрывавшиеся герметически крышками. В каждой газовой камере имелось по две герметически закрывавшиеся двери. К помещениям газовых камер через коридор примыкало 2 помещения раздевалки, по площади равное помещению всех трех газовых камер вместе.

В зависимости от количества поступивших людей, немцы их отправляли одновременно в одну, двух или трех камерах. Процесс отравления людей происходил аналогично тому, как это фашисты делали в газовых камерах крематориев № 2 и 3. Газовый задымлялся в том, что "JUNO" забрасывался СС'овцем черной описанной выше жидкостью, сделанной в стене, а не в крыше, как в крематории № 2 и 3. Кроме того, в газовых камерах крематориев 4 и 5 не было вентиляции, поэтому проветривание камер происходило посредством открывания дверей и люков. Трупы после отравления выгружались в двух направлениях, их либо складывали в раздевалку, либо /как это делали некоторое время в крематории № 5/ выгружали через наружные двери во двор крематория /где их сжигали на кострах.

Когда раздевалка была загружена трупами и если в это время в крематорий прибывала новая партия людей, их раздевали во дворе и затем обычным порядком отправляли в газовых камерах.

ВОПРОС: Скажите, когда прекратил работать крематорий № 1.

ОТВЕТ: Крематорий № 1 немцы закрыли и перестали сжигать в нем людей с марта 1943 года.

ВОПРОС: Сколько времени находились в эксплуатации каждый из крематориев № 3, 4 и 5.

ОТВЕТ: Крематорий № 3 был пущен в эксплуатацию в апреле 1943 года и находился в эксплуатации по октябрь 1944 года. В ноябре месяца немцы приступили к его разборке, почему - я не знаю. Крематорий № 4 был пущен в конце марта 1943 года и находился в эксплуатации по август 1944 года включительно; часть его сгорела в начале октября, в октябре же 1944 года была начата его разборка.

Крематорий № 5 был пущен в мае 1943 года и работал по 20 января 1945 года.

Допрос прерван на следующий день.

ПРОДОЛЖЕНИЕ ПОКАЗАНИЙ ТАУШЕР ГЕНРИХА АБРАХАМ.

29 февраля 1945 года.

Который, будучи предупрежден об ответственности за дачу ложных показаний, показал:

ВОПРОС: Скажите, когда немцы прекратили в Биркенау по трем крематориям отправлять людей, газом в газовых камерах.

ОТВЕТ: В конце октября 1944 года. В крематории № 5 сжигали людей до 20 января 1945 года. Здесь сжигались замученные и работавшие немцами люди.

ВОПРОС: Скажите, сколько было в крематориях рабочих и как они распределялись по специальностям и в сколько смен работали крематории.

ОТВЕТ: В каждом из крематориев № 2 и 3 работало в одну смену normally до 10 человек рабочих из заключенных лагеря, входивших в так называемую "сондеркоманду"/специальная команда/. Смена работала 12 часов. В сутки работало две смены. Тем 10 человек по крематориям № 2 и 3 распределялись по специальностям следующим образом:

1. Уборка вещей, оставшихся в раздевалке, погрузка их на автомашину, уборка помещений - 15 человек.
 2. Выгрузка трупов из камеры и подноска их к под"емнику - 15 человек.
 3. Укладка трупов на под"емник/лифт/ - 2 человека.
 4. Парикмахеры/стрижка женских волос с трупом/ - 4 человека.
 5. Дантисты/удаление золотых зубов у трупов/ - 2 человека.
 6. Для обслуживания генераторов - 2 человека.
 7. Обслуживание под"емника для трупов - 2 человека.
 8. Уборка трупов с под"емника - 2 человека.
 9. Подноска трупов к котлам печей - 2 человека.
 10. Загрузка трупов в котлы/для групп по 5 человек/ - 10 человек.
 11. Помощники надсмотрщика - 4 человека.
- - 60 человек.

В крематориях № 4 и 5 в смену работало по 30 человек.

На все 4 крематория было кроме того три человека золотых дел мастеров, которые переплавляли золотые зубы, вытаскиваемые у трупов.

ВОПРОС: Сколько, сколько человек было всего в Sonderkommando для всех крематориев в разное время в 1943 году.

ОТВЕТ: С марта-апреля 1943 года в Sonderkommando было 400 человек, они распределялись по крематориям так: в крематориях № 2 и 3 работало 240 человек. В крематориях № 4 и 4 - 120 человек, остальные на разных работах 40 человек.

Численный состав Sonderkommando все время изменялся, так как немцы часть рабочих систематически уничтожали - больше всего путем сожжения и заменили новыми.

БЕЗ ПРАВА
ПУБЛИКАЦИИ

С мая месяца 1944 года количество рабочих зондеркоманды было немалым: увеличилось до тысячи человек, так как с этого времени при крематории №5 стали сжигать трупы в кострах. Была построена и пущена отдельная газовая камера №2 и камеры при ней.

Указанные тысяча человек "зондеркоманды" с мая месяца были распушены для работы следующим образом:

Крематорий №2 - 120 человек/по 60 чел. в смену/. В крематории №3 - 120 чел. В крематории №4 - 60 чел. Крематорий №5 - 300 чел., отдельная газовая камера №2 и костры при ней - 300 чел.

ВОПРОС: Кроме крематориев и костров указанным числом требовали ли немцы еще какими-либо путем людей?

ОТВЕТ: В Бухенвальде кроме крематориев немцы устроили еще отдельные газовые камеры №1 и №2 и костры при них, где уничтожались люди. Я не знаю, когда они начали работать, но знаю, что немцы прекратили в них уничтожать людей в апреле-мае 1943 года.

С мая 1944 года до октября 1944 года тщательно интенсивно работали газовая камера №2 и костры при ней, а также костры при крематории №5.

ВОПРОС: Сколько часов в сутки работали крематории и костры.

ОТВЕТ: Крематории №2, 3, 4 и 5 и костры для сжигания трупов, а также и газовая камера работали круглые сутки.

В крематории №2 и 3 сжигание трупов в печах производилось в течение суток за вычетом перерывов на очистку шлаков, но не менее 21 часа.

ВОПРОС: Скажите каким путем уничтожались немцами зондеркоманды или они их не уничтожали.

ОТВЕТ: Значительную часть "зондеркомандиров" немцы уничтожали путем сожжения в крематориях избивания и застрелывания.

литаниями ссылами. Иногда же изымали сразу по несколько сот человек и отправляли.

В августе 1941 года немцы устроили до 200 человек в одну яму. Все они были умерщвлены в лагере Аушвиц №1 в камере для дезинфекции. На место изгнанных немцы набегали других.

Знаю случай, когда из Sonderkommando были отобраны 200 человек и согнаны в Дарбино/Дайданах/. Я лично спасся потому, что бежал из транспорта при эвакуации.

Больше по делу показать ничего не могу. Принято верить, меня прочтано.

Я, ТАУБЕР Генрих Абрахам дополнительно поясняю:

Костры для сжигания трупов раскладывались в канатах, на дне которых был по всей длине прогнут канал для допуска воздуха. От этого канала был отвод к яме, размером 2 м ширины и глубиной 4 метра. При сжигании трупов на кострах в эту яму стекал жир. Рядом с ямой обивали трупы на кострах для того, чтобы они лучше горели. Сначала в канаву складывали дрова, затем трупы до 400 человек в порядке с вагонками, обивали бензином и поджигали. Затем туда же бросали остальные трупы из газовой камеры, обивали их прямо от вагонки жиром с трупов.

На одном костре трупы сжигались примерно в течение двух суток. Если немцы отстреливали большое количество людей и их

Oświęcim, dnia 24 maja 1945 r. Sędzia śledczy w Krakowie Jan Sehn, członek Komisji dla Badania Zbrodni Niemiecko-Hitlerowskich w Oświęcimiu przesłuchał na wniosek w obecności i przy współudziale wiceprokuratora Sądu Okręgowego w Krakowie Edwarda Pęchalakiego w trybie art. 254 w związku z art. 107, 115 kodeksu postępowania karnego b. więźnia obozu koncentracyjnego w Oświęcimiu nr 90124, który zeznał co następuje:

Nazywam się Henryk Tauber, urodzony 8.VII.1917, w Chrsanowie, syn Abrahama Taubera i Mindy z domu Szajnowie, kawaler, wyznania mojżeszowego, narodowości i przynależności państwowej polskiej, z zawodu cholewkars, zamieszkały w Chrsanowie ul. Grunwaldska 1, niekarany. - -

Do czasu wybuchu wojny w roku 1939 mieszkalem wraz z moją najbliższą rodziną liczącą 12 osób w Chrsanowie. Z rodziny tej pozostałem przy życiu ja i jeden z moich szwagrów. O losie jednego z braci który wyemigrował do Rosji, nie mam dotąd wiadomości. W związku z wojennymi okolicznościami przesiedleńczymi i wysiedleńczymi rodzina moja została rozbita i ja znalazłem się w ghocie krakowskim. Tam aresztowany zostałem w listopadzie 1942 r. i osadzony w więzieniu żydowskiej służby porządkowej przy ul. Józefińskiej 31. W dniu 19 stycznia 1943 r. przewieziony zostałem wraz z transportem 400 żydów z gheta krakowskiego i 800 aryjczykami z Montelupich do Oświęcimia. W transporcie tym było około 800 mężczyzn i 400 kobiet. Kobiety oddzielono zaraz na uwrocie w Oświęcimiu i umieszczone w obozie kobiecym w Brzezinkach, a ja w grupie 250 więźniów żydów i około 550 aryjczyków dostałem się na blok 27, oddziału B I b. Był to blok niewykończony, bez okien, bez drzwi i bez kaji. Następnie przeszedłem z kolei przez blok 22, 20 tego samego oddziału obozowego, byłem przez parę dni w Buncie, skąd z powodu stwierdzonej wśród więźniów tej grupy do której należałem choroby tyfusu, przewieziony zostałem z powrotem do Brzezinki i umieszczony na bloku 21 oddziału B I b.

W międzyczasie przeprowadzono rejestrację, w czasie której podzieliłem się z kwalifikowanego ślusarza-mechanika. Z początkiem lutego 1943 przybył na blok Unterscharführer Groll, Arbeitsdienst i Arbeits-einsatz więzień Mikus i wybrali z pośród przebywających na naszym bloku więźniów fachowców rzekomo do pracy w warsztatach w Oświęcimiu. Wybrano nas 20 młodych mężczyzn żydów. Zaprowadzono nas na blok IV, gdzie sędziwi zostaliśmy przez lekarza i wszyscy uznani za zdrowych. Tego samego dnia przewieziono nas autem pod eskortą SS-mannów do Oświęcimia i umieszczono na bloku II w pokąju bunkra nr 7. Następnego dnia zaprowadzono nas 20 pod silną eskortą SS-mannów do bunkra, w którym, jak się później okazało, mieściło się krematorium nr 1. Tu zastaliśmy siedmiu żydów, m.i. i Janowskiego oraz trzech Polaków. Czoło był Mietek Morawa z Krakowa. Był to mężczyzna wysokiego wzrostu blondyn, szczupły, wyglądał na około 24 lat. Jeden z braci jego był bokserem w Krakowie. Słyszałem, że rodzina Morawy mieszkala na Dębnikach. Początkowo tu w czasie pracy w pierwszym krematorium w Oświęcimiu był on bardzo surowym czoło, nakazaną przez Niemców pracę wykonywał przepisowo. W późniejszym czasie przeszedł jako Oberczoło do krematoriów II i III w Brzezince. Tam starał się żyć z nami w zgodzie, ponieważ było nas tam około 400, pracowaliśmy już przez dłuższy czas przy krematoriach, byliśmy zrezygnowani zdecydowani na wszystko i dlatego nie pozwalaliśmy sobie pluć w kasę. - - - -

W pierwszym dniu po przybyciu do krematorium przemówił tu do nas SS-mann Unterscharführer, którego nazwiska nie pamiętam. Powiedział nam, że wykonywać będziemy pracę nieprzyjemną, że musimy się jednak do niej przyzwyczaić i po jakimś czasie nie będzie ona przedstawiała dla nas żadnej trudności. M Przemawiał on w języku polskim. W całym przemówieniu nie wspomniał ani słowem, że zatrudnienie będziemy przy paleniu zwłok ludzkich. Zakładając to przemówienie rozumiejąc "Los an die Arbeit" i biciem nas po głowach bykowcem. Wraz z Mietkiem Morawą zapędzili nas do bunkra krematorium nr I, gdzie ujrzaaliśmy kilkanaście zwłok ludzkich. Leżały one na stołach, jedno na drugich, zabrudzone, smarzone, wiele zwiek było pokrwawionych, z rozbitymi czaszkami, inne z rozciętymi, widocznie na sekejach, bruchami. Zwicki te były posmarowane, musieliśmy ziskierami oddziaływać jedno na drugich. Bici i poganiani przez owego Unterecharführera i capo Heramę wyciągaliśmy te zwieki do "hajcoowni", gdzie znajdowały się trzy piece, każdy po dwa małe muflę. Jako muflę samoczną zgodnie z nomenklaturą przyjętą przez Komitę sowiecką retorty do spalania zwiek. W "hajcoowni" układaliśmy zwieki na wózku poruszającym się na szynach, biegnących między wielkimi piecami. Od drzwi prowadzących z bunkra, gdzie znajdowały się zwieki, wózek ten jeździł na "szynach" obracając się we wszystkich kierunkach i poruszając się w kierunku "hajcoowni" na szerokich szynach. Do każdej retorty prowadziły od tych szerokich szyn wąskie szyny na których toczył się wózek do retorty. Wózek ten poruszał się na osterkach małych, metalowych kółkach. Miał silną metalową postawę w kształcie skrzyni. Do skrzyni tej wkładano dla obciążenia kamienie i żelazo. Przedłużeniem wierzchniej ściany owej skrzyni było metalowe koryto, długości ponad 2 m. Na korycie tym układaliśmy po pięć zwiek. Najpierw dwie zwieki, zwróconych nogami w kierunku pieca, bruchami do góry, następnie w odwrotnym kierunku dwie zwieki. I te zwieki zwrócone były bruchami do góry. Piąte zwieki kładzione nogami w kierunku pieca i grzbietem zwróconym do góry. Ręce tych piątych zwiek opadały w dół i jakdyby obejmowały wszystkie zwieki pod nimi leżące. Ponieważ ładunek taki przewoził nieraz ciężar podstawy wózka, wobec tego potrzebowaliśmy deskę koryto od dołu, aby wózek nie przechylił się i zwieki nie spadły. Tak maladowane koryto wpychaliśmy do retorty. Gdy zwieki znajdowały się już w piecu przytrzymywaliśmy je blaszanymi guidem przesuwającymi wzdłuż koryta, a inni - łazniowicze wyciągali wózek z pod zwiek. Specjalny uchwyt na końcu koryta przyswalał dy cymbał. Następnie zamykaliśmy drzwi. W krematorium nr I były trzy piece po dwie retorty każdy, z czym już poprzednio wspomnieliśmy. Każda retorta spalała mogła pięć zwiek ludzkich. Jednooszczędnie można więc było spalić w krematorium tym 30 zwłok ludzkich. W tym czasie, gdy ja przy obsłudze tego krematorium pracowałem spalanie takiego ładunku trwało do półtorej godziny. Były to bowiem zwłoki ludzi wychudzonych, istne szkielety, które się bardzo powoli paliły. Z późniejszej praktyki i obserwacji spalania w krematoriach II i III wiem, że zwłoki ludzi tłustych palą się znacznie szybciej. Proces spalania przyspiesza palenie się tłuszczu ludzkiego, które wytwarza dodatkowy żar. Wszystkie piece krematorium I znajdowały się w hali, którą nazywam "hajoownią". W pobliżu wejścia do tej hali znajdował się jeden piec zwrócony generatorem w kierunku drzwi wejściowych, a piecami retortowymi wgląd hali. Dwa dalej użytkowane wprost odwrotnie to znaczy z piecami retortowymi w kierunku drzwi wejściowych, a generatorami wgląd hali, znajdowały się na drugim końcu hali. Piece te opalane były koksem. Zostały wykonane, jak świadczyły o tym napisy na drzwiach pieców i innych metalowych częściach, przez firmę "Tepf und Söhne" z Erfurtu. Wózek do przewożenia zwłok był również wyrobem tej firmy. Za "hajoownią" znajdowała się mała koksoownia, obok niej mała asfaltownia, a dalej na prawo magazyn urn na popiół ludzki. Drzwi wejściowe, które prowadziły obecnie do hali nazywanej przesennie "hajoownią" przebite zostały dopiero później. W tym czasie kiedy ja w krematorium I pracowałem drzwi tych nie było. Do hajoowni wchodziło się wówczas drzwiami z korytarza na lewo od wejścia. Drzwi takich było dwoje. Na prawo z korytarza prowadziły drzwi pierwsze do podręcznego magazynu, w którym znajdowały się zapasowe ruszta. Tu rozbierali się ludzie przywiezieni małymi transportami autami, których za czasów mej pracy w krematorium I w bunkrze tego krematorium rozstrzeliwano. Bunkrem nazywam tę część budynku, w której gasowano ludzi. Transporty takie nadchodziły raz lub dwa razy w tygodniu i składały się z 30 - 40 osób. Byli to ludzie wszelkich narodowości. Na czas rozstrzeliwania nas, pracujących w Sonderkommando, zapędzano do koksowni. Zwłoki rozstrzelanych znajdowały następnie w bunkrze. U wszystkich zwłok widzieliśmy ranę rozstrzelaną w tył oszańki /Gonickeschusa/. Rozstrzeliwań dokonywał stale jeden i ten sam SS-mann z oddziału politycznego, w asyście drugiego SS-manna z tego samego oddziału, który piśmiennie stwierdzał śmierć rozstrzelanych. Cape Morawa nie był wraz z nami w kociołni w czasie rozstrzeliwania. Co robił w tym czasie, nie wiem. Zwłoki rozstrzelanych wynosiliśmy z bunkra do hajołni gdy jeszcze całkiem ciepłe były i ociekały świeżą krwią. Drogę wejście z korytarza na prawo prowadziło do pokoiku w którym składano popiół ze zwłok ludzkich. Przez pokój ten przechodziło się do właściwego bunkra, używanego za noich czasów do rozstrzeliwania ofiar, a przedtem ~~tytułowi~~~~przez~~~~faktycznie~~ do gasewania ludzi. W grudniu 1942 r. zagasowano w tym bunkrze 400 więźniów ze Sonderkomanda. Opowiadali mi o tym więźniowie, których przy pracy przy krematorium I zastąpiłem, gdy do pracy tej zostałem przydzielony. W krematorium nr I pracowałem od początku lutego 1943 r. do ^{dnia} 4 marca 1943 r. a więc przeszło jeden miesiąc. Przez cały ten czas trzymano nas w bunkrze 7 bloku II. Było nas tam 22 żydów, ponieważ do grupy naszej przybyłej z początkiem lutego z Brzeszki dodano dwóch uientystów-żydów czeskich. Owyh siedmiu żydów, których zastałem przy pracy w krematorium I trzymano również na bloku II, tylko w innej celi. Cape Morawa i pracujący już przy krematorium nr I wraz z nim Polacy Józef i Wacek, mieszkali na bloku ^{IV} ~~XII~~, a więc na bloku otwartym. Prócz owych dwóch żydów czeskich przydzielono w ciągu tego miesiąca do naszej grupy czterech Polaków Staśka i Władka, których nazwisk nie pamiętam oraz Władysława Biskupa z Krakowa i Agrestowskiego Jana z gminy Pasa, koło Warszawy. Nazwiska ich dokładnie pamiętam, ponieważ pisałem im listy po niemiecku do rodziny. I ci czterej ostatnie wymienieni Polacy mieszkali na bloku IV. Przy wyruszeniu do pracy nazywane stare komando, zatrudnione przy krematorium I "Komandą Krematorium I". Naszą grupą, tę spoczę 22 żydów z bloku II i owych czterech Polaków przydzielonych do naszej grupy, nazywano "Komandą Krematorium II". Oznaczenia te nie rozumielśmy wówczas.

Napiero później przekonał się, że przysłano nas na niewiarygodną praktykę do krematorium I, celem przygotowania się do pracy w krematorium II, - - - - -

Zasnałem, że krematoria i komanda zatrudnione przy ich obsłudze podlegały oddziałowi politycznemu. Kartoteki więźniów pracujących w tych komandach znajdowały się w oddziale politycznym, w szpitalu. W szpitalu chorych nie poszliśmy do szpitala, tylko na bloku zamkniętym urządzono dla nich osobną izbę szpitalną. Blok, w którym mieszkaliśmy był izolowany, a w Oświęcimiu trzymano nas w zamkniętym bloku II. Zwolnienie się z komandy i przeniesienie do innego nie zależało od Arbeitsdienstu i następować mogło tylko na zarządzenie oddziału politycznego. Lekarskim naszym był żyd francuski Pacha. Był to bardzo dobry specjalista, leczył SS-mannów i za ich protekcją udało mu się wydostać z bloku Sonderkomanda na inny blok. Gdy fakt ten doszedł do wiadomości oddziału politycznego Pacha przydzielono ponownie do pracy w naszej izbie chorych mimo, iż był na bloku wolnym już kilka miesięcy. W czasie mej pracy w krematorium I kontrolę naszej działalności z ramienia oddziału politycznego przeprowadzał m.i. Untersturmführer Grabner i Obersturmführer Kwakernak. Przypominam sobie, jak czoło Mietek zwrócił się do Grabnera, ażeby mu przydzielił jednego więźnia do pracy, ponieważ jeden z naszej grupy zmarł. Grabner odpowiedział mu, że jednego "sugangu" dać mu nie może, żeby zabił jeszcze osterech żydów, to wówczas da mu "sugang" pićciu. Zapytał przystym Mietka, czym bije więźniów. Mietek pokazał mu kij. Grabner chwycił wówczas ramię Mietki i oświadczył Mietkowi, by tym bił więźniów. Po pierwszym dniu pracy w krematorium I pićciu z mej grupy sameldowało się chorymi, i pozostało na bloku. Następnego dnia przy wyciąganiu trupów z bunkra krematorium I znaleźliśmy ich zwłoki nagie bez śladów potraśnięcia. Przypuszczam, że zostali zamordowani. Po miesięcznej pracy przy krematorium I pozostało nas z 22 żydów tylko 12. Grupę tę wraz z Władysławem Tomioskiem z Cieszyńska i osterech wymienionymi już przeze mnie Polakami /Biskup i inni/ przeniesiono w dniu 1. XII 1942 do Brzezinki, gdzie umieszczeni zostaliśmy w bloku nr II odcinka B Ib. Był to blok zamknięty. Jak się później dowiedziałem Tomiosek pracował w krematorium jeszcze w roku 1941. Był to stary więzień, miał numer tysięczesterysta kilka. Przed przydzieleniem go do naszej grupy on miał miejsce w marcu 1943 r. pracował on przez jakiś czas w młynie i w rzesni, skąd został z grupą dalszych 40 więźniów aresztowany pod zarzutem działalności konspiracyjnej. Cała ta grupa osadzona została w bloku II w Oświęcimiu i przez sąd SS skazana na śmierć. Untersturmführer Grabner rozpoznał Tomioska jeszcze przed wykonaniem egzekucji i przydzielił go do naszej grupy. W Brzezince pracował Tomiosek jako capo komanda zatrudnionego w krematorium II a później w krematorium IV. Idąc się w sierpniu 1943 r. wezwany został Tomiosek na oddział polityczny skąd jeszcze tego samego dnia Oberscharführer Kwakernak przywiózł jego zwłoki, które spaliliśmy w krematorium nr V. Głowa Tomioska, zawinięta była w worek, jednak rozpoznaliśmy go wszyscy, ponieważ odznaczał się silną budową ciała. Kwakernak pilnował nas osobście tak długo, dopóki zwłoki Tomioska nie znalazły się w piecu, a następnie sam odszedł. Otworzyliśmy drzwi pieca, wyciągnęli zwłoki, odwinęli worek i z twarzą zupełnie dokładnie rozpoznaliśmy Tomioska. Był to człowiek bardzo dobry, obchodził się z nami przyswoicie, wtajemniczył nas w naszą pracę konspiracyjną. - - - - -

W dniu 4 marca 1943 r. pod strażą SS-mannów zaprowadzeni zostaliśmy na teren krematorium nr II. Tu objaśnił nam konstrukcję tego krematorium capo August, sprowadzony w tym samym czasie z Buchenwaldu, gdzie pracował przy tamtejszym krematorium. Krematorium nr II posiadało pod sienią rozbiórnię /Auskleideraum/ i bunkier czyli gazownię /Gaskammer/. W przejściu między tymi oboma piwnicami znajdował się korytarz do którego prowadziły z zewnątrz schody i koryto do zrzućcia zwłok przyswieszonych do spalenia w krematorium z obozu. Drzwi z rozbiórni wchodziło się do tego korytarza a strażnik stał drzwiami na prawo do gazowni. Od strony wejścia na teren tego krematorium prowadziły do korytarza drugie schody. Na lewo od tych schodów znajdował się w rogu mały pokój na włosy, okulary i t.p. rzeczy, a na prawo mały pokój, w którym przechowywane zapasowe puszki z "Cyklonem". W prawym kącie korytarza na ścianie przeciąglej od wejścia z rozbieralni znajdowała się winda do wyciągania zwiek. Do rozbieralni wchodziło się z podwórza krematorium schodami. Schody te otoczone były szklaną barierą. Nad drzwiami wisiała tablica z napisem "Zum Baden und Desinfektion". Napis ten był w paru językach wypisany. W rozbieralni biegły wzdłuż ścian ławy drewniane oraz drewniane wiszaki pomalowane. Nie było tam żadnych okien i stałe paliło się światło. Rozbieralnia miała również instalację wodociągową i była skanalizowana. Z rozbieralni wchodziło się do korytarza przez drzwi, nad którymi wisiał napis "Zum Bade", powtórzony w kilku językach. Przypominam sobie, że wypisane tam było również słowo "Bania". Z korytarza tego wchodziło się drzwiami na prawo do gazowni. Były to drzwi drewniane, zbudowane z dwóch warstw krótkich kawałków desek, podobnie jak podłoga parkietowa jest układana, nigdy tymi warstwami znajdowała się płyta z masy uszczelniającej brzoگی drzwi i fugi futryny również obite były uszczelnkami filcowymi. ~~W~~ ^W drzwiach tych na wysokości głowy mężczyzny średniego wzrostu znajdowało się okrągłe okienko, oszkłone. Z drugiej strony drzwi to znaczy od strony gazowni okienko to było zakratowane kratą w kształcie półkuli. Kratę tę założono dlatego, ponieważ zdarzały się wypadki, iż ludzie znajdujący się w komorze gazowej przed śmiercią wybijali szybę w okienku. Ponieważ i kratka temu nie zapobiegala i wypadki takie mimo jej założenia powtarzały się, okienko to później zabito blachą lub deską. W tym miejscu nadmieniam, że przeznaczony na gazowanie i znajdujący się w komorze gazowej ludzie uskładali nieraz przewody elektryczne, urywali je, uskładali urządzenia wentylacyjne. - Drzwi te zamknięte były od strony korytarza na stalane rygły, które po zamknięciu drzwi docierały się dla uszczelnienia specjalnymi śkrętami. Sklepienie komory gazowej oparte było na cementowych filarach w środku swej szerokości. Na lewo i na prawo od tych filarów znajdowały się ostere słupy. Zewnętrzną ścianą tych słupów stanowiły kraty z grubego drutu, biegnące aż po sufit i na zewnątrz. Za tą ścianą znajdowała się druga siatka z drobniejszymi oczkami i otworami, a w niej trzecia gęsta. W tej trzeciej siatce poruszało się pudełko, którym wyciągano przy pomocy drutu przesiek z którego wyparował już gaz. Posady w komorze znajdowała się instalacja elektryczna prowadzona po obu stronach belki nośnej podpartej na filarach cementowych. Instalacja wentylacyjna wmontowana była w murach komory gazowej. Do wnętrza komory prowadziły od niej małe otwory zasłonięte siatkami z białej blachy, które położone były w górnej części ściany bocznych oraz otwory dolne, zabezpieczone jakgdyby kagańcami szklanymi. Wentylacja komory gazowej połączona była z systemem rur wentylacyjnych, znajdujących się w rozbieralni.

 Wentylacja ta obsługująca również pokój sekcyjny poruszana była motorami elektrycznymi, znajdującymi się na strychu budynku krematoryjnego. Komora gazowa nie posiadała instalacji wodociągowej. Kran wodociagowy znajdował się w korytarzu i z niego wąż gumowy spuskiwano podłogę komory. Z końcem roku 1943 komorę gazową przebudowano ściśniętą murowaną tak, by nadawała się do gazowania mniejszych trans-portów. W ścianie tej znajdowały się takie same drzwi jak z korytarza do całej komory. Mniejsze transporty gazowano w komorze końcowej położonej dalej od wejścia z korytarza. Zarówno rozbieralnia jak i komora gazowa pokryte były od wierzchu płytą betonową i zasypane ziemią, porośnię trawą. Ponad komorę gazową wznosiły się jakgdyby małe kominki osterech otworów do wypływu gazu. Otwory te zatykane były pokrywami cementowymi z drzewianymi uchwytnymi na dwie ręce. Nad rozbieralnią teren był trochę wzniesiony ponad poziom po-dłóża i zupełnie równy. Rury wentylacyjne uchodziły do ciągów i kominów znajdujących się w budynku stojącym ponad korytarzem i rozbieralnią. Należy pamiętać, że początkowo w rozbieralni nie było ławek ani wiszących, a w komorze gazowej tułów. Jedno i drugie zainstalowano

dopiero w jesieni 1943 r. dla zamaskowania rezbieralni i komory i przedstawienia ich jako łaźni i desyngkacja. Też te umieszczono były na klockach drzewianych, które w tym celu wmurowano w cementową powalę komory gazowej. Żadne przewody wodociągowe z tymi tymi nie łączyły się, a więc i woda nigdy z nich nie ciekła. - - - - -

Jak już wspomniałem z korytarza prowadziła winda, a właściciel wyciągnął świat na poziom parteru. Tu od windy prowadziły jedno drzwi do hajcowni, gdzie znajdowały się piece krematoryjne, a drugie wprost w przeciwnym kierunku do pokoju zapasowego na szluki. Ponadto znajdowały się tu korytarz, do którego prowadziło wejście od strony bramy wjazdowej na teren krematorium. Drzwiami na prawo z tego korytarza wchodziło się do pokojów szekowych. Między pokojem szekowym a magazynem zapasowym na szluki znajdował się klozet, do którego przechodziło się drzwiami z pokoju szekowego. Drzwiami z korytarza na lewo wchodziło się do hajcowni od strony generatorów pieców krematoryjnych. Piece te uszeregowane były obok siebie w różnych odstępach, było ich pięć, każdy opalany dwoma generatorami. Z drugiej strony, a więc z tej strony, w której znajdowało się wyjście od windy, posiadały te piece po trzy retorty. W każdej retorcie mieściło się pięć szkieletów ludzkich. Każda retorta smykana była na drzwi zelazne z napisem Hitler's "Tepf". Pod każdą retortą znajdował się popielnik, smykany również na drzwiczki zelazne wyrobu tej samej firmy. Za piecami od strony wjazdu na podwórze krematorium na lewo znajdowała się koksownia. Posuwając się w głąb podwórza przebiegał na koksownię wąski korytarzyk, z którego prowadziły drzwi do małego pokoiku przeznaczanego dla SS-mannów, z którego wychodziło jedno okno na hajcownię od strony retort, a drugie na tylne podwórze krematorium. Obok niego leżał pokój komandoführera z jednym oknem zwróconym na tylne podwórze. Za tym pokojem znajdował się klozet i mała umywalka, a za nimi pokój dla lekarzy z oknem wychodzącym na obór końską. Z korytarzyka tego prowadziły drzwiczki schody na strych, gdzie znajdował się pokój dla ludzi zatrudnionych w Sonderkomandzie. Poza tym na strychu znajdowały się motory elektryczne obsługujące windę i wentylację. Zatrudniony tam był przy ich obsłudze jeden mechanik więzień. Od strony wjazdu na podwórze krematorium znajdowała się w środku budynku wystająca ku przodowi poza jego masyw przybudówka, w której znajdował się piec do palenia śmieci. Była to t. zw. "Müllverbrennung". Był to osobny piec, do którego wchodziło się po schodach wzdłuż, otoczony wokół był poręczą stalową i opalany węglem. Wejście do przybudówki "Müllverbrennung" znajdowało się od strony wjazdu na teren krematorium. Przybudówka ta oprócz drzwi miała od frontu jedno okno i po jednym oknie na prawo i na lewo od wejścia. W rogu na lewo od wejścia znajdował się otwór, którym z popielnika znajdującego się przed nim naseniaty przybudówki wrzucone do przybudówki rzeczy przeznaczone na spalenie. Piec do spalenia tych rzeczy znajdował się po lewej stronie od wejścia do przybudówki, a zimą palenisko do opalania tego pieca po prawej. Zanimozem, iż w tym władnie piecu przez cały czas palono dokumenty oddziału politycznego obozu. Co pewien czas SS-manni przynosili cieżkie papieru, dokumentów i kartotek i papiery te pod ich kontrolą były palone. Pół z tych papiery zapałył, te były w nich cieżkie stopy kartotek ludzi zmarłych oraz Totenmeldungi. Żadnego z tych dokumentów nie mogliśmy ostatecznie zebrać, ponieważ paliliśmy pod bezpośrednią i ścisłą kontrolą SS-mannów. Za przybudówką "Müllverbrennung" w głębi krematorium znajdował się pi komina, obsługujący wszystkie piece krematoryjne i piec "Müllverbrennung". Pociągowe wokół tego komina znajdowały się trzy motory elektryczne dla zasilenia jego ciągu. Z powodu gorąca panującego obok i w pobliżu pieca motory te pęły się jednak, raz wybuchł nawet pożar, wobec czego później zdemontowano je i kanały doprowadzające gazy spalinowe z pieców krematoryjnych wpuszczono wprost do komina. Z przybudówki "Müllverbrennung" prowadziły drzwi do części budynku, w której znajdował się komin. Część ta była położona wyżej, wchodziło się do niej po schodkach. Po wymontowaniu motorów urządzone w jednej części obok komina umywalki, przeznaczone dla zatrudnionych przy Sonderkomandzie a w osłóci przeciwniejszej, a więc tej bliższej rozbiórni pokój w którym nieraz sypiał obercapo August. Stale mieszkał on na bloku Reichsdeutscherów, początkowo na oddziale B Ib, a później na oddziale B IId. Na strychu nad przybudówką "Müllverbrennung" suszono rzeczy doięte ofiarom, roztrzępywano je i pakowano w worki. Worki te wywożono następnie autami. - - - - -

Jak już wyżej wspominałem krematorium nr 2 II posiadało pięć pieców. Każdy piec krematoryjny posiadał trzy retorty do palenia zwłok, i stał opalany był dwoma generatorami koksowymi. Wyloty kanałów ogniwych tych generatorów znajdowały się nad popielnikami obu bocznych retort tak, że płomień przechodził najpierw przez obie boczne retorty, dostawał się następnie do retorty środkowej, a stąd gazy spalinowe wychodziły biegnącym wzdłuż kanałem do kominu. Kanał gazów spalinowych wychodził z pod pieca krematoryjnego od strony retort pośredni między oboma generatorami. Dzięki takiemu urządzeniu różny był przebieg palenia się zwłok w retortach bocznych i w retorcie środkowej. Zwłoki muzułmanów, a więc zwłoki wychudszone i pozbawione tłuszczu paliły się szybciej w retortach bocznych, a gorzej w retorcie środkowej. Naodwrot, zwłoki ludzi zagazowanych, zwłok których posłano do gazu wprost z transportu, które zatem nie były wychudszone paliły się lepiej w retorcie środkowej. Przy paleniu takich zwłok używaliśmy koksu właściwie tylko do rozpalki kuchenki pieca. Zwłoki tłuste paliły się bowiem same dzięki spalaniu się tłuszczu, znajdującego się w ciele. Zdarzały się nawet wypadki, że gdy zabrakło koksu do opalenia generatorów, podkładaliśmy do popielników, znajdujących się pod retortami słomę i drzewo i gdy tylko tłuszcz zwłok się zapalił, paliły się już same ładunki własnym ogniem. Wewnątrz retorta nie posiadała żadnych części żelaznych, rustra miała szamotową. Żelazne części byłyby się przy zarwie, który dochodził nawet do 1000 do 1200 st. C. stopiły. Rustra szamotowa ułożona była w retorcie poprzecznie. Drzwiaki i otwór wejściowy do retorty były mniejsze, sama retorta była około 2 m. długa, 80 cm. szeroka, i około 1 m. wysoka. Zasadniczo paliło się w takiej retorcie po 4 - 5

167

zwłok. Zdarszały się jednak wypadki, że indowaliśmy do retorty i więcej zwłok. Musulmanów nieścoilo się nawet ośmiu. Takie większe ilości paliliśmy w czasie alarmów lotniczych bez wiedzy szefa krematorium, chodziło nam bowiem o to, aby z komina szedł większy ogień, i aby lotnicy to zauważyli. Sądziliśmy, że w ten sposób sprośadzić możemy dla siebie zmianę naszego lozu. Osęcoi szelano a szelano szelano ruszta, które dotąd na terenie obozu się znajdują są osęcoiami składowymi generatorów. Krematorium II posiadało ruszta z grubej kantówki szelanej. W krematoriach 4 i 5 były ruszta lancetowe w kształcie mieczy z rączką. - - - - -
